

Saint Father
DUMITRU STĂNILOAE

- The Restorer of Christian Theology -

Theological Florilegium

Arad, 09.15.2021

(On the Celebration Day of Saint Hierarch Joseph the New, from Partoş)

Translation by Marius Golea.

Father Professor Academician Dumitru Stăniloae
(Credit for the picture to Centrul Ortodox de Studii și Cercetare „Dumitru Stăniloae")

Motto: “To the extent each person has highlighted the greatness of Christ within world, all of them will walk into the light of Christ and in His love, for eternity.”
(Stăniloae 1995: 174)

The author of this translation encourages the free distribution of the present work, in any form and on any format, to whomsoever would be interested in.

Dedication

We dedicate this translation work to the Saint Father Dumitru Stăniloae, the Restorer of the Christian Faith.

Dedication

We dedicate this translation work to His Beatitude Daniel the Patriarch of the Romanian Orthodox Church

Dedication

We dedicate this work to His Piousness Father Archimandrite
Nestor Iovan
From Hodoş-Bodrog Holy Monastery

Content

Foreword	I-VI
Acedia	1
Activity	4
Addiction / Passions	14
Adoption	31
Affects	38
Alms	43
Angels	45
Apostles	63
Art	78
Ascesis	81
Asceticism and Mysticism	87
Birth Giver of God	96
Body	117
Charismas	158
Christ Jesus	169
Christian Dogmas	333
Church	350
Communication of Features between the Two Natures of Christ	383
Communion	395
Correcting the Holy Fathers	450
Creation	453
Cross / Crucifixion	477
Death	485
Deed	521
Deification	526

Dialogue	546
Dispassion / Absence of Passions	561
Dwelling of God within Human Being	565
Egotism	567
Embodiment	569
En-Humanity / En-Hypostatization	596
Epektatis	603
Eschatology	605
Evil	628
Evolution / Progress	639
Experiencing God	648
Faith	651
Family / Marriage	668
Fasting	678
Fear	680
Fellow Human / Neighbor	686
Forgiveness	689
Forsaking	691
Freedom	693
Gentleness and Humbleness	711
Gnosis	715
God	717
Good	736
Grace of God	744
Guarding the Mind	754
Heart	756
Heavens	760
Hell	762
Heresy	783

Holiness	786
Holy Ghost	798
Holy Mysteries	817
Holy Relics	918
Holy Scripture	920
Holy Tradition	925
Holy Trinity	931
Hope	965
Human Being / Mankind	969
Icon	1015
Idol	1073
Image and Likeness of God	1081
Immortality	1086
Judgment	1093
Justice and Righteousness	1116
Kenosis	1121
Kingdom of God	1135
Knowledge / Understanding	1139
Law	1191
Laymen	1196
Life	1198
Logos	1202
Love	1204
Luminous Light	1258
Mercy	1264
Mind / Rationality	1266
Monasticism	1272
Motion / Movement	1277
Nothing / Nothingness	1281

Numerology	1283
Obedience	1285
Orthodox Apologetics	1287
Paradise	1380
Paradox	1382
Personalism	1389
Pleasure / Pain	1471
Power / Strength	1476
Prayer of Jesus / Prayer of Heart	1479
Prayer	1487
Preaching	1523
Predestination	1525
Priesthood	1528
Prophets and Prophecies	1555
Providence	1566
Rationality	1570
Repentance	1573
Responsibility	1583
Resting	1595
Restoration	1597
Resurrection	1599
Revelation	1622
Sacrifice	1633
Saint	1641
Salvation	1648
Sanctification	1662
Science	1666
Seeing God	1670
Senses	1684

Sex	1686
Sin	1693
Soul	1712
Space	1721
Spirituality / Spiritualization	1725
Sufferance	1728
Symbol	1745
Tears / Crying	1752
Temptation/ Trial / Test	1754
Tent	1758
Thoughts	1762
Time / History / Eternity	1767
Transcendence	1806
Transparency to God	1808
Tropes	1811
Troubles	1836
Truth	1839
Unapproachable Light	1851
Uncreated Divine Energies	1867
Union with God / with Fellow Humans	1893
Virtue	1907
Vision	1911
Weakness	1913
Will	1915
Woman	1919
Wonders	1921
Word	1924
Work	1928
Word / Universe / Cosmos	1930

Worry	1975
Worshipping	1981
Appendix I – Priest Professor Dumitru Stăniloae’s Bibliography	A-L

Foreword

Starting our short considerations on Saint Father Dumitru Stăniloae's writings, we declare ourselves as totally unworthy of doing that, for we are only a sinner, and only a layman¹.

Our endeavor was determined, in the beginning, by our great love for Saint Father Dumitru Stăniloae, whose monumental Romanian Philokalia (in twelve volumes) we read; then, to the extent our translations have been accumulating more and more of his works, our admiration has been growing up to awe.

Finalizing the present Theological Florilegium out of the ten volumes which we have chosen as texts sources, we have understood the affirmation of Olivier Clement², who said about Father Dumitru Stăniloae, that he was one of the four greatest Christian theologians ever existed, so he was equal to: Saint John the Evangelist, to Saint John Damascene, and to Saint Gregory Palamas.

As many theologians notice while studying Saint Father Stăniloae's works, he put the Christian theology back on its right tracks, namely by bringing it back to its sources: to the Holy Scripture and to the Holy Fathers of the Church, in an era when the Christian theology was dominated by human rationality's speculations. But this ascertainment, consciously or not, it overlooks another merit of his theology: that one of bringing the Christians theology out of the locking down in the ancient and in the medieval doctrinal perspectives, and by bringing the Christian theology up to date, and by giving the Christian theology the possibility of an eternal openness, no matter the progress which the sciences and the social evolution will ever made. Regarding this, our deep belief is that Christendom, by only existing for less than two millennia³, it still is in its very beginnings, and, in hundred of millions of light years from now on, the knowledge about God will tremendously evolve.

¹ Though, we humbly let the reader know that we have a master degree in theology and a PhD in translation studies on religious texts translation between English and Romanian languages.

² "Olivier Clement said that in the two Christian millennia, in two thousand years of Christianity, there existed four providential personalities, gifted by God, in a certain space, in a certain context, and who had an essential importance in crystallizing and developing the Christian theology. The first one was, like the French theologian said: SAINT JOHN, so important through his works, and especially through the last book of the New Testament: The Apocalypse. (...) After another seven – eight hundred years, because this is the interval which follow at, one after another, these great religious personalities at – says Olivier Clement - we find SAINT JOHN DAMASCENE, who made for the first time a synthesis of the Christian teaching of faith. After another seven centuries, there lived SAINT GREGORY PALAMAS, the one who made, for the first time, a synthesis of the great currents and spiritual teachings – the ascetic and the mystical ones - of the Eastern Christianity; and look what said, in the end, Olivier Clement: after another seven hundred years, we have Priest Professor DUMITRU STĂNILOAE, the theologian who has turned the true theology to its sources: to the Holy Scripture and to the writings of the Holy Fathers." (According to Priest Professor Ioan Teșu, transcripts of the Radio Trinitas broadcasting, entitled "Trinitas Dialogues", from 04.08.2013, a rubric held by priest Bogdan Țifrea, in the year 2013, a year declared by the Orthodox Romanian Church as Commemorative Year of Priest Professor PhD Academician Dumitru Stăniloae).

This restoration of the Christian faith means courageous theologoumena on world/universe, on body, on hell, on salvation, on communion, on love, on marriage and sex etc. The Creation is good, both in what concerns the world and the body, seen as environment for salvation and as vehicle of the soul, during the pilgrimage in this life on this planet – and very soon on other planets and further on all over universe -, are by no means evil, neither they are a punishment, but they are a proof of the infinite love God has for us. And how could have been evil the world and the body and still being created by God?!...

For instance, the hell is seen by Saint Father Stăniloae as the total lack / impossibility of communion, of communication, which the soul will be in, after the death, if during the life on Planet Earth⁴ the human being didn't accept the communion with God and with his fellow human beings, and didn't accept God's love and he didn't have love for his fellow humans, and chose to remain isolated in his own egotism. There aren't smoky figures tormenting the poor sinners with fire and brimstone, cutting and pricking the bodies... The hell will be that loneliness for eternity, and that torment caused by no longer possible to be satisfied lusts. But, despite the fact that the souls in hell will totally lack any possibility of communion and of communication, by still being images of God, God won't totally interrupt His relation with them, by maintain a very tiny but still present connection with them, for once being in His image, the souls will always be in His image, and God doesn't interrupt all connections with His image.

³ King James Bible: Psalm 90: 4: "For a thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night."; Romanian Orthodox Bible: Psalms: 89: 4: "For a thousand years before Your eyes are like the day from yesterday, which passed, and like the watch of the night." Consequently, the Christendom has in God's eyes – at best – almost two days. Who could think that God had created the universe / the Planet Earth, and the human beings, only in order to destroy them after not even two complete days? That's why, we think the Christian theology must immediately change its preaching about the end of the world coming tomorrow, or soon, because God hasn't spent so infinite time and energy, and He hasn't had a plan for eternity, and He hasn't sent His own Son and One of Trinity, only to cut the evolution of the universe so shortly and to destroy it on this very incipient level of evolution and development. We rather believe that God has planned, to assist the human being created in His image and in His likeness, to sanctify the entire universe, and to bring it back to God as a well-pleasant offering and bloodless sacrifice. The human beings will extend all over universe, and they will Christianize the entire universe, before the second coming of Christ.

⁴ We refer to world as to Planet Earth, for we've just crossed to the interplanetary civilization, with the private flights performed in the outer space, by the space visionaries: Richard Branson and Jeff Bezos, in July 2021. We identify here – maybe too soon, maybe too bluntly, maybe as a stumble stone for many... - the need for the Christian Church to extend the religious assistance it provides, to the people who are going to travel and live the interplanetary space, on other planets. Since July 2021, the "world" has become the whole "universe". But this idea isn't even a new one, for Saint Maximos the Confessor spoke about Universe as Church, and about the human being's duty to deify the whole universe and to bring it back to its Creator, to God (See The Romanian Philokalia, vol. II and III, a theological florilegium from the texts of the Holy Fathers of the Church, translates and put together By Saint Father Dumitru Stăniloae). And Saint Father Stăniloae saw this duty of the human being as the only path to his salvation.

Saint Father Stăniloae, when approaching some difficult to explain aspects of the faith, he simply and courageously affirms that, for now, we cannot know the answers to some questions. This is unlike the attempts made by other theologians during the almost two millennia of Christendom, to explain everything, even by employing a very obvious sophisms and with childish mistakes of logics. Though, neither Father Stăniloae got totally rid of affirming that some Christendom's aspects are paradoxical.

The time is divided, in Saint Father Stăniloae's vision, in: current time, history, and eternity. Some of the theological views, and some of the Christian Tradition's elements evolve in time, but there are the Christian dogmas and the Holy Scripture remaining unchangeable. In these conditions, the mankind progresses and accumulates scientific and theological knowledge. The Revelation is explained to every generation, according to their level of civilizational development. Between science and theology there is not contradiction, for the science only unveils the laws placed by God in His Creation. The human being's duty is to try hard and to accumulate enough knowledge in order to work for his own and for others' salvation, and for deifying the whole universe in order to bring it, as offering, back to its Creator.

Salvation is a complex process, undertaken during one's life, through good deeds and through faith, and by being administrated the Holy Mysteries. Each human being must try, according to his powers, to work the Christian ascesis and to be open to the Christian mysticism, for thus he opens himself, gradually, to God. The highly spiritualized persons become transparent to God's presence within them. But ascesis and mysticism doesn't mean that only the monks will be saved and that the married people's walk of life is doomed and, it can at most be tolerated! The family is a Church, the family is a portion of the Kingdom of God. The husbands are priests officiating the faith in this portion of Kingdom created by them, with the help of God, by God's grace, and by their deeds, and love, and by giving birth to children. God created the man and the woman in His image and likeness and commanded them to multiply and to fill the earth up. And that's why the sex isn't actually a sin when taking place within Christian marriage and aiming to procreate children. Neither is the monks' way wrong, for they chose to live their entire life as living sacrifice to God – but neither must one ask the married people, or all the people, to live a monastic life, as it would have been the only path to salvation.

But salvation is a communion's gift. People pray for one another, even for the dead ones. Even some people from hell would be saved and moved to Paradise, if the living human beings pray for them and use the means of the Church's Mysteries in order to work for those souls' salvation.

Saint Father Dumitru Stăniloae constantly warned about human mind's tendency of making idols, out of human theological considerations, and vision, and ideas... The theology slips so easily in excesses, in idolatry, in deism, in seeing God as a demiurge fighting the devil – and therefore there are logically affirmed at least some chances to lose – for, otherwise, what fighting is for, if the battle is already won?!...

Behold a fragment that expresses in a brief manner the doctrine Father Stăniloae had, concerning the innovation needed in theology, so that theology not to remain a dead letter:

“Any meaning referring God, it has to have fragility, to have a transparence, to have a lack of fixity, it has to urge us to revoke it, and to stimulate us towards issuing another concept, but on the line of the previous one. If the meaning remains fixed in our mind, then we will limit God in that concept's limits, or we will even forget about God, because of the whole our attention will be focused upon that concept or upon the word expressing it. In such a case the respective “meaning” it will become an idol, namely a false god. The meaning or the words used to express it, it always must make God transparent, as not comprised in that concept or meaning, as exceeding any meaning, as making Himself obvious once with an aspect, and then with another aspect, of His infinite richness.” (Stăniloae 2003: 129)

While the first ones of Saint Father Stăniloae writings, though very profound and already containing restoring affirmations on Christian faith, they still maintained what we could call as a classic line in theologizing, his theology gradually evolved to a philosophical theology, or to a theological philosophy, consisting of a complete system of the faith. Even more, his late books approached Christendom from some very strongly highlighted perspectives: from love, from communion, from immortality, from considering that God is luminous light etc.

A special book of his, it is that entitled Jesus Christ or the Restoration of the Man, for it is a complete theological analysis on Christ's salvation work, and of all aspects related to that. In His three dignities: Prophet, High Priest, and Emperor, Christ, both Man and God, worked for our salvation – and He still works and is present, together with the Holy Ghost, within Church.

Of course, we haven't translated all the theological writings of Saint Father Dumitru Stăniloae. But, as far as we can appreciate with our humble measures, we consider the Theological Florilegium resulted consequently to our undertaking, as illustrative and as containing all the main themes and renewals the works of Saint Father Stăniloae presented.

We have identified, in the present translation activity, the need for intra-lingual / intra-theological translation, for, as we've said, the necessary Christian perspective is now upon universe as Creation, and not limited to Planet Earth; consequently, when translating the last two books of Saint Father Dumitru Stăniloae, we employed terms and syntagms as: "universe" instead of "world", "present life" instead of "earthly life", "human person" instead of "man" etc. Regarding to the last notion we've mentioned here, a Holy Father whose affirmation we've encountered in one the last volumes of the Romanian Philokalia said "If God has created others worlds than this, what do you have to do with that?".

We urge the reader not to limit his research on the translated texts, only by framing them in the same categories as we did. Please use – for this work is available as pdf and therefore the search engine is available to the reader to – the electronically available search engines and identify the core word / notion / collocation / syntagm you are interested in, and you are going to find out that word / notion in a multitude of contexts, so that your research will gain amplitude. For instance, no matter what is the soteriological aspect Saint Father Stăniloae analyzed, he must speak in connection to that, also about God in Trinity, about Holy Mother of the Lord, about Christ's Embodiment – when He assumed the human nature by en-hypostatization -, about His Works on Earth while He was both Man and God, about Preaching, about Crucifixion, about Death and Resurrection and so on.

There are some main directions which Saint Father Stăniloae developed his theological system to: communion, love, light, and personalism. All those directions recorded a great development through his theology, but, amongst all, the personalism we consider it as his main contribution. He defined the personalism as the quality of being a person, and from that he extended his theology to all aspects coming from the fact that God is a Trinity of divine Persons, and the human person still remain a person after death, and, in case one human person is saved, he / she still remain a person in continuous ascension in God's love and luminous light, without losing the quality as person by merging into God. The dialogue between God and the human being, is a dialogue from Person to person, a dialogue asked for by God but a dialogue that still must be accepted by the human person willingly.

The reader can find in the present translation a very complete theology on the unapproachable light, on the union with God, on the uncreated divine energies, on the human being's deification while still living on Planet Earth, to mention only a very few aspects causing some fiery inter-denominational disputes.

We mention here the presence in the selected texts, of the most complete research on Jesus's Prayer / The Prayer of the Heart, we have ever come across.

We are keenly aware of the fact that our translation couldn't express the genius rhetorical richness employed by Saint Father Stăniloae, one widening even the Romanian language's borders. But, with our humble measures, we still have constantly attempted to keep in the target text the style from the source text, even by, in a rare-occasions, forcing the creation of new terms and collocations not existing in the English language: "en-hypostatization", "en-hypostatizing", "supra-historicity", "all-luminous", "His-together-with-us sufferance", "the mind's self-looking at itself", "of-One-Being Trinity", "not-silent voices", "not-narrowed Christ" (and Father Stăniloae extensively uses the negation placed before a positive affirmation, in order to somehow express the apophatic meanings) and the examples could continue.

We close our short considerations on the Theological Florilegium we have translated out of Saint Father Dumitru Stăniloae the Restorer of the Christian faith, by expressing again our inadequacy to such a huge undertaking, and the fact that we have done it only for deep love and admiration that we have for the huge theologian he was. We hope that we have given the Christendom a due access to Father Stăniloae's writings, almost unknown outside the Romanian language users' environment, and even more than that, an access to the right faith to every human being searching for salvation.

We strongly believe that fact that the access to knowledge by and large, and to Christian theology specifically, it must be for free, for God doesn't ask us to pay for salvation (Mt. 10: 8: "(...) freely ye have received, freely give"), so that we urge the reader to disseminate the present translation on every support and on every way to whomsoever would be interested in.

Marius Golea, Arad, 23th of September, 2021

Acedia

“The passions are a turning of the entire man towards exterior, towards the living according to senses, a transformation of the entire man in “body”, in bodily feeling. The passions, as feeling through the senses crossed through by lust and anger, which have attracted the rationality in their exclusive service, they represent therefore a feeling in the most superficial part of our being, through “epidermis”, or, as they say, an exit of our being from the region of the ontological truths, out of the connection with the existence’s sources, o living on the edge of the nothing’s precipice, from which doesn’t come to us, when we awake from the passion’s fire, except the sensation of emptiness, of false, of vanity of our existence, of nothingness, dominant in the usual life, which has been so terribly analyzed by Heidegger or Sartre. That’s why, the moment of passionate attraction and of satisfying the passion it is the product of a deceit. The superficial attracts us as it would be profound, consistent, and durable. Through passion “we want with infinite force, the nothing”, as says Blondel, of the pass alternatively from the effervescence which pursuits the nothing without realizing it (but which shows its presence in the conscience of a thirst that cannot be satisfied), to feeling the nothing, unveiled in the loathing and in the disgust which follow to this effervescence. Through passions we inflate the nothing, we are stirred up by it, we consume ourselves for it, we move in its area, and we end in the absence of any positive source of existence. Through passions we stretch our increasingly dry throat after some water which is only a momentary illusion, or which, after a short deceit, it appears to us as a drop that makes us even thirstier. As we experience, through long passionate rushing upon, the impossibility to satisfy ourselves with it, or with the nothing from within it, this nothing becomes increasingly obvious to us, and the sentiment of futility overwhelms us increasingly more, and in time it throws us in carelessness, in a killer spiritual idleness. This is what the Holy Fathers called “acedia”. Acedia is, according to Evagrius and Saint Maximos, more burdening than all. While the other passions are distributed preponderantly on one of the three faculties of the soul, as Saint Maximos said, this last drowsiness paralyzes all the soul’s powers: rationality, lust, and wrath. It sometimes comes even upon the ones who are advanced in the spiritual life. Behold what Hausherr describes the acedia like, according Evagrius, in the form that comes upon the ones who strive to reach the consummation: “The demon of acedia is the most difficult to bear with. He drips his bitterness in all our motives of living in a supra-natural mode. There is no love around you. God Himself doesn’t manifest any interest in you, because otherwise, who could he let you be tempted by such devils? The devil of acedia cuts off any hope, making the soul to accept the thought of death in any virtue (12, 14). Either you know or not, if this though persists, it will darken in the time of prayer the holy light in the face of the soul (16). You won’t dare any longer to search for the mercy of God despite all your prayers (18). You feel the need for crying, but an awful suggestion stops your tears: they serve to nothing (19). And this lasts for days and you foresee a long life you will have to live in this torture (24). Decidedly, there is no person there above in order to see my torment! (32, 34). When this burden of acedia falls upon you, you will want to shout out your discouragement and your boredom (37). This can lead to illness. This is because the intensity of your drowsiness it consumed the whole your force, and you are at the end of your patience, and you feel yourselves nigh to the furious insanity. You groan and you shed tears like a child, and no relief come from anywhere (38)” (Blondel 1946: 1-2; quoted from Evagrius).” (Stăniloae 1992: 81-83)

“The ones on the ascendant path of the spiritual consummation, they exit the crises caused by acedia, for they know the methods and their will is firm enough in order to endure. The faith they have been exercising themselves in, it doesn’t allow them to throw over all the things, in a durable manner, the verdict of futility and nothingness. But beyond these, there is God. But the ones who reach acedia before strengthening themselves on the path of consummation after they have been vainly searching for quenching their thirst for absolute in diverse passions, nothing could have got them out of acedia, if a wonder hadn’t awakened within them a strong faith in God. Those ones easily end in suicide, after crossing through insanity.” (Stăniloae 1992: 83)

Activity

“Blondel discerns between the types of activity: the elementary type of the human action, consisting of doing something out of a substance; the action we “make the man” through, we express in our profound nature our essentially human aspirations, forming our character: and the contemplation, which lack any passive matter from, or any interest, or any useful purpose, and just because of this having the greatest efficacy in perfecting our spiritual energies. But there is no total separation amongst these activities. In working upon nature, the man exercises some virtues too, and he forms his character too, and, indirectly, he pursues a service in the favor of his fellow humans. That’s why, the spiritual toils never disregarded the manual labor as means of purification and of guiding the believer to consummation. And we believe that today, when the technical civilization has brought a great variety of new activities related to the nature, nothing would impede the believer of pursuit his consummation even by practicing a trade by using machineries.” (Stăniloae 1992: 27-28)

The faith experienced by the believer not like a personal product, like a result of his efforts, but like a pressure exercised upon conscience by a presence or by the overwhelming signs of a presence, which is one with the reality which he believes in. The subject feels himself conquered, included, and touched. Only after these states take place, which include within also the knowledge specific to the faith, or only in their frame, it takes place also the activity of the believer, a will to believe even more. (Stăniloae 1993)

The religious cogitation, which moves into interior of the faith, by unfolding its content and by nourishing from the experience of the Revelation, of a live report with God, it does not claim to exhaust the mysteries of this report, but to establish that this report is savior and to see through what it specifically is savior. The report between the self and God, by being the base of the believer’s certitude, of the one who has made the experience of the Revelation, this one knows that through cogitation he cannot think God outside this report and, consequently, into the transcendent unilateralism or in fusion with the immanence. The rationality, which has not the experience of the Revelation, but it is carried only by the not-existential curiosity to know, it can place God either into the transcendent alternative or into the immanent one. It can say either only that God is unchangeable, or only that He is changeable. But the religious man, who experiences God like a true God, but also like God the Savior, like God Who has committed Himself to man’s salvation, he cannot see and cogitate God but only in the paradoxical formula: unchangeable but with an activity who minds about the changing of the world, transcendent but present into the order of immanence. We cannot know exactly how God is, but the paradox expresses a general truth, certainly valid about Him: He is God, but a God interested in the world. The truth is not, by any means, into formal logic's unilateral and simplistic formulas. (See our article "About dogma", in "The Thinking", April, 1941). (Stăniloae 1993)

The capacity of becoming a subject of the divine love, namely of becoming God through grace, it must correspond to the manner of God into man, and the present state of subject of this love to His resemblance. In itself, the capacity of the man of becoming subject of the divine love it means his capacity to receive the love into an ever-growing measure, through his own efforts, and to manifest it like something of his own. The object cannot receive the love, neither it can acquire and manifest the love like its own. It is required some activity on this purpose, and the fact that love come like a gift, it does not exclude the activity¹. The capability of receiving something and of manifesting that something like an own feature, it is the characteristic of the subject in general. The man is subject before being the bearer of the divine love, though he wholly becomes subject only through by receiving and manifesting this love. (Stăniloae 1993)

The subject is an ultimate center of spontaneity and of conscious self-determination. It is a conscious source of independence. The conscience and the liberty, which means the capacity of freely decided activity, they form his essential features. The man realizes about himself like being an ultimate and sovereign center of all his acts. He has the conscience to realize his sovereign self-determination and to use it, for, if he didn't determine himself consciously, he would have not determined himself, but he would have been determined by something else than himself. But conscience is also knowledge and knowledge offer to liberty a real picture, rich, of all its possibilities. (Stăniloae 1993)

About the insufficiency of the law, we are aware of - no longer being under its regime - and also the prophets realized it. The proof is given by the fact that they showed that the regime of the law was transitory, like one which asked for a consummation. Therefore, an important part of their prophetic activity was to herald the coming of Jesus Christ. (Stăniloae 1993)

¹ About this together work of the activity and passivity throughout our life of knowledge and love, see Louis Lavelle, w. c.: « L'amour jaillit de la partie active de nôtre mais on même temps il est éprouvé dans cette partie passive où nous subissons l'action d'autrui, quelquefois cette pure action de présence qui e déjà en lui une action d'amour avant d'être parvenue à la conscience distincte d'elle-même ». P. 526. « L'attention nous rend admirablement sensible la corrélation de l'activité et de la passivité de l'esprit qui reçoit du réel à proportion même que l'acte de l'attention plus d'intensité et de pureté », p. 482.

After we have briefly clarified us, from the content of our Christian belief, what God has given us or what He will give us, through Jesus Christ, what targets God pursuits with the man, we can now return, for a moment, back to the prophets and to their law, in order to why they and their activity weren't sufficient to the fulfillment of these goals, and why the Revelation mediated by them it wasn't enough? (Stăniloae 1993)

This phenomenon of emergence of a supreme substance, of a center of the movements into the nature rounded like a whole, it is observed into a categorical and complete way at the human being, which consists of conscious and volunteer nature. At the man, we can clearly see that the hypostasis does not mean only the rounding of the nature into a whole, but also the capacity of this environment of spontaneous movements. The hypostatic whole receives virtues of subject, of activity planned by himself from his center². (Stăniloae 1993)

² These two characteristics of the hypostasis are distinguished also H. Urs von Balthasar, exposing, on the basis of Saint Maxim the Confessor's Christology, the report between being and hypostasis. "The hypostasis, especially into the creatural domain, the state of itself of a one, namely, that something which a concrete being distinguishes through from others belonging to the same species", Kosmische Liturgie, Maximos der Bekenner: Höhe und Krise des griechischen Weltbildes, Fr. i. Br., 1941, p. 211. "But it truly comprises over this that active impropriation of which result is the individual" (pg. 213). If we imagine a general nature, repeating itself into many particular countenances, and these having in addition to the commune characteristics of the species also their particular features, these yet aren't hypostasis', because hypostasis is something that cannot be characterized through features which are part of the «existential features» - which distinguish the species - and the «hypostatic features», which refer to the individual as such: for example, the shape of the nose or the color of the hair. But the last ones remain only a sign and a clue for that something which stands alone and which stays at the back of the whole and which still belongs to the nature's order" (p. 213). "That's why the hypostasis can be described only approximately like being formed by two sides, which round up reciprocally: from the side of nature and of its properties which delimit increasingly tightly and from the side of the act, of the impropriation of this nature" (p.214). "The coordinated structure of the being and of the concrete wearer it opens the look over the non-identity between the being order end the order of the concrete existence" (die Nichtidentität von Wesensordnung und Daseinsordnung, p. 215). Maximos the Confessor said: "As the work refers to the one who works, likewise the nature refers to hypostasis". "This report involves, of course, on the one hand a restraint of something general into something particular; it is a concentration". But it is "a concentration bonded to a possession, to a way to be an owner of the being. This report is the cause due to which on one hand it is impossible to cogitate a hypostasis without nature, and on the other hand no nature coincides with its hypostasis; these two notions exclude each – other all the way to the inside of the divinity" (p. 212).

All the difference of Jesus like man from the other people it consists of the fact that He is man not like a different center, separate, but, like human center He is in the same time the godlike center. At Him we have the wonder that a center of human nature and activity, it is in the same time a center of the existence and of the entire power. The humanity is not rounded in Him, like a self-sustained reality, but into the divinity's frames. The human sin and the unhappiness of the human nature, they consist in the fact that the man has weakened at extreme the connections with the divinity - connections which are like a life source to the man - because of the man's too great tendency towards autonomy. The man has accentuated the tendency towards the state of own hypostasis until he went off the obedience to God. In order to reestablish the connection between man and God it was appropriate that one of its rounding to have the center inside God, identified like hypostatic center of the Godhead. The man cannot keep continue to roll down on the slope of the nonentity, of estrangement from God, since the center of his individualization is identical to one of the hypostatic centers of the Godhead. (Stăniloae 1993)

From here it turns out, on one hand, that the Son, by maintaining also into the embodiment state the godlike features and their activity, He did not work through them separately. The inseparability which the dogma speaks about, it is extended also to the works exercised through the natures by their unique person. The natures are not static entities, of whose inseparability would mean only a persistence of them into joining or into interpenetration, like two physical things. They are possibilities in a perpetual working. So, any work committed by the persons of the embodied Word, it meets in itself a movement committed through the godlike nature and one committed by the human nature. (Stăniloae 1993)

Out of all these detailed analyzes it results that the general reason of the irreproachable sufferings traits which were assumed by Jesus, it is that of a bridge between Him and people. We have said before, that the divine person of the Logos means, in the first place, eminent intentionality towards communion. This is shown also by the fact of the assuming of some sufferings which are not at all for Him but for the others too. Like the human activity and the human word too, the human irreproachable suffering of Jesus it was an anchor which He has thrown from Himself into His fellow humans' being. The Son of God has come close to the people in all respects. He hasn't come only in an appearance of an approach, but in a real way, internally, by throwing from Himself to the people, all the uniting savior bridges. Through all of these, God comes closer to us, not to fulfill Himself, but to make Himself accessible and savior to us, and to show His love in noticeable shapes. (Stăniloae 1993)

The kenosis of the godlike nature, like we suggested it, with the noticing of the divine un-changeability, like a weaving of its existence and activity with the human nature, it has like a reverse the Theosis of the human nature. We have seen that the basis of the kenosis, the reason which makes possible and explainable the manifestation of the godlike nature through the human nature, without changing itself, that is the love. Also, the love is the base and the deifying power of the human nature. Like into the divine love manifestation through the human features and possibilities it is present and active the godhead himself, who has descended without to descend himself and without to change Himself, in the same way a human nature, which has become vehicle and center of the divine love, it is deified, without ceasing to be a human nature. Thereby, what is humbleness, like a necessary shape of the manifestation of love, for the thickened sight of the people, it is in reality ascent and deification. (Stăniloae 1993)

These three dignities or ministrations are not simple fantasies, or simple words, or empty names. In fact, Jesus has exercised, in the most proper sense, the hierarchical mission; He has truly accomplished the reconciliation between mankind and God, by bringing Himself sacrifice and by praying like nobody else. He has done and He continues doing the highest work of teacher, of prophet. All His work is either hierarchal ministration, or teaching ministration, or a kingly ministration. There does not exist act or word from His life, which cannot bear the character of one of these ministrations. All His manifestations, and the whole His respiration fits within one of these ministrations, so that the three dignities are anything else but the way of manifestation and activity of His personality, in order to saving the people. To the depth of His being, He is absorbed into these three dignities and works. No one from the people, who are priests and teachers, is so much identified to these ministrations like Jesus Christ is. It is hard to the man through all his personality to identify himself with the priestly service, like also is hard to the teacher to fully identify himself, so much that all his personality to have the character of his ministration. The person of Jesus Christ, by being fully identified to these three ministrations, these are no longer simple accidental works of His, but Himself is fully hierarch, fully prophet, and fully king. Consequently, the three dignities are not empty titles, but the rightest characterization of the entire divine-human mission and personality. The mission itself, which He fulfilled, the reason for which He embodied Himself and for which He works, it is expressed in these three ministrations or dignities. (Stăniloae 1993)

Likewise, like king, into the creational order, the Son of God leads the Universe and the destiny of the mankind in an almighty way, before and after the embodiment, by influencing the history and intervening into it, by leading on unforeseen – by man - paths the man's destiny, by preserving the order of the nature, and by governing the whole Universe with the observation of the elastic frames of the natural laws and powers, and of the human wills. He activates on this plane, somehow from hidden, without entering a clear personal report with the man. As such, He is not into a function of an envoy, neither He has not the dignity of a king like as an office in the service of the salvation. The dignity of a king into the work of salvation He receives it from the Father like an entrustment, like a ministration, and it is differently exercised, not through the almightiness which forces, but through the truth which illuminates, through the love which conquers the souls, through the lamb's sacrifice which impresses and touches the souls. Into the work of the salvation, He accomplishes the paradox of the Lamb that reigns. Of course, we distinguish in the activity of Jesus commanding words and gestures, and ordering and founding ones too. But there commands the love, which does not force, but it urges. In His Savior life there are also deeds of a power from above nature, and which is above death. But it is a power manifested through the organs of the human nature and started from the spirit of the savior love. In a certain sense, this kingly dignity it is a kenotic dignity. It is a weird king in the eyes of the crowd which wanted Him on the throne of the worldly power. But He is a king Who has, over the souls who adhere to Him, more power than any other earthly king. Like a worker of the salvation, He is a king of the Church, of the heavenly Kingdom. Only like a king of the creational order He raises and crushes the kingdoms. But between the two faces of His kingly dignity there is a close bond, not only because through the kingly power manifested on the creational plan, He upholds, for example, through the State, the order, the necessary frame which the salvation of the people it is accomplished in, but also because the manifestation of His power into the unrests of the history and in the painful experiences of the individual life, He raises the man towards receiving Him like a Savior³. The form of the kingly dignity on the creational plan let itself to be put in the service of the salvation reigning. Without that form to contribute itself to the salvation, He is carried rather by the longsuffering than the severity, and through it, Jesus the Pantocrator, He wants to be a pedagogue towards Jesus the Savior. The sufferings and the punishments, even of the people unconverted to him, have not a character of an ultimate punishment, but it aims to the awakening of the conscience, that through them God searches for them like a Savior. (Stăniloae 1993)

³ This idea, that in the historical shakings Jesus works through another manner to raise the people to the report with Him like a savior, Herman Sauer developed it in his epochal work "Abendländische Entscheidung".

All over the place, the raising of a man, like a spiritual being, it cannot be done except through an activity and, so, through a love for this threefold character. They are the natural, and they are inevitable manifestation of the love of a superior spiritual being towards an inferior one, on which the superior being wants to raise the inferior being to the equality of the communion and, so, to happiness. That's why, they are everything that is more noble on earth, in the relations amongst people. But their sublime form hasn't been accomplished except in Jesus Christ. (Stăniloae 1993)

It is understood that between the different phases of the churchly tradition there is not any discontinuity, but a close connection. This entire tradition is a unity in variety, the will of the churchly community being also in its praying activity a divine-human will, by having the cooperation of the Holy Ghost. (Stăniloae 1993)

It is true that in the activity of Jesus there are distinguished the three stages mentioned by Bulgakov each of them being predominated, especially, from one of these three dignities. But these dignities are so interweaved and reciprocally conditioned than, at least in the subsidiary, there always exist and manifest the others two. When Jesus teaches like a prophet, the crowds feel the kingly power from His word. On the other hand, His word is a priestly service, a prayer addressed to the Father. Through His passions He brings sacrifice not only like a high priest, but He also teaches like a prophet and He defeats the sin and the death like a king. The entire spiritual force from Him, starting with the moment of the embodiment, and manifested into a way or another, it has the three aspects, which are all the most sublime in the world. (Stăniloae 1993)

Thereby, through kenosis we believe that must be understood this interweaving of godhead nature into its existence and activity with the human nature, showing to the people the godhead not else but through the humble form of God, and to other persons of the Holy Trinity not separated, but into a whole with the human nature⁴. The kenosis mustn't be understood, by any means, in the sense of that, besides what is human, there wasn't manifested any presence of the godlike nature. (Stăniloae 1993)

⁴ Maxim the Confessor says: "None of the nature which He was hypostasis to, were activated in a separate way from the another. Through each one the another was made more obvious. Being truly one and another, like God He was the one Who was moving the humanity, and like man the one who was unveiling His own Godhead. He was suffering in a godlike manner, so to say, because He was willingly suffering, because He wasn't a simple man and He was doing wonders, because He was doing them through His body, because He wasn't God unveiled. As the sufferings are wonderful and renewed through the godlike power of the nature of the One Who was suffering, and the wonders suffered, being fulfilled through the suffering power of the One Who was doing them", Migne G. P. 91, 105 B. "Like Gregory the Theologian says (word 45): He didn't do the godlike works in

Let's take the different features by turn, in order to see what their activity became through embodiment. To the almightiness, God did not give up, because we saw that Jesus was doing acts which exceeded the powers of natures. In principle, the almightiness is the feature which God does all He wants through, but to us it is made obvious especially by the victory over the laws of the nature, which seem to us as being the ultimate power. It is true that not on each moment Jesus Christ was doing wonders. The power of God consists also of sustaining the nature's laws. He didn't come to continuously fight the laws of nature. But this thing, forming the permanent habit and not arising with interruptions, it cannot be seen intuitively like having its cause beyond the laws of nature. Who, instead, has the power to suspend a law, by placing in the same time a being or a thing into another law, or by restoring the power of a law over a being who escaped from under it – like it is the case of bringing back of dead man – it is obvious that, and it demonstrates that the laws of the nature, are kept through His power. Jesus Christ had and was exercising also the power of sustaining the natural laws, but, because these ones exist permanently, the exercise of this power wasn't not seen at Him. He showed it only for a few times, as much as to be sufficient. The man would need to be placed on the godlike spiritual plan of life in order to see what the nature's laws existence was depending on Jesus Christ like. They who saw Jesus, they didn't see the pure spiritual reverse, the one that was interior to His activity. But from His depths it started a non-felt power, a quiet one - like everything that is habit and continuation -, of the sustaining of the world. And this power wasn't exercised only through a divine way, but through His body mentally animated and united with Himself, according to the hypostasis. Not through unveiled godhead, like before. Neither did Him the human works in a human way. Because He was doing them according to His will, the one unlimited in power, and not subjected to any need. The suffering wasn't in His case the fulfillment of any punishment, like it is to us, but it was kenosis of the Logos embodied for us". Maxim the Confessor, Migne G. P. 91, 120 B. "Through an infinite desire for people He became Himself, in a truly and existential way, the desired object, not suffering anything in His own being due to this unspoken kenosis, neither loosing anything from the human nature through this unspeakable assuming of it", Migne P. 91, 104. Christ's sufferings as man, namely the manifestations of the kenosis, they aren't only human, says Maxim the Confessor, because they are received freely, for the love for people. The liberty which Jesus obeys them with, it gives them a godlike character. The kenosis, so, it isn't an actual kenosis, which blocks the presence of godhead, but it is a manifestation of the liberty and of the divine love. It is another way of revelation of God. Behold how H. U. von Balthazar (Die Komische Liturgie, p. 250) summarizes, very appropriately, the thought of Saint Maximos the Confessor: "Into the identity of the divine humiliation and of superhuman form which He suffers in, it is accomplished the unification of the contrasts. Because, the divine kenosis is that «supra-infinite power», which is both liberty and love, and which makes possible to God «that through an infinite desire for man to become truly and existentially the object of His desire». And this, without renouncing to His liberty, because this «emptying done for us» it is only a clue and a revelation of an «infinitely powerful majesty». Precisely this place of God's emptying it is also the one of the most godlike godhead, the one of eternal liberty and supreme love".

the human nature, though all the efficiency was due to it. It started from the candlestick of the human nature, of which power, as much as it was, it was still kept in permanent togetherness with the godlike one, by Jesus. Jesus felt also the human power besides the godlike one, whereas it was an effort. That, it wasn't disappearing into His self-evidence about Himself. (Stăniloae 1993)

Addiction / Passions

“The nervous lead of any passion it is the addiction, the desire tying us on the seen appearances of the things which promise us a lot and give us very little if nothing.” (Stăniloae 1992: 88)

“The addiction attracts towards exterior all of our soul’s powers. The addiction is the glue sticking us on the surface of the external world. The asceticism’s problem is what this addiction can be killed like, namely the substance of the passions, and not what to kill our authentic being in, or to kill the world we live in. What could we reach like, in this world, as free beings, admiring and understanding the world as creation of God, without this admiration to enslave us to the world’s sensitive and opaque surface, thus impeding our development as beings oriented towards the spiritual infinite order? What could be use this road like, towards our target, without falling down and succumb on it?” (Stăniloae 1992: 88)

“What ties us on things it still is the worry. The worry is the bitter fruit of the passions or of the addiction to the world’s things. The passion lives its apogee in tasting the pleasure and rebelling against pain (sadness, anger). The passionate man alternates his existence between the pleasure’s voluptuousness and the pain’s torments. Often, these ones are not totally separated from each other. The moments preoccupied with pleasure and with pain are actually rare, but both the pleasure and the pain keep the man’s being under tension way before being them actually lived. O great part of the man’s life is in waiting for and searching for pleasures and in the fear of present and future pains. This is a fruit of the passions, and it is the relentless manifestation of the passions’ presence within us. These waiting and these fears cause us worries. But even in the intervals when we aren’t actually aware of waiting for a pleasure, of that we fear of a future pain, we work in order to provide ourselves with some pleasures and for avoiding some unspecified pains. The engine pushing us in this work it is the worry. The worry is appointed by the addiction on the front plan of the life and it is the steadfast deputy of the life, in the intervals which the addiction withdraws on the back plan. While the “lady addiction” sleeps, her maid, lady worry (Frau Sorge) stays awake and takes vigil, “with her hair rebelled and with her murky eyes, due to her almost permanent lack of sleeping.” (Stăniloae 1992: 88)

“Palamas says that being free of passions it doesn’t mean killing the passionate part, but it means directing the passionate part towards the good things, namely towards the godlike things. Thus, free of passions is the one who has forsaken his evil habits, but he is rich in the good things, namely the one getting into his own control his irascible and concupiscent parts, parts which form together the passionate part, parts obeying thus, the cogitating part of the soul, likewise the cogitating part of the passionate ones it obeys the passionate part. The last thing it is an abuse. It is natural that we know God through our mind, and to gain the virtues through the passionate part and to see in our concupiscence the clean love, and the irascible part to achieve the patience. While the one who modifies the passionate part, he is indifferent both to good and to evil.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 50-51)

“Palamas says that through the passionate part we love God and we love our neighbor and we hate the evil. Does the love for God, and the hatred against evil, impede us from seeing God? Like the ones occupying their thought only with God, they do not kill the cogitation, and they remove the evil thoughts, likewise do not kill the passionate part the ones who love the good; they only kill the relations of the passionate part with the evil things, by wholly turning it towards the love for God. This is the condition for detaching from the bodily things, in order to focus our mind at God, in prayer. This idea about dispassion (apatheia, apathy, E. l. t.’s n.) or about mortification, Palamas summarizes it once more, by concluding: “ It is clear to everybody that we haven’t been commanded to crucify our body with its passions and desires, in order to kill ourselves, by mortifying the whole body’s work with and the soul’s power; but, by detaching ourselves from dirty lusts and deeds, and by running away from them without looking back, to become men of the Ghost’s lusts, as Daniel says, by living and by moving ourselves within them with a firm thought and by always advancing with manhood, as Lot, who left Sodom.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 51)

“The passions are forms of the egotism, of the human being’s locking up into himself, of the reducing of the human body, more or less, to the body only. Searching for the body’s pleasures, it increases the egotism in the soul, weakening the soul in what the soul has as characteristic: the stretching towards God and towards the fellow humans, through body, namely the openness to the spiritual light. The passions intensify the exclusive and blind sensitiveness of the body, and they cover the luminous reality of the spirit, and the passions impede the real sight of the spirit within man. The passions hide the dimension of the spirit deepened into God’s light, and the deep and virtually all-comprising mystery, a mystery which the man is, together with God. The restraining from passions it diminishes the narrow and dark egotism, and it unveils the ever-deeper and more luminous reality of the spirit and, by that, it allows the spirit to understand his own mystery, and the mystery of the material universe, and of God Who stays at the foundation of his and of all things, and out of Whom is being nourished the continuously growing life of the human being’s spirit. The fear of bodily pains it leads to acts of cowardice, and to exaggerate, through imagination, some unpleasant situations, it can lead up to deliriant states, close to madness. The fear narrows the spiritual sight and it weakens the rationality, and it increases the panic and the disorder in the human beings’ thinking and deeds. Both by exaggeratingly searching for pleasures, be it even about pride's pleasures, and by exaggeratingly fearing the pain, the human being proves that he has allowed his blinded body to occupy the main position in his preoccupations. By this, the human being loses his self-control, due to the weakness brought by passions to his spirit, namely to the human being's will, also due to his spiritual sight's darkening and due to the darkening of his right judgment." (Stăniloae 1995: 95-96)

"It is so unpleasant to the human being to get rid of passions and it is so difficult to the spiritual laziness to stay strained into a constant effort of living according the will of God, and towards the good of the others. The will itself tires under the burden of the inertia and of the egotistic passions of the man." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The passions are the lowest level the human being can descend to. Both their Greek name – πάθη – and the Latin name – passiones, and also the Romanian patimi, they all show that the man is brought by passions to a state of passivity, of slavery. Actually, the passions overwhelm the man's will, so that the passions' man is no longer a will's man, but they say about him that he is "mastered", "enslaved", "carries away" by passions." (Stăniloae 1992: 55)

"Another characteristic of the passions is that in them is manifested a limitless thirst, searching for its quenching but not being able to find it. Blondel says that the passions represent the man's thirst for infinite, turned towards a direction which it cannot find its satisfaction in. This thing is said by Dostoyevsky too." (Stăniloae 1992: 55)

"What Nilus the Ascetic says about stomach, that it becomes through covetousness a sea that cannot be filled, it fits any passions." (Stăniloae 1992: 56)

"This always unsatisfied infinity is due both to the passion per se and to the objects which the passions try to satisfy themselves with. The objects searched for the passion they cannot satisfy the passions, for the objects are finite and, as such, they do not correspond to the limitless thirst of the passions. Or, as Saint Maximos the Confessor says, the man is in a continuous preoccupation with the nothing, because of trying to quench his infinite thirst with the nothing of his passions, since the objects which the passions swallow are being transformed in nothing, for being by their nature reducible to nothing. Actually, the passions, by its nature, it has to do only with objects and it searches for the objects only because these ones can be totally under the mastery of the self, namely at the self free will. But the objects are, by their nature, finite, both as sources of satisfaction and as duration, by easily passing into nonexistence, through consumption. Just when the passion needs the human person too, in order the passion to be satisfied, it reduces the human person too, to the character of an object, or it sees and it uses from the human person only the object side, missing the person's indefinite depths hidden in the person's side as individual." (Stăniloae 1992: 56)

"The infinite thirst of the passions in itself, it can be explained by the fact that the human being, by having a spiritual basis, it has a tendency towards infinite which is manifested in passions too; but in passions this tendency is turned from the authentic infinite which is or spiritual order, towards world, which only give the illusion of the infinite. Without being himself infinite, the man not that is capable of, but he is even thirsty for infinite, and just for that the man is capable and thirsty of God, the true and the only infinite (homo capax divini). The man is thirsty for and capable of infinite not in the sense that the man could be able to achieve the infinite, or to absorb the infinite in his being – because if that had been the case the man's being would have become infinite, or it would have been virtually infinite – but in the sense that he can and he must fuel himself spiritually from infinite and infinitely, by searching for and by being able to live in a communion with the infinite, in a participation to infinite. But the man didn't want to be content with the participation to infinite, but he wanted to become himself the center of the infinite, or he believed that he is such a center, letting himself to be deceived by his nature's thirst for infinite." (Stăniloae 1992: 56-57)

"By not understanding that the infinite thirst of his nature isn't an indication of this nature's infinity, for the true infinite has not thirst – but actually this thirst is a sign of his incapacity of communicating with the infinite which is characteristic to his nature – the human being, instead of being content to remain and to progress in the communication with the true infinite, he wanted to become himself the infinite, by trying to absorb in himself or to subordinate to himself everything that was appropriate to this relation of subordination to the human being, namely dead objects, or finite things. Instead of quenching his thirst of infinite – by searching the infinite as something different from him, due to his gravitational tendency towards a center whom to subordinate himself to – the man tried to gather all things around himself, as around a center. But by not being in himself a real center, this nature of his took revenge by making the man, in reality, to be actually the one to chase the material things, or even enslaving the man to the material things. This is because the passion, as relentless fleeing away after the world, instead of being an expression of the central sovereignty of our being, it is rather a force carrying us away without its will, it is the sing of our being's falling into a state of passiveness. Our nature, willy-nilly, it still must manifest its tendency towards a center from outside it. Through passions, this center has been moved from God to the world. Thus, the passions are the product of a tortuous impulse of the human nature, or of a human nature that has lost its simple and straight tendency; in it one meets two tendencies, or a tendency that cannot go to the end, but it turns against the human nature. The passion is a knot of contradictions. On one hand, the passion is the expression of egotism, by wanting to make all the things gravitating around itself; on the other hand, the passion denotes the world's transformation in an exclusive center of preoccupations. On one hand, the passion is a product of the will of egocentric sovereignty; on the other hand, the passion is a force lowering the man to the state of an object carried here and there without his will. On one hand, the passion searches for infinite; on the other hand, the passion gains the nothing." (Stăniloae 1992: 57)

"The spirit, by being infinite and capable of being filled up with infinite and by being thirsty for receiving the infinite in itself, instead of searching for the bond with the infinite spirit, he tries to fill himself up with finite and passing objects, not gaining anything and his thirst remaining unquenched." (Stăniloae 1992: 57-58)

"The passion is something irrational. Everything in the world is rational as Saint Maximos the Confessor said, because each thing has its basis in a divine rationality; only the passion is irrational. The supreme passion's irrationality it is shown in the fact that, though the passionate man realizes increasingly more that the finite things cannot correspond to his aspiration for infinite, and this ascertainment fills him up with boredom and discouragement, the man still let himself to be carried away, on the next moment, by his egocentric passion, as he would absorb the infinite through that passions, not realizing that the true infinite it is a free spirit that cannot be absorbed without that spirit's will, for it is a subject whom the man must enter the communion with, as freedom, with another freedom. For instance, the covetous knows that no food will even satisfy his greediness and the one who hates he feels that his fellow human whom he hates will never be able to satisfy his hatred's fire, even if that one will be totally consumed by it. Rational would be that neither the covetous nor the one who hates to let themselves tormented by these passions. But none of them does that, and they persist in their irrational torments." (Stăniloae 1992: 58)

"By their irrationality, by their deceiving character, by deviating the man from his true target, the passions keep the human being in a darkness of nescience. By fighting the passions, one aims to escape the human being of nescience, to turn the human being towards the true infinity of God, as target of his life, and to liberate his spirit from under the slavery of the world and from under the tyranny represented by passions. This is the meaning of the dispassion." (Stăniloae 1992: 58)

“In the old spiritual literature, the passions are reckoned as being eight in number, or, when the vain-glory is united with the pride, as being in number of seven. These are: the belly’s covetousness, the fornication, the love for money, the anger or the hatred, the sadness, the idleness, the vain glory, and the pride. They coincide, actually, to the seven capital sins: the covetousness, the licentiousness, the avarice, the anger, the envy, the laziness, and the pride, if we identify here the envy to the sadness.” (Stăniloae 1992: 58-59)

“Some of the passions belong to the body, others to the soul. But the tight unity between body and soul it makes the bodily passions to be intertwined with the soul’s passions or to reciprocally condition one another. The ascetic writers reckon that at the younger ones, the belly’s covetousness causes all the other passions. This is because of setting in movement the fornication’s lust and both these ones need money in order to be satisfied, and the one who sees himself deprived of the objects which satisfy these three passions he gets sad, like somebody would want to steal these from him, and so he gets angry. To the old ones the main passion is the pride. That’s why, the vain-glory and the pride can be a result of the greediness and of the wealth one has gathered. But the inverse case is possible too: due to his love for glory and due to his pride, the man searches for wealth in order to show his luxury for obtaining the people’s praises and in order to be haughty to others; or he gets sad and angry when not being enough honored.” (Stăniloae 1992: 59)

“Just because of this inter-conditioning of the bodily passions - started from the belly’s covetousness - with the soul’s passions - started from pride -, it determined the same spiritual writers who declared the belly’s covetousness the first passion, to declare then “the pride as the first calf of the devil”. This is because of the possibility that somebody to be proud without stuffing himself with foods, as there are enough ascetics proud about their asceticism. One could say that there is a twofold circuit leading from the belly’s covetousness to all the other passions - including the soul’s ones - and from pride again to almost all the other passions, including the bodily ones. The belly’s covetousness and the pride represent one and the same egocentric thirds of the man, in the twofold aspect of the man’s psychic-physical being. There is a tight inter-conditioning between biological and spiritual, one of these domains influencing the other one both in the falling and in the man’s restoration. Here we have a vast research field concerning the details of the interdependency between biological and spiritual.” (Stăniloae 1992: 59)

“Both the covetousness and the pride have their roots in the φιλαυτία = egotistic love for the self, as an autonomous and independent absolute. “It is clear, says Saint Maximos the Confessor, that the one who possesses the egotism he possesses all the passions” (Head about Love, III, 8; G.P. 90, 1020 B). And the egotism represents a breaking with God as a centre differing from myself, of my existence; and, for the man cannot exist by himself, no matter how much he would have this illusion, he gravitates towards the world.” (Stăniloae 1992: 59-60)

“So, the forgetfulness of God being the ultimate cause of the passions, the healing from passions must start from faith, namely from the man’s coming back to an as often as possible remembrance of God. By this, there will be put the first brake to the egotism, a fact that will manifest, actually, as restraint in a broad sense: the restraining of the bodily lusts and the restraint of the pride, through humbleness.” (Stăniloae 1992: 60)

“By subordinating the spirit of our being to the inferior impulses, but by not succeeding to totally reduce our spirit to silence, the passions cause a tearing apart and a disorder in our being and, by this, they cause a weakening of the being. But the passions do not have this effect only upon their subject, because of causing disorder in the relations too, which their subject has with his fellow humans. Often, the passion stretches from its subject towards someone else’s life. One’s greediness causes another’s greediness, as the last one’s defense against the first one’s greediness. Almost any passion attempts to reduce the fellow human to the inferior level of some objects. But those ones try to defend themselves, and out of this defense it is born a fight, which often is not limited only to the simple defense, but it goes at its turn up to treating the first one as an object. The egotism and the narrowing of the subject of the passions awaken, through defense and rebellion, the egotism, the narrowing, and the depravation of the others. The passions have as their victims not only their subject but also his fellow humans. The passion doesn’t manifest its effect of weakening, of desolation, and of disorder only within the passionate man, but also in his fellow humans. The passion strikes those ones too, and they often react in the same way. The fornicator uses other persons as objects of his pleasures, but by this he determines those ones to become fornicators and trying at their turn to use other persons too, as objects.” (Stăniloae 1992: 60)

“The pride one arises by imitation, or as reaction, the pride in other persons; and the relations of pride arose thus amongst persons, they are contrary to the normal relations in harmony; the human community it crumbles. Its members eat on each other as the reptiles do, said Saint Maximos the Confessor (Epistle II towards John Cubicula, G.P. 91, 396). All the passions are the opposite of the true love, the true love being the only one to reestablish the normal harmony amongst people.” (Stăniloae 1992: 60)

“The passions cause and maintain the chaos amongst people. That’s why Christ, by founding His Church, he aims through it the reestablishing of the human unity or togetherness. But such a restoration isn't possible without weakening the people's passions." (Stăniloae 1992: 60)

"A method for cleaning the passions is to restrain from passions – of the one who used to be the passions' prime subject in relations with his fellow humans – and the others to avoid answering him through their passions, by enduring and by persevering in loving the ones who behave towards him in a passionate manner. This shelters them not only from contamination with passions, but it also has a healing effect upon those ones who want to make them the victims of their passions, as it also stops the accentuated deterioration of the relations amongst the members of the human community. That's why Jesus commanded us not to answer evil to evil, but to love even our enemies. Saint Isaac the Syrian says: "Do not make difference between the worthy and unworthy, but consider all of them equally good, for in this way you will be able to attract the unworthy ones too, to good" (Word 23). Or: "Force yourself, when you meet your fellow human, to honor him above his measure. Kiss his hands and his feet, and keep his hands on your eyes, and praise him for the things he doesn't have". "By this, and through things like this, you attract them towards good". (Word 6). Unlike the love that bonds the people, the passions disintegrate the bonds amongst people. The passions are the ferment of the inward and interpersonal disorder. They are the thickened wall we place between us and God, the mist set on our nature's transparency to God." (Stăniloae 1992: 60-61)

"The possibility of the passions' birth is given by the existence of the natural affects. "The condemnable and contrary to nature passions, which depend on us – says Saint Maximos the Confessor – they do not have their source within us otherwise than in the movement of the affects conform to nature" (Quaest. Ad Thalass., q. 55; G.P. 90, 541)." (Stăniloae 1992: 61)

"In the interpretation given by Saint Maximos the Confessor to the two trees from Paradise, he indicates also the primordial and forever causes of the passions. Because the passion is in its being a turning of the man's infinite aspiration toward another target than the natural one, towards the world which narrows the man and it makes him egotist, and not towards God Who widens the man and makes him good, the question is: how it is possible the man to maintain himself in this wrong orientation, by swelling the affects above the necessary measure? When answering that the cause of the falling was the pride it isn't answered the question about the prime cause of the evil, for the pride is already an evil, a passion." (Stăniloae 1992: 66)

"Trying to penetrate this mysterious land which the first sinful movement of the human being was born in, and where this sinful movement has permanently its engine, Saint Maximos insists upon an influence of the satanic ghost, which threw a breeze of confusion in the man's mind. Under its temptation, the man had a short darkening of his intelligence, by forgetting what his true cause is, and therefore his target too, so that the man turned his desire towards the world. This short deceit has been eased by the attraction exercised by the beautiful forms and the sweet promises of the world upon the man's senses. The world was here, in the immediate closeness, with all its callings and promises; God was here too, but he was harder to be noticed and promising more spiritualized and farer joys. One must search for the first causes of the passions in the deceiving influence of the evil ghost and in the man's sensitiveness. A first weakening of the mind's understanding work caused, on the other side of the scales, an intensification of the senses. Better said, this attracted from the man all the necessary energy the man had to put it in activating his mind, in the sense of the transposition which we are talking about. Or the mind has put itself in the service of the senses, "it had mixed itself in feeling", by preoccupying itself with highlighting all the voluptuous aspects of the seen world, "accomplishing a composed and leading to perdition knowledge of the sensitive things, a producing of passion one" (Saint Maximos the Confessor, Quaest. Ad Thalas., G.P. 90, 255)." (Stăniloae 1992: 66-67)

"The mind has forgotten its own purpose, namely that of knowing the One Whom the mind is related to, and Who is at His turn persona Spirit able to fill up the mind's infinite longing for knowledge with His infinity, and the mind has entered in a foreign service, inferior to the mind, which cannot satisfy the mind's thirst for infinite." (Stăniloae 1992: 67)

"Three are the factors which cause the passions within man: a) the mind weakened in its autonomous and own work; b) the sensual perception which has become preponderant, and exited the mind's subordination, and it has even attracted the mind under its command; c) an exclusive and irrational rush for pleasure – until that provided by the fellow humans' praises – and concomitantly to it, a fearful running away from pain. These three causes are so much intertwined, so that in each one, are involved the other two either." (Stăniloae 1992: 67-68)

"The passions represent a quantitative and hierarchical preponderance of the senses upon the man's spirit. If the affects represent a sensitiveness kept under control by the spirit, the passions are an overflowing of the sensitiveness, over any measure. Thus, if the affects are a minimum of passiveness, but this necessary minimum is imposed by nature and it no longer depends on our will, the passions are an increase of passiveness over what is necessary, over what is imposed by the nature's necessities, namely beyond a non-mandatory concession of our will, meaning a slavery caused willingly." (Stăniloae 1992: 68)

“The affects are those ‘passions according to the nature’, for they serve to the nature’s preservation. The passions are contrary to nature, because they are not necessary to the nature, and because they even represent a damaging orientation of the nature and a toppling over of the hierarchy from within man.” (Stăniloae 1992: 68)

“The passions cause the nature’s disorder also by the tearing apart they bring it within nature. I mentioned the words of Saint Maximos the Confessor, that the mind, by putting its activity in the service of the senses, it accomplishes “a composed and leading to perdition knowledge of the sensitive things”. The feeling isn’t preoccupied with searching for the connections amongst the seen things’ rationalities, or even with looking at a thing in its unitary integrity, as fully framed in its own rationality; but the feeling limits its interest to a partial aspect, being attracted by the pleasure that aspect promises to it. The feeling doesn’t work in a broad horizon, but on each time, it sees only one aspect, forgetting about all the other aspects. The consequence is obvious. Thus, through the feeling led by pleasure the world is crumbled in countless aspects, without connection amongst them, each one tied too strongly only to the feeling which notices it momentarily. By this, the feeling contributes to disorganizing the world itself. The mind that serves the feeling it focuses at its turn on the diverse singular aspects, not being preoccupied with the connections amongst those aspects. Instead of seeing the unitary system of the rationalities crossing throughout the world, and instead on seeing through this system the One God, in order the mind to remain at its turn always, in a conscious manner, one and the same, the mind forgets on each moment what it has known before, crumbling itself in acts of knowledge without connection amongst them, because of receiving on each moment the template of a thing isolated from the other things. This is the scattering of the mind, out of which the so-called “guarding the mind” must escape the mind from, and which is recommended by the Christian asceticism.” (Stăniloae 1992: 69-70)

“The momentary exclusive and passionate focusing on a isolated aspect of the world, it makes the whole man’s being to focus on that in his greediness for tasting that thing; thus, the entire man’s nature crosses from instance to instant, through alternative passions: from anger to sadness; from disgust for people to avidly searching for their company, not being able to keep in a balance and in a temperance his diverse impulses. But this means tearing the nature apart; this is because instead of being always maintained in the equilibrium of its functions, the mind is let, one by one, as prey to the extremes contradicting amongst themselves because of their exaggerated exclusivism. The man is no longer a unitary being, the same on all his life’s moments. Forgetting about God it has a consequence forgetting about himself, as permanent unity of the own person. But the tearing apart stretches also on the plan of the inter-human relations. This is because of pursuing the pleasure and wanting to infinitely having access to the objects which provide us with the pleasure, we end up being in conflicts with the people or to stir up their envy.” (Stăniloae 1992: 70)

“Let’s see what is the mode like, which the passions are a distributed the passion on the mental faculties (understanding also the rationality and the heart or the ghost), on lust, and on anger, or what those ones are altered like, when God is ignored, or even when the certitude about God’s existence it weakens, or when he even is forgotten. We are mentioning here that this ignoring, or doubt, or forgetfulness, it is cause on one hand by the deceit of the evil ghost which, because of being a ghost spending his energy in self-preoccupation, he urges or influences our soul to be preoccupied with ourselves; on the other hand, this forgetfulness about God is cause to us by laziness, by a carelessness of the cogitation, which are influenced by an idleness of our body too.” (Stăniloae 1992: 75)

“Ignoring God, it has a moral character too (better said, an immoral one), so that the moral and the intellectual causes are intertwined. (...) The passions are, therefore, the effect and, at their turn, the cause of a mind deprived of the true understanding, of an irrationality and of a locking up of the ghost, or of the heart, or of the love.” (Stăniloae 1992: 75-76)

“If the passion, on the mind’s side, they indicate a minus of activity, an abdication of the mind from its role of leading, on the lust and anger side, the passions indicate a crossing over a measure, an overflowing over the nature’s normal margins. Even the idleness is tied to a pleasure. On the other hand, right this minus of the mind and of its effort and the plus of the lust and of the anger, it means a trespassing of the nature’s laws, not to mention their orientation towards wrong, narrowed objectives, incapable to answer the mind’s thirst for infinite, to put and to keep the “ghost”, or the “heart” in movement.” (Stăniloae 1992: 76)

“We ascertained that the second and the third causes of the passions are the preponderance of the senses’ work and of the preoccupations with the pleasure, concomitantly to avoiding the pain. But the soul’s power wanting the pleasure it is the lust, as the one getting upset when not having the pleasure or when the pleasure is taken away from it, or when the man is threatened and engulfed with pain, it is the anger. So, the lust and the anger are those which, by being attracted by the seen world and by its promises, they topple over the equilibrium between the mind’s work and the senses’ work, in the favor of the last ones. Through senses the mind can pursuit its preoccupations with the spiritual knowledge, but the lust can too pursuit its desires. The feeling, understood as pure perception of the senses, it is innocent in itself, and it can be enrolled in the mind’s service. Only when through it the lust works for pleasure, it becomes feeling in a sinful sense. A minimum of pleasure can remain in the feeling, as a natural. But this affect must be overwhelmed by the spiritual power of the knower mind. For instance, when we eat, if we are totally preoccupied with the tasting of the pleasure which that food provides us, this feeling is a sinful one for through it there works the lust. The mind has only a subordinate role or contriving all the possibilities which the food can provide us with. But when we eat, we restrain the feeling of the pleasure, by thinking at the food's purpose, at the benefaction which God gives us through food, at the duty we have to give others too, the necessary food, we will defeat the passion by bringing the feeling in the spiritual subordination to the mind." (Stăniloae 1992: 76)

"By making abstraction of the fact that the passions are due to a weakening of the mind too, we ascertain that six of the eight capital passions belong to the faculty of the lust: the belly's covetousness, the debauchery, the love for money, the laziness, the vain glory, and the pride." (Stăniloae 1992: 77)

"The passions are the product of combining the lust with the anger. But the role of the soul's faculties related to the passions it is more complex. The passions do not mean a total abdication from any rationality and exclusively working the lust and the anger. We have seen that Saint Maximos the Confessor found between affects and passions the difference that the first ones do not depend on us, and the last ones depend on us at least until they become enough strong." (Stăniloae 1992: 78)

"An irrational access of wrath is short. But the passion of the anger is prolonged by will and by arguments over the limit of that moment, thus becoming a long habituation, which the man no longer can easily get rid of, and which then can often burst off in accesses. The access of wrath is an emotion which can be rapidly satisfied. In passion, though, the reflex and the will it put that insatiable, infinite thirst, which they have turned it from the spiritual targets, characteristic to them, towards nothing." (Stăniloae 1992: 79)

"The passion of anger is much worse than the affect. While the affect is animal and imposed by the man's organic life, the passion is diabolic and no longer is an instinctual manifestation of the nature, but an always wanted and thought at, manifestation. What it is explained like the capacity of these affects to emotions or rebellious affects to attract our will, more or less unwillingly, on their side? This is explained by the fact that "in them there is an energy analogue to that of the will, and a so-called rational character". In voluptuousness, in ambitions, there is a complexity, an amplitude, an appearance of plenitude, ... this world of the human passions it is full at its turn with some seeds of rationality, but, just because of that, it is full of possibilities of abuse too" (Blondel, quoted work: 192)." (Stăniloae 1992: 79)

“The man brings the justification retroactively because of in reality the crossing of the passion to deed it has brought him a satisfaction, a pleasure. Its memory is imprinted with some sweetness – like the memory of committing the deed it is too. From here comes the content for committing that deed, its ratification by a later will, and justifying it through rationalities comprised in that satisfaction itself. The memory of that sweet satisfaction, together with the rational justifications of the deed that occasioned them, and with the ratification through will, they push to repeating the respective sinful deed. So is born and it grows the passion, by a continual contribution of the rationality and of the will. Behold how even what is bad and passionate within man, it is marked by a rational and voluntary character. Behold who, without the rationality to descend in lust and in anger, or in the feeling (the sensitive perceiving) led by them, there cannot be born and cannot grow up the passions. Thus, the passions are born through the contribution of all the soul’s faculties, through a wrong activity of theirs, indicating a sickness of the whole man.” (Stăniloae 1992: 81)

“The mode the passions are stirred up within us indicates the mode we can resist to their stirring up. We are specifying here that the mode of the passions’ stirring up is the same with the mode of passions’ birth. The difference consists only of the fact that the birth is harder than the stirring up, because of not existing yet the passion like a sleeping beast which only needs to be awakened. But there is inflammable material within us even before any passion, constituted of affects, and this helps in some measure to the birth of the passion, like the already existing passion helps its own stirring up.” (Stăniloae 1992: 83)

“Who hasn’t experimented yet that the passion is stirred up, sometimes, when we are in the middle of accomplishing a good decision, or after we have finished that, or when we are in a state of meditation or of soul’s resting without any perspective of making then any decision? In all cases the passion is stirred up as a resistance and a revolt of the overlooked tendencies. In the mentioned cases - and in others too - the passions have within us some antecedents.” (Stăniloae 1992: 83)

“The question is: what the passions is stirred up like in all cases? In all the Orthodox spiritual writings it is repeated, as mode of passions’ stirring up in any circumstance, the following scheme: satan throws within our mind a thought, the so-called attack, which we think we can translate it like bait. It is the first arising of the simple thought that we could do a certain sinful deed, presenting itself to the mind as a simple possibility. This thought is not a sin yet, for we haven’t adopted any attitude related to it. It seems to be outside us, it hasn’t been produced by us, and it has yet only a theoretical character, of non-serious eventuality, which seems even not seriously regarding us who are preoccupied with the whole our being with something else. We do not know where that thought has come from, and seemingly somebody has playfully thrown a flower on the side of the road which the preoccupation of our cogitation it is being unfolded on, and we only take a moment for looking at it and then we pass forwards. Therefore, this thought has all the characteristics of a thought thrown by somebody, and that's why the saints attribute it to satan. It is the simple thought at an eventual sinful deed, which hasn't depicted yet in our mind any concrete image of that deed and of the circumstances which it could be committed in. There are also cases which the passion is suddenly stirred up in, as a fire that lights us up immediately.

When it is stirred up only like a not-fiery thought, from this attack to the sinful deed there are several levels. Hesychios of Sinai counts up four levels: the attack, the accompanying, the consent, and the sensitive deed. Saint John Damascene counts up seven levels: "the attack, the accompanying, the struggle, the enslavement, the consent, and the doing. The decisive moment is that one which our cogitation takes attitude in. If we banish the sinful thought from the first moment, we will have escaped. If we start meditating upon the sinful thought, and to sweeten ourselves by thinking at the perspectives of the sin, there has been produced "the accompanying, the mixing of our thoughts with the thoughts of the cunning devils". Now we have stuck to the evil thought, and we have impropriated it, and it no longer stays within us as a foreign thought. By this, we have entered the sin's area and only with difficulty we will be able to stop this process's unfolding to its end, since this process has been triggered. Then follows the consent to the deed, or the composite plan of our thoughts and of the satan's thoughts, in order to do the deed. Only now the simple thought is being concretized in images. According to Saint John Damascene, through the accompanying of ours with that thought, it takes place as second phase the inward passions. The bait still isn't a sin, for it doesn't depend on us to take place, and no man is spared by it.

But let's see in more details what this simple thought of the sin, it occurs without images, into our mind and heart for?

Firstly, in what way it comes to us this thought from the devil in? Does it come directly, or still through something from within us? Saint Mark the Ascetic, who repeated in his writing About Baptism that this thought is thrown within us by satan, he said in the Head no. 140 of the Spiritual Law that this thought is "a borderless movement of the heart", and in the Head no. 179, that, though this movement, "the lusts call the mind to a certain passion" (The Romanian Philokalia, vol. I, p. 243; p. 246).

On the other hand, Diadochus of Photice says since Baptism satan is no longer in the deep of our soul, namely within our mind, but in "the body's senses", "working through the body's easily to be influenced nature, upon the ones who still are children in their soul". (...)

From here it results that satan sends us the bait through the mediation of the bodily lusts, by stirring up the movement of some lust that has been dormant within our subconscious. (...)

The bait is, therefore, the first occurrence in conscience of an evil desire. In the beginning the bait has not vehemence, and it presents itself as being a simple thought. Better said, the conscience notices the bait right from its first stirring up, and this first work of the bait in conscience it is being done under the form of a thought. Only if not choked by our assertive action, this movement gains intensity, so that we hardly could resist it.

Usually, this stage of stirring up of a lust – the first apparition of the bait within conscience – it is occasioned by looking at some external things. This circumstance gave birth to the idea that satan is nesting in the countenance of a thing and he sends directly a thought of sin in our cogitation, without using the stirring up of a subconscious lust, as means for that. Despite all these, it is not excluded in these cases too, that the lust from within us too it has been stirred up before looking at the external thing, and just that to have been placed in that thing the impression which we reckon as stirring up the lust. The coming of the bait, in the most cases, on this way, determined the Holy Fathers to recommend the closing up of the senses in times of temptations' rushing in.

But in some cases, the bait occurs within us without us to look at external things. In such cases it starts working the memory of a repeated sin. Anyway, though, both in the first cases and in the second cases, it is very reasonable to admit that the ultimate engine of the bait is a ghost differing from us, because, otherwise, what the memory of a passion is stirred up exactly in certain cases for, and what it is stirred up only in some moments of looking at external things for?" (Stăniloae 1992: 84-86)

"The Holy Fathers recommend a ceaseless restraining from all the passions. The restraining from the covetousness of the belly is the one that makes easier the restraining from all the other passions, by while restraining from one of them we mustn't neglect any of the them because they are a whole, like a dragon to which being cut one head off, it brings up others. The most subtle is the passion of the vain glory. It is there even when we think that we are liberated from passions. It grown right in the place where other passions have been cut off, by nourishing itself with their blood. It remains even on the edge of the humility and, by and large, on the edge of any other virtue." (Stăniloae 1992: 121)

"Fighting the passions, we gradually decrease them. Saint Maximos the Confessor established four levels of this progress: 1. Stopping the passions' manifestations in sinful deeds. Obtaining the impeccability with the deed it means dispassion; 2. Getting rid of the passionate thoughts brought in conscience by lusts. The victory upon these it brings us the second dispassion. While this one is missing, one cannot cross to deeds; 3. The third level consists of making our nature no longer moving towards passions. By this we are given the third dispassion; 4. The fourth level is the removal from our mind of all sensitive imaginings from everywhere. This leads us to the fourth dispassion. By no longer coming into our mind, the passions are no longer able to descend into our subconscious in order to move our lust towards passion.” (Stăniloae 1992: 121)

“The last dispassion isn’t our final ideal, but after it we must become able to receiving within us the icons of the things without these ones stirring up any passion within us. This happens when through things are transparent to us the godlike rationalities. Only after this our mind becomes united with God in a state above prayer (Saint Isaac the Syrian, Word XXXII).” (Stăniloae 1992: 121)

“Another external restraint recommended by the ascetic writings is that of closing up the senses towards the things from outside, especially in the beginning, until we haven’t become accustomed to overcome the passionate movements from within us, and especially during the moments we feel that such a movement is about to be stirred up. If then we do not pull the curtains over the senses’ windows, it won’t be possible to restrain some lust to get to the deed. Of course, after somebody has totally liberated himself of passions, that one can look at the things from outside and it is good to him to do that in order to receive divine rationality out of things. Only as long as he is inexperienced, as long as he is a child from spiritual point of view, he must avoid looking at things.” (Stăniloae 1992: 125)

Adoption

“This spiritualization means, in the same time, the liberation, or the power of the liberation from the enslaving passions and from a law of a nature which was leading to the definitive corruption of the body. But it also means the filial intimacy with the Father. The godlike Paul said too: “For you haven’t taken Ghost of slavery towards fear, but Ghost of adoption, into which we shout out: “Abba, Father!” (Rom. 8: 15). (...) Being spiritualized, we can see with our uncovered eyes the glory of the spiritualized Christ, namely we can see Him transparent in some people, or within Church, ourselves being transparent to Christ. “And the Lord is the Ghost. And where the Lord’s Ghost is, there is freedom. That’s why all of us, as that one said too, with the uncovered face (transparent, o. n.) mirroring the Lord’s face we are being transformed from glory to glory, as from the Lord’s Ghost.” (II Cor. 3: 14-18).” (Stăniloae 2006: 96)

“Through the faith in Christ we will reach the resurrection, as a non-narrowed life, in eternal happiness, as Christ reached as man. And this is for we will be shown, at our turn, as sons of the heavenly Father and brothers of Christ according to the grace. And the one who has been made son of the heavenly Father and brother of the resurrected Christ, he is no longer let to die definitively. That’s why Saint Apostle Paul said that the ones born through grace out of the resurrected Christ, at Baptism, he is elevated to the quality of the son of the heavenly Father, of course if he follows Christ. (...) After Christ’s resurrection and ascent, we’ve been asked to behave as sons, by fulfilling, with love, the will of Christ and by imitating Him, for we have received power and warmth in this from the Ghost of the Son. This is for the shouting out of the Ghost of the Son as Ghost of son from within our hearts, it places our hearts in the feeling of loving sons towards the Father, like the Christ is. Therefore, we are no longer servants, but we are sons.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 76-77)

“Before His coming into body, the Word of God didn’t unveil Himself to us fully as Son of God, neither He unveiled God fully as the Father. The Word of God was then appearing to us in His quality as Pedagogue towards God, namely like some kind of commanding Master. Namely, He didn’t show Himself to us in maximum spiritual closeness and communication, as Brother into humanity, making us too, together with Him, as sons of God-the Father. This was shown by the fact that He spoke, indirectly, through prophets. He didn’t give, so, either the “new commandment” of the love, for neither Him showed us that he loved us, by making Himself as our Brother (Jn. 13: 14). The light of Son of God, One from Trinity, it still didn’t shine with full clarity. It rather was seen through diverse images. Especially for the power of God was shown through the cloud covering the tent and which was going before the tent, thus showing the tent as full of the God’s glory (Exod. 40: 32-35). Through cloud, in the tent there was a certain presence of the power of the Word of God, by He didn’t reveal Himself clearly. A certain power of His presence in the cloud was also in the animal sacrifices brought within the tent, especially of the Passover lamb, but this presence of His through images it has become a clear presence of His, as Person, when He has embodied Himself as man. All those images were as a “promise” of the coming of the Son of God as Brother and as Savior of ours, in order to elevate us too, to the quality as sons of the heavenly Father.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 77-78)

“Christ shows Himself to us as luminous Light, and as the truest meaning of our existence, by making Himself, to us, as Brother, as path in order us to unite ourselves as much as possible with Him, as His brothers and as sons of the His Father, limitless and without a beginning. Now are clarified and proven as true, all the images from the Law, being shown to us, in the same time, the height promised to us through them. The man, created out of nothing, he is elevated to the height as son of God. In this it is shown the second mode of God’s almightiness. The man’s nothingness, on the other hand, it is compensated through the man’s quality as son of God, whom God makes Himself as Brother and Father. Actually, only this can be the truth. This is for if there is a God, namely a God of the love, as the highest mode of the existence – and in reality, He must be as an explanation of the existence – he cannot, if He wants to exist something else too, not to create that something out of nothing, and not to elevate it to union with Himself, in order there to be a unity in all things, without abolishing that something as creation.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 78)

“This level, which the created one is elevated on, it is that of being His son. Only to this supreme closeness we understand that the loving Creator wants to elevate the created one. Only made as son of the Father, the created knows his Father as uncreated and Creator at maximum, and the created can imitate his Creator in his life. And this knowledge and imitation cannot but to infinitely advance, given the infinity of the Father and the finitude of the nature of the created one. God didn’t create, out of love, a conscious creature, in order to keep it, out of despire, in an unpassable separation from Him.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 78-79)

“The created one wouldn’t have been made himself as son of the uncreated One, if the uncreated hadn’t had, on the other hand, a Son, and if this Son hadn’t been, in a way, a role-model of the created one, and if He hadn’t made Himself as Brother of the created one, namely if He hadn’t made Himself man.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 79)

“The Son of God makes Himself to us, as the clear and efficient path the which we must follow, towards being granted the quality as sons of God into Christ. Now he helps us to follow Him as Son made man through His Ghost of Son. Thus, we are introduced within the Trinitarian relations, namely we are made as inheritors of the things which the Son has from the Father. We are no longer dominated by the lusts stirred up by the so small things of the world (...), but we see the world as an environment transparent to God, and as means which we show through, our helping love, towards others.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 79)

“Like the nature is created in order to be freely used by the man, towards his and the nature’s glory, likewise the man is created towards God’s glory, namely in order not to be submitted to corruption and to death. But this freedom from the rigid laws of the matter, which bring death to body, the man can achieve it only through the Ghost of Christ, for God escaped, as God, His own humanity from death, giving His humanity back its freedom. But, until we are in the life on earth, we only hope for the freedom and for the salvation of our body, from death, and we still not have the power of fully being sons of God. Even more than that, the Ghost of Christ shout out, within us, towards the Father: “Abba, Father”. This shouting out of His, within us, it upholds, on one hand, the hope that we will really become sons, and on the other hand, the sigh of not fully having yet the power of the adoption and of the freedom, and that the Ghost, differing from our self, He upholds this hope withing us. We aren’t fully sons yet, and therefore we still don’t have the power of addressing ourselves to God as to the Father, though the Ghost expresses, when we pray, our desire too: “And the Ghost comes to help our weakness, for we do not know how we ought to pray, but Himself prays for us with untold sighs”.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 104-105)

“On Tabor is shown to us, plainly, the Himself Son of God, the One Who has taken a human face forever. We are shown the God’s supreme closeness to us. By this, the Father shows Himself too, as close to us.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 205)

“The Church’s light consists of the unity which the Son of God came to restore between people and God, according to the example and from the power of the Holy Trinity. Of this consists the glory received by the Son of God as man, from the Father, that, as he united Himself, as man, with the Father, likewise He to make the people too, as one with the Father, as His sons. The people who are in division they show the fact that they are no longer brothers into Christ and sons of the Father. They no longer have the glory as sons of the Father.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 214)

“The Revelation tells us that the man is created in the image of God, and the Salvation follows the Restoration of the man, “to be according to the image of His Son” (Ro: 8, 29), son of the Father, in the likeness of His Only Begotten Son. But the Holy Scripture does not comprise any speculation about the substance. It bases the adoption on the love that is established between God and the man. It is a love that comes from God. The love which founds this filial report, it is descended into the man by the Spirit of God. It is a love that comes from God. "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." They have taken "the Spirit of resurrection" (Rom 8: 14–15)⁵." (Stăniloae 1993)

"What the full Revelation has given us, as we have it in Jesus Christ? The salvation of the man from curse, the birth of the new man and the killing of the sinful former man, his adoption through God, as the Holy Scriptures tells us. It is everywhere about the man's accomplishing, which certain impediments were making it impossible through immanent powers. The previous analyzes, have briefly shown us in which direction it stays this fully accomplishing of the man, and which are the states opposite to it. Through the faith, it is born into man the subject of the communion with God and with the fellow humans; through the Christian faith the man is elevated from the natural state to the state of a subject, on this peak which the man is to. Only through the faith into the personal and full God, and through the faith based on the Revelation in Jesus Christ, the man restored is, and this restoration means a commitment of anyone into the struggle of his fellow human's restoration, by communion and by serving. Only through the faith in God as Person, especially in God Who really makes Himself - and for eternity - man, through the report created between us a God, by faith, we are granted a value, which in the same time it is being accomplished in us, and only through it too, we are compelled to see the same value and to accomplish it in each of our fellow human." (Stăniloae 1993)

"If the Son of God didn't make Himself man in the whole sense of the word, the man wouldn't have been able to be reconciled with God, because the path of the law accomplishment, which is in the same time the one started from the state of communion towards the communion accomplishing and towards the adoption, it couldn't have been initiated, or even less it could have been finished⁶." (Stăniloae 1993)

⁵ "But when the fullness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." (Gal. 4: 4-6).

⁶ Neither the descent of the Logos like another reality than the divine one, it wouldn't have been the revelation of God. "Als Verwandlung des Wortes in eine von Gott verschiedene Wirklichkeit könnte die Fleischwerdung des Wortes offenbar nicht Gottes Offenbarung sein, ebenso wenig wie wenn an Ohre Stelle eine unmittelbare Erscheinung der unsichtbaren Herrlichkeit Gottes Ereignis geworden wäre", K. BARTH, Die kirchliche Dogmatik, 1938, I. Band, II. Halbband, p. 43.

“From a certain time, the history, in fact, it cannot continue without the general adoption of the attitude which results from the light of the Embodiment, because the themes which derive from it are put so radically, so that one must adopt a pro or a contra attitude. From a certain time, the sword that Jesus has brought into world it starts dividing the mankind in the most irreducible way and this is not because it would be put directly and formally the problem of the adherence or of non-adherence to Jesus Christ, but because there cannot be avoided anymore the themes indicated by the embodiment of the Son of God.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“From the meanings the Father communicates to the Word, the Word communicated to the people too, or the Father Himself communicates those meanings, to the people through His Son and Word. This is for God makes the people too, as sons of His, showing them thus, His love. And the meaning communicated by the Father and by the Word, on the people’s level of understanding, they consist of the cherishing God grants to people, by doing this, by making them sons and by asking them to answer Him. Properly-said, the Father and the Son communicates, on Themselves, to the people, as people’s meanings, and the people notice those meanings with their special understanding and sensitiveness, noticing within those meaning the love of the Father and of the Son for them. The people find out those meanings, for they are sons of the Same Father and brothers amongst themselves, and brothers, by grace, to the Son. And this gives the people the greatest strengthening to existent. That’s why, the meanings God communicates us, they are, on one hand, on the extent of our understanding, and on the other hand, they have within them a depth exceeding any human understanding, asking us to eternally advancing in understanding those meanings and in feeling the love from the divine Persons and the strength towards existence that They communicate us through those meanings. In the future live we are going to receive those meanings in an untold abundance and in a higher intelligible degree, though will be even then, within those meanings, depths reserved to an ever-increasing understanding and feeling. The much higher level or degree which we are going to receive those meanings, it is going to mean a much more intimate penetration in the connection with the Person of the embodied Word, but without to be us confounded to Him, given the reserve of still not-understood meanings we are going to receive in this intimacy, and the fact that only His Person, as differing from us, He communicates us meanings, and He communicates us those meanings only for we are as distinct persons - given the fact that only a not-confounded person communicates with my not-confounded person. This is the supreme meaning for me.” (Stăniloae 1995: 113)

“The maximum love of God, for the human being, it is shown in the dialogue he enters and He remains forever, with any human being who wants that, through the Only Begotten Son Who has assumed the humanity. This is for the Son of God, by taking our humanity in his Hypostasis, he still is, a bearer of our humanity, the Son of the Father. And, by being Him in connection with us through the common human nature, He makes us together with Him as sons of the Father, and it depends only on us to actualize this quality which we are given with, or the love of God as Father, for us, and our love for Him as our Father. Thus, Jesus reconciled God with the people on a supreme level, on the level between Father and His sons, or between Brother and His brothers.” (Stăniloae 1995: 164)

“God’s dialogue with us doesn’t remain only a dialogue on the purpose of teaching us and of communicating us His commandments, or His laws, which He asks us to fulfill them with our powers, while He provides us some help in difficult situations which we come across in our relations with the nature and with the people. But, this dialogue, it becomes a dialogue of continuous communication of transforming power, of our maximum and eternal spiritual elevation in the communion with God. This is for the Son, by having in the Holy Ghost in His humanity, by that He will pass the Ghost to us too, if we want to receive Him through faith. This is the grace give us through Christ. And by placing us in relation as sons, with the Father, through the Ghost and through the Son, it unveils us the Trinity as a communion of love, and as springing out love towards us. And by this He unveils us the supreme truth, that give the existence a meaning. Thus, “out of His fullness we have taken grace upon grace. This is for the law was give us through Moses, and the grace and the truth have been given us through Jesus Christ” (Jn. 1: 16-17). In Christ, the human has been elevated on the highest level of life, through the union with God, a level which the human being is thirsty for, in his continuous impulse towards transcending.” (Stăniloae 1995: 164)

“The people cannot find the endless “life”, namely the “resting” from their meaningful or meaningless worries and doubts, except into the Father as inexhaustible and loving source of the whole “life”. Only the Father unites within Himself the source of the endless life with the source of the inexhaustible love. And we cannot reach within Him and we cannot be happy except in quality as His sons and daughters. And we cannot achieve this quality except in union with His Only Begotten Son, made man.” (Stăniloae 1995: 58)

Affects

“The godlike nature in its real existence in the Hypostasis of Christ, it communicates the dispassion to the human nature. At its turn, the human nature gives the bearer of godhead Hypostasis its affects or the human sufferings. But the godhead nature, in its real existence in Christ, it represents by its lack of sins, a filter, in which, the sinfulness those affects could be activated in, it is being melted down. Due to the fact that the human nature of Christ receives the dispassion from His godlike nature, the affects communicated from the human nature to the bearer of godhead Hypostasis, they are irreproachable.” (Stăniloae 2006: 40-41)

“It is necessary, though, to specify that the human nature assumed by God-the Word had in it, in movement, not only the natural will, being, though, the weakened nature consequently to the ancestral sin and therefore suffering of the irreproachable affects in a more accentuated manner than in the primordial state – and in this is being shown its unity with our nature –, the human nature’s will was staying under the pressure of the hunger, of the thirst, of the fear of death, like our nature stays too. That’s why His human will must fight against these affects, in order to remain itself according to His godlike will. Of course, God-the Word was strengthening His human will through His unique Hypostasis, in order the human will to want, and not in order to become insensitive to those affects, neither was diminishing those affects directly. The one who doesn’t want, he is no longer man. Or he isn’t a man as such. He is no longer a dignified partner to God, but he is an object in the hand of God. This fight is fought, in some measure, by the average people too.” (Stăniloae 2006: 41)

“Which are these affects conform to the nature and how occurred them within our nature? The affects are called by Saint Maximos the Confessor as passions (πάθη) too, because of representing at their turn a trait of passiveness of our nature. And we can say that they represent an even fuller passiveness than the passions which are opposite to nature. This is because to the birth and to the growing up o the last ones, our will contributed in some measure too, even if the passions totally dominate us after. In this sense, the passions depended on us to be born and to grow up and - in some extent - it depends on us to liberate ourselves from them. But the affects conform to nature do not depend at all on us. That’s why we have said that they manifest in an even more accentuated mode the passiveness of our nature. And because of that too, they totally depend on nature and by no means on will, not being, therefore, condemnable. Such affects are: the lust for food, the pleasure caused by food, the fear, and the sadness. Even more than that, these affects are necessary to our being, for helping to preserve it.” (Stăniloae 1992: 61)

“The affects, though, they didn’t belong to the original constitution of the nature, not being created in the same time with it. The affects penetrated the less rational part of the nature, accentuating its irrational traits, after the falling weakened the rationality, the spirit.” (Stăniloae 1992: 62)

“The affects represent, in other words, the aspect of animality of our nature, accentuated after the falling off the spiritual paradisiacal life, a life that was united with God. In this animal trait of theirs, it stays both their inferiority and their innocence. This is for, as the animals are innocent for their instinctual manifestations of their organism, likewise is the man, as long as these affects remain within their borders, serving the biological existence. But, by the fact that the man is spirit too, and therefore he has an irreducible aspiration towards infinite, he can associate this aspiration of his to the biological affects, transforming these affects in passions, namely in exaggerated affects, crossed through by an infinite thirst to be satisfied. Out of animal traits, they become diabolical traits, through the spiritual element.” (Stăniloae 1992: 62)

“We have said that the affects aren’t condemnable in themselves, conforming ourselves to an expression of Saint Maximos the Confessor. But we must specify that to man the affects never are in a state of total moral indifference, due to the spiritual reflection upon them, which, either it maintains them inside the margins which make them useful to the nature, or it pours in them infinite tendencies. Only if the affects are kept within these margins by the man’s will, they will be innocent. But when the affects deviate from this condition, towards a side or another, they become evil (passions), or good, according to how the man ties himself through them exclusively to the world, or inversely, on how the man tends towards God.” (Stăniloae 1992: 62)

“Like the affects can become passions, likewise they can become good impulses, accordingly to how the man’s thirst for infinite as spiritual being it is oriented towards world, or towards God. The affects become good also when maintained in their necessary biological function, namely within the margins necessary for preserving the body, through the thought of God. Of course, in such a case they aren’t equally good as in the case of being directed exclusively towards God. The asceticism mustn’t fight for abolishing them, but it neither just become disinterested in them, because of otherwise they easily can become passions; the asceticism must constantly supervise them, keeping them under control. By this the man is being strengthened in his spiritual side, disciplining himself on a daily basis, “God establishing in this way that the man to come to the awareness of his greatness of rational being” (Quaest. Ad Thalas., q. 1; G.P. 90, 269). The affects are a poison to the nature, but a poison that can heal us of the venomous bite of the evil one (ibid.)” (Stăniloae 1992: 62-63)

“Not being a part of the nature, by definition, the affects aren’t destined to cross, together with our nature, in the future life. There we are going to be “pure minds”, in the sense of subjects preoccupied only with understanding and with spiritual love, as the angels are. “This is for the affects which preserve the life here won’t be moved together with us in the immortal and eternal life” (Quaest. Ad Thalass., q. 55; G.P. 90, 541). We are going to be “pure minds” as we have been created too, the good understanding and the clean spiritual joy constituting the characteristic life of our being.” (Stăniloae 1992: 63)

“The proof that we are in essence pure understanding and spiritual live, it determined Saint Maximos the Confessor to consider that the bodily affectivity doesn’t belong to our being; on the other hand, the evidence of the impossibility of preserving our life on earth while we are chocking our affects, it determined him to necessarily connect the affects to the nature, in the nature’s existence on earth, finding the solution that the affects occurred after falling, but they aren’t condemnable. Namely, the bodily affectivity, connected to our present state, it is something inferior in report with our nature, but it still is something necessary in its present existence on earth.” (Stăniloae 1992: 63)

“This element of bodily affectivity growing out of the biological side, it isn’t condemnable and we mustn’t fight against it, for it constitutes the basis of our growth in the spiritual life. Saint Maximos the Confessor, in the assent of the entire Eastern cogitation, he isn’t an adversary to the biological life. The ascesis means, in the Eastern cogitation spirit’s, restraining and disciplining the biological, and it isn’t a fight for exterminating the biological. Even more, the ascesis means the “sublimation” of this element of bodily affection, and not its abolishment. The Christendom doesn’t save some part of the person’s being, but it saves the man in his wholeness. The power manifested in these affects it is attracted at its turn to serve the man in his ascension towards God. The affects can receive a spiritual trait and they can give an increased accent to our love for God. God starts to be seen through them too. The affects become transparent for God and for the mind searching for God.” (Stăniloae 1992: 63-64)

“Christ’s death is the abolishment of the affects, as consequences of the sins, within His humanity. And our attachment to Him it gives us too, power for, still in this life, to liberate ourselves, partially, from under the power of those affects, or it gives us the power for restraining ourselves from the sin often occasioned by those affects. The death is to Christ as man a victory upon death, and to us, through attachment to Him, the death is the beginning of the way of defeating our affects and of preparing ourselves for crossing through our bodily death, when it comes, to the happiness of an ever-tither closeness to God, with our soul and, at the end of this world, to the resurrection with the body.” (Stăniloae 1995: 190)

“Christ removed the affects from His humanity, by enduring them, manly, to the very end, the affects of pain, and by refusing, with the same strength, the affects of pleasure; He defeated the affects with the contribution of His humanity for that had, in its sinlessness, and in the fact that his humanity it belonged to the divine Hypostasis, the power of enduring ones and of refusing the others to the very end, exhausting their power through His power of enduring and of refusing.” (Stăniloae 1995: 191)

Alms

“Our dialogue with God for our deceased fellow human it is upheld not only by remembering him in prayers, but also by remembering him by doing good deeds, especially by giving alms, through which we intercalate others people too in this dialogue, by making them too, to remember the deceased one. And this remembrance of the deceased one done by us, by giving alms in his name, and by also being remembered by the beneficiaries of our alms, it is a dialogue not only between us and that one, but it is also an answer given to the appeal of the deceased one and, to God, for him. This enlarging of the dialogue it is accomplished also through prayers. This is for the relatives who remember the deceased one, they ask the priests and the others for doing remembering him too, in order as many people as possible to be attracted in this dialogue with the deceased one and with God for him.” (Stăniloae 1997: 224)

“By having the deceased ones in dialogical connection with us, when we ask other for remembering them and when we give alms for them, themselves ask God, through us, for this remembrance and they press upon us in order us to commit good deeds. Not only we commit deeds which they didn’t have time to do, or they weren’t in the disposition to do while they lived on earth, but somehow themselves participate to what we commit, through the pressure their waiting or their appeals exercise stimulated by the Holy Ghost, upon us.” (Stăniloae 1997: 224-225)

“Through giving alms gain not only the deceased ones, but the ones who give those alms on their behalf, and the ones who receive those alms.” (Stăniloae 1997: 225)

Angels

“The angels are essences at their turn.” (Stăniloae 2003: 164)

“Of course, there are created subjects who have as interval between them and God, or amongst them, only the interval of the duration, like the angels are.” (Stăniloae 2003: 206)

“The existence of the created but bodiless beings it shows, then, the possibility of a direct knowledge of the spiritual reality, the possibility of a direct communication between spirit and spirit. From here come two modes or two plan of revealing of God: one direct-spiritual, and one through sensitive forms. And for the spirit is on many levels, in consequence there is a multiplicity of levels of the spiritual creation. But for God is one, the Creation must be at its turn a unity, and the knowing spirits, incorporated or unincorporated, they must comprise the Creation in a solidary manner.” (2003: 438)

“The godlike Revelation tells us about a world of the bodiless spirits, a world that is solidary to the people and to the sensitive world.” (2003: 439)

“The Holy Fathers reckon that the angels were created before the creation of the sensitive world and of the man. This is the opinion of most of them. They even place the angelic world in some kind of supra-temporal eon, but which is not coeternal to God. This represents a way of life resembling to the one which the whole creation will be in, on the eschatological plan. But the sensitive world, at its turn, it advances through time.” (2003: 439)

“Because the angels have their mission to help the people understand the eternal reality of God, since the beginning of their existence, the angels must exist when the man appears. On the other hand, there mustn't be an interruption between the creation of the angels and the creation of the world, if the angels are created not only for their happiness but also for helping the people in knowing God through the sensitive symbols of the world, and to help the people also to master the sensitive world by spirit. Having their mission to help the man to come up and to raise also the world in eon, in the time overwhelmed by eternity, the angels are created in an ontological connection with the world. The bodiless spirits help the people to do this ascension both of the plan of the knowledge and regarding their ethical spiritual strengthening. On the other hand, the angels gain, at their turn, out of their connection with the people. The angels communicate to the people a not-sensitive experiencing of God, and the people communicate to the angels a sensitive experiencing of God, namely the revealing of God through the 'spiritual esthetic'.” (2003: 440-441)

“As long as God kept Himself at a distance from people, the knowledge about Him it was communicated to the people, mostly by angels. The people were receiving by angels, who are more accessible to the people, a certain firmness of the intuition of the absolute, an absolute still very spiritually far from them. That's why it is said in the New Testament that the Old Law was given through angels (Gal. 3: 19; Hebr. 2: 2; Acts: 7: 53). But when the Son of God takes human body, the Godhead reveals Himself, by living and by transfiguring the human things, in a manner that couldn't be experienced and understood by angels. That's why Saint Apostle Paul says that the angels find out from the Church the 'multi-diverse wisdom' of God, unveiled by Christ to the people (Eph. 3: 10)." (2003: 441)

"The angels know the divine spirituality through simple intuition, more or less intense, and they communicate that intuition to the people who catch it in symbols. But when the Son of God embodies Himself, Himself manifests His reality and His all-wise life, in multiple sensitive acts." (2003: 441)

"The existence of the angels as indefinite structures of the communication of the infinite depths of God, it is not only a highlighting of this depth of His, but it also means a difficult exam to the man of not letting himself be tempted to consider the world of the spirits as ultimate reality, as in the theosophical and in the anthroposophist doctrines. It is a sign of great subtlety, achieved by the human spirit's capacity of noticing, of distinguishing God Who communicates Himself through spirits, but He is not identical to them. It is a sign of great spiritual finesse, not to reckon the angels above Christ Who is God into body (Col. 1: 16)" (2003: 441-442)

"Also, on the purpose of transmitting a knowledge about God towards the people, the order or the orders of the spiritual beings must be in a number that exceeds our power on understanding, in order to communicate in indefinite modes of reflecting, of participating, and of understanding, their knowledge concerning the supreme existence, and in order they to these modes to the people too, like the people communicate theirs to the angels too. The volume and the variety of the knowledge it increases immeasurably more through this angelic-human catholicity." (2003: 442)

"The infinity of the angels it doesn't mean that they are countless, but it means the people are helpless in reaching the end in counting the angels." (2003: 443)

"A creation comprising as conscious beings only the people, be they billions, it would be a poor creation, and a dialogue of God with them it would be quite monotonous, and the enrichment through that dialogue it would be quite poor." (2003: 443)

"If God wants to make Himself known in greater measure by all the created conscious beings, the connection between the bodiless spirits and people it must be of such a nature than they to form a sole creation and, through it, to be accomplished a sole common revelation of the unique God.” (2003: 443-444)

“The superiority the angels have, from a certain point of view, it doesn’t come in contradiction to their mission of being servants of the man, for his salvation. Often, the one who serves the smaller one, he is the greater one, especially when he proves, in his important mission he fulfills by doing that, his greatness. Differently the inferior ones serve somebody, and differently do it the superior ones. The superior ones serve in order to be imparted with the superiority of the superior ones, or due to a necessity to obey them, or due to a dependency implied by the minus of their existence. The superior ones serve due to the conscience of a responsibility, of a due to help the inferior ones, to make them partakers to their surplus of existence or of gift.” (2003: 445)

“The angel is only a servant, a servant of God and of the human being; whilst the man is also master (αρχων). Without any doubt, through the serving offered to the man, the angel too contributes to the man’s mastery upon nature. But the angel is master only for he serves the man. The man knows the angel in the intensity of his spiritual power to a degree superior to his natural power.” (2003: 447)

“Through angels is being strengthened the spiritual power of the human being upon nature, from a moral point of view, though the angels do not directly master upon nature.” (2003: 449)

“It is more difficult to answer the question how the angels know the pure material realities of our world. But maybe they too have a totally special “sensitiveness” for the rational structures of the material reality (for the “Wesensschau” of each reality), then to feel a pressure of these ones in their spirit. On the other hand, by knowing the people as subjects, they know in the people all the lived imprints of the world, imprints which have become and which have caused in the people contents and spiritual states. One can presuppose that the angels can enter a such an intimate communion with the people than they can see through the eyes of the people as they were their own eyes, and the angels can feel together with the people the joys and the pains caused by the sensitive world, like the people too can impropriate from the angels a more intelligible vision in their images and symbols.” (2003: 451)

“One can suppose also that the angels, as created spirits, they still have an intrinsic capacity for noticing and influencing the material world, without this capacity to equal the level of the human spirit rooted within body. Maybe in this sense some of the Byzantine Fathers and writers, they speak about a very thin body of the angels (...) In this way, but also by the godlike grace, they can know somehow even the material aspects of the things. Of course, the mode of this knowledge it remains, in the long run, impossible to be fully understood.” (2003: 451)

“The believer always realizes that God Himself, unveils Himself to the man, through the symbolic language, or through actual images. The symbolic language and the images referring to God, they have infinite meanings; and in discovering these meanings the people are helped on great measure by angels. This is for the angels reach with their understanding the endless meanings which are embodied in symbols. So that one can speak about assistance the angels provide the people in the revealing of God.” (2003: 452-453)

“Our knowledge is mediated by sensitive symbols. The angels help us to reach the profoundness of what is supra-sensitive (above-sensitiveness, t. n.) in symbols. By finding out about these symbols communicated to the people, the angels themselves find out something new about God, of better said the angels find out about new contents and modes of the divine revealing and kindness. They are able to better intuit the spiritual contents form the symbols they find out about, namely the profoundness of the symbols’ meanings. But on the other hand, the angels do not have the multiform sensitive experience in which, for the sake of the people, something of the divine content is intuited. Having, as embodied spirit, own experience of life, for God has impropriated these experiences in Christ, the believer understands the symbols’ meanings, but not in the whole their profoundness. The believer gives God the occasion to descend in the manifestation of His love on the man’s level. Thus, through this descent of God to the people and through what the people know, the angels find out new things about the love of God, but they bring a contribution to the understanding of the profoundness of this love. Without man, neither the angels could know, nor by and large could be known, of how great descent or of how great love God is capable of. Through his quality of sensitive being, only the man is capable to notice this kind sensitive and extreme of descent of God. The angels aren’t capable of internally receiving and living this ‘esthetic’ (sensitive) revealing of God. If they ‘see’ the sensitive form God reveals Himself to the people through, they see, in the first place, somehow the internal structure of those forms.” (2003: 455-456)

“The help the angels provide to the people, in order the people to understand the spiritual meanings of the sensitive forms God reveals Himself in - to the people -, it becomes increasingly less necessary to the people on the measure they progress in spiritual the noticing, namely on the measure of their progress towards the angelic state. But, on the measure these forms are overwhelmed by the divine spirituality, the angels become capable to notice those forms just by themselves.” (2003: 456)

“Even when it becomes supra-knowledge, the human knowledge of God it is occasioned by the sensitive symbols or it starts from them. We have an analogy to the knowledge of the human subjects amongst them. I sink myself in the contemplation of you, on the occasion of meeting his seen reality. Even Jesus, as embodied God, he is such an occasion, be it even in His most transfigured form. But the knowledge of the angels isn’t occasioned by seen symbols. The transfiguration of the symbols, though, the lightning of you through the seen reality of the fellow human, it is not accomplished only through my will, but through an act from Above. This act is from Go. But it is very verisimilar to be also from the angel - namely from a model angel of the known person and from a model angel of the person who knows, God elevates us in infinite. But not always the contemplation by us of a immaterial reality it sinks into infinite. In those cases, we can assume that is an angel who works. This is for, unlike God, the angel is a structured spiritual reality, noticeable as such, facilitating by this our noticing of the structured spiritual realities kindred with him. For how many times isn’t transparent, through the spiritual beauty of a human you, an intensified beauty, structured in the image of this you? Of course, the beauty if you it is intensified, in last analysis, by the projecting of the divine light upon him, but when this intensifying is too perishable, it is rather transparent as structured by the model angel.” (2003: 457-458)

“Regardless how structured a you or our own me would appear to us – or through him his angel -, this structure isn’t rigidly closed; but this structure opens us the access not only in the indefinite, but also in infinite. We realize in the moments of grace of contemplating a you, or of our own me, both the specific character, clearly structured of that you or of the own me, and also by his lack of border, by his sinking in an infinite from within beyond him, and by his infinite capacity of openness towards others. Thus, one can say that through me, or through you, it is contemplated the angel, and through the angel it is contemplated the divine infinite. Within man there is the angel, and within angel there is God. They are on a ladder, but the steps of the ladder are transparent.” (2003: 458)

“This possibility of interior communication of the angel with the embodied human spirit it shows again an ontological connection between the bodiless spirits and the embodied human spirits. The angels aren’t direct bearers of bodies, but they notice the embodied spiritual, they live the connection with the embodied spiritual, the feel in the embodied spirit something that isn’t only spirit, they feel the pressure of the embodied spirit, with the whole experience the life into body had gathered within him, as also the embodied spirit lives the presence of the not-embodied spirit.” (458-459)

“The clarity of seeing the spiritual content of some sensitive revelations of God, occasioned to the angels by the human spirit, it gives to the human spirit too, a power of more clearly noticing the content of these revelations and, by and large, a help in the contemplative and ethical surpassing of the sensitive domain, either being supra-natural Revelation of God, or being natural revealing of the spiritual meanings of the things. So we think that must be understood the explanations of the sensitive images of the revelation given by the angels to the believers.” (2003: 459)

“The man isn’t alone even when he seems to be completely alone. On the opposite, just when he gathers more, within himself, from the scattering of his attention towards all sorts of things or of previous memories, then he opens himself to some spiritual presences. When the man gathers himself more into prayer, his prayer is being warmed up by the prayer of a ghost, or of several bodiless ghosts, if the prayer is an internal opening towards the divine absolute.” (2003: 459)

“The Holy Scripture speaks also about a special connection between an angel and a human person. The angel who is tied in a special mode, by God, to a human person, he must be a special model to that person. The multitude of angels must correspond to the multitude of people. The ontological connection between the angels’ order and our order, it hasn’t only a general character, but it is specified also in interpersonal mode. Of course, like each human person develops himself spiritually, in connection with all his fellow humans, so it happens in the angelic world, by and large. Though, the spiritual content of the entire angelic world it is being communicated and it is influencing the spiritual content of the entire human world through the special connection between an individual-angelic concretizing and an individual-human one of these worlds, the angelic concretizing representing a personal form of spiritual model fitted to the temperament of a human personal concretizing.” (2003: 460)

“Not only us benefit from angels – for the angels make us the transparent symbols, the transfigured symbols, or for they guide us in organizing the sensitive elements so that the spiritual reality to gush out through them, but also the angels know through the descent of God to people and through the contemplative-artistic activity of the people, the divine reality in new forms, in beautiful shapes, in actions revealing more profoundly the sublime kindness and love of God towards the most modest of His conscious creatures. The angels didn’t know how great love for people God has, until the Son of God has embodied Himself, neither they knew the value of the man as creature of God, until Christ has ascended to heavens as man and God.” (2003: 460-461)

“By and large, the angels do not know the future, so that they didn’t know glory which the world has been destined to but after this has been revealed as promise of the Church. The angels do not know even the revealed thoughts of the people. But angels know ever since the creation, the people’s capacity of making the divine greatness transparent, and they activate one of their characteristic capacities, helping the man to the work of transfiguring the world. Upon the sensitive creation it is being worked from two sides, in order to make the world an amazingly beautiful transparence of the Godhead: from above the world, through angels, and from within the world, through us. In this it consists the ontological solidarity of the angels with the people and with the sensitive world, or the meaning of the words which describe the creation as a unitary act: ‘God made the heavens and the earth’. ” (2003: 461-462)

“Only together, the sensitive world, having the man as its crown, and the angel’s intelligible world, they are a full receptacle of the revealing of God, and of valuing this revealing. Only together, the angels and the people, they can arise a more complete doxology to God. So, we must understand that the angels are created, on one hand, in order to praise God, and on the other hand the angels are created to serve God in His solicitude for people, in order the angels to be the envoys of God to the people, in order to be His ‘heralds’ and, by this, in order to help to the people’s elevating to a common praising – done by people and angels - of God; and through this, the angels help to the people’s salvation. But this means also a capacity of the angels for guiding the people towards God. In the same time, by doing this, the angels themselves they increase their knowledge of God and their doxology, associating to them also the people’s ones. The angelic-human choir is greater than the simple human choir is and it is greater than the simple angelic choir is, taken individually. The angelic part and the human part of the choir they reciprocally complete and beautify each other. Each of the two parts gains, in the impulse of the doxology, from the other one.” (2003: 462)

“Some Holy Fathers highlighted the superiority of the angels upon people by the fact the angels are ‘pure minds’, not united with the body and with the effects resulting out of such a union. But others, as we have seen, they affirmed that the man is more in the image of God, for the man through the body, he is and he becomes a ‘master’ of the world, like God is, whilst the angels do not have this quality.” (2003: 462)

“The pure spirit, the angel, he has the clarity of thinking and an ‘amor intellectualis’ difficult to be imaged by our being. But until he was consolidated in good, the angel was too stalked by another form of egotism, not being connected though blood to other beings, who restrain this egotism. The angel was stalked by the unlimited egotism of the pride of knowledge and of existing by himself, of being free of body's worries." (2003: 463)

"Let not imagine that, if the man can bring to light indefinite aspects of the divine rationality of the cosmos, these indefinite aspects cannot be seen by the angel too, through his power of intellectual focusing. That's why sometimes are lit upon things, for the people, sparks which irradiates out of the angels, producing the so-called inspirations. These sparks are lit especially for the ones who contemplate the things with a mind that is not disturbed by passions. These sparks too, they lead the people to combinations of the sensitive things, to the harmonious combinations of colors, of sounds, of words, in order to reveal new meanings and beauties of theirs." (2003: 463)

"The main work of the angels it is not, properly-said, a direct work upon nature, but that one upon the human subjects in order to strengthen them and to sustain them in their action of spiritualization, of not-attaching to the material things, which reverberates upon bodies and, through bodies, upon the exterior world. As much more firm subjects through their own spirituality, the angels infuse force into the human subjects, in order to imprint the people's bodies with a spirituality that can be sensitively noticed. This is for the angels do not have only the mission of improving people's knowledge about God, but also of communicating the people a helping energy of spiritualization, for through this the people to be able to easily know God. In this sense the angels have been created in solidarity with the sensitive world. If in the sensitive revealing of God through man it is revealed the man's spirit too, one can say that in his revealing it is involved the firm upholding granted by angels to the human subject. In a human spiritualized body – not attached to the material things – one can also see something from the angels' spirituality." (2003: 464)

"If the angels do not work upon the cosmos, as the people do by using their body's limbs and the tools as prolongations of their limbs, one cannot deny a certain direct efficiency of the angels upon the cosmos's forces. If yes, it would mean to deny by this, by and large, the efficiency of the human spirit himself in forming the human body." (2003: 464)

"In what regards the angelic hierarchy, Dionysus the Areopagite sees nine angelic groups, places by three superimposed groups: Seraphim, Cherubs, Chairs; Dominions, Powers, Masteries; Principalities, Archangels, and Angels. All of them are in movement, passing through: purification, illumination, and consummation. When the lower group of each group is in the phase of purification, the middle group is in the phase of illumination, and the upper group is in the phase of consummation. After that, the upper groups pass again to a higher purification, the middle ones to a higher consummation and the lower groups pass to a higher illumination. But the lower groups are being helped in their ascension by the higher groups.” (2003: 465)

“The first group of each group, by becoming superior to the consummation it is in, for it sees its borders, it is purified of that consummation. This ascension is entirely ascension in the knowledge of God, and in the consummation through an increasingly greater participation to Him. The purification means some kind of apophatic renunciation to the knowledge a certain level has it, for ascending to an illumination and, consequently, to a higher consummation. This ascension is taking place in spiral around God, the angels coming increasingly closer to God.” (2003: 465)

“Of course, that the hierarchical repartition of the angels in the three triads, which ascend in a solidary manner representing the three stages, it must be considered only as symbolic expression of the fullness of fact that they are three in number, representing thus the perfection of the Trinity, and of a solidary ascension according to the complete order of the spiritual life. The patristic Christendom uses the symbols in order to express the advancing in Infinities of the spiritual order. The angelic world forms an extremely numerous congregation, which is not simply a juxtaposition, but a unity maintained through internal connections, unlike in case of the people, who form together the ‘mankind’ not only on the basis of some spiritual connections, but on the blood’s basis too. The iconography presents some of the angelic groups in a combination, or in tight groups. All the angelic groups are singing the praise to the Lord in a perfect harmony. Therefore, the angels know God together, and they communicate to one another the joy of the knowledge.” (2003: 467-468)

“Each one of the three angelic orders it is in the image of the Holy Trinity, and the extremes meet each other in the middle, in a perfect unity, also according to the unity of the Holy Trinity. And the three triads are united in the same way.” (2003: 468)

“The movement of the spiritual beings it is an ascension that will last eternally.” (2003: 468)

“There is a gradual developing of the spiritual world, which isn’t only a passive one, but it implies an own work too. On the other hand, by being consolidated into good and into the communion with God, the spiritual world is steadfast. It is a continuous ascending from step to step, from glory to glory.” (2003: 469)

“The creation of the world of the ghosts it has not only an indefinite luminous height, but also an indefinite tenebrous depth. The first one is formed by the good angels, whilst the second one is form by the evil angels.” (2003: 470)

“The Holy Scripture tells us that this world of evil ghosts was, at the beginning, a part of the world of the good angels, but because they rebelled, they have been cast off the heavens. These ghosts are at their turn in an indefinite number and they have a hierarchy. In front of them is satan.” (2003: 470)

“The cause of the angels’ falling is their decision to separate themselves from God but the motif of the falling it stays in pride. They wanted to be independent from God, to be just like God.” (2003: 476)

“The thirst for more life it is so tied to the being of the fallen angels than it never gets exhausted through their failures of satisfying themselves out of sources, which aren’t real sources of life. That’s why the devils are let by God eternally in existence, in order to eternally demonstrate the positive thirst placed in them by God and their eternal helplessness of being satisfied outside God. They are eternally renewing their ambition to be by themselves, and their envious hatred against the One Who is the Only One existing by Himself. It is this too a huge force of the positive will of being and of being increasingly more, but it is wrongly used. It is in them the deceit that they can be not only more, through their independence, but they also can be absolute. (Otherwise, it is in the logic of the pride that the proud one to tend to exist by himself, and therefore absolute). They want not to be more, but they want to reach the peak of the absolute existence. And they are given the possibility of eternally maintaining this tendency, of believing that, finally, they will reach this peak. They will eternally exist, but in the helplessness to reach the knowledge of the source of the existence and the impartation with it; they will last forever, but in an existence of the spiritual life. The fact that they have been given the eternity it contributes once more to their tireless deceit. And this deceit is explained and increased by the fact that God has hidden His greatness from their face, because of their spiritual getting far from Him, so that even His existence has become almost problematic to them.” (2003: 477-478)

“Genesis it represents the satan’s contribution to the man’s falling, through tempting the man not to obey the commandment of God. This work of tempting is relentlessly continued by satan (Acts 5: 3; 1 Cor. 7: 5; 10: 13; 1 Tess. 5: 5). Satan tempt even Jesus Christ (Mt. 4: 1; Mk. 1: 13; Lk. 4: 2). The masters of the spiritual life speak a lot about a fight of the evil ghosts against us. They use in this battle the methods of the same deceit they are mastered by. They direct the man’s thirst of deification on the same wrong path they are walking on, which ended in a failure. By doing this, they do not want God to become transparent through man, as man’s partner of infinite communion in love. Satan hates the apparition and the glory of God wherever it could be shown. By hating God, satan also hates the man as image of God and he wants the man not to have any connection with God, not to know God.” (2003: 478)

“Satan attracts the man, whenever he can, in an alliance against God. His struggle is against the man who wants to accomplish himself into God. And he puts the people whom he has gained for his position to fight their fellow humans who want to persist in accomplishing themselves in God. Satan fights even against the peace and the unity amongst people, for in the unity of these ones it is shown the unifier force of God, for the unity is actually accomplished in God, through ones’ humbleness towards the others, which is also humbleness towards God.” (2003: 478-479)

“Through his fight, satan attracts the people in the same platitude of the existence, in the same helplessness of seeing the existence’s infinite perspectives, in the same darkness, in the same fearsome minus of the existence, in the same violence of the passions which weaken the spirit and the capacity of seeing God. He tends to attract the people too, in the same ‘abyss’ of the void and on this purpose he urges the people to transgress all ‘the godlike laws in order to introduce the disorder into creation and in order to undermine the creation through this’.” (2003: 479)

“Whilst the angels fulfill their positive role, a role wanted by God, of helping the people to increase in existence, in consummation, and in that unity into God, and in really knowing his infinite greatness and love, the evil ghosts fulfill a contrary role in all these regards. Through the good angels God becomes transparent to us in His infinite depths and we stay in a dialogue with Himself; through the evil ghosts we are attracted in the platitude of an opaque existence, a meaningless existence, which ends in death. So that the existence of the demons it is actually, through its weakening, an active death, through which the inconsistency is spread all over thing which attach themselves to the devils, and so it becomes the existence of the people deceived by them: an existence in death, a violent existence of inconsistent nightmare of the helpless and tormented shadows, tied to the surface of the reality, stretching upon other this torment of the platitude of and of the helplessness. It is the death of the conscious loneliness, or the death through the conscious loneliness and helpless to accomplish the communion, but exhaling out of it the envy upon the ones who are in a certain communion and attracting them towards that death of the loneliness.” (2003: 480-481)

“Whilst the good angels are neigh to God, ordered on diverse stages of closeness to Him, but they are in the same time close to the people too – amongst whom the best ones enjoy a more accentuated noticing of the angels -, the evil ghosts are far from God, but they are close to the people and they have a strong influence upon the evil people. The evil ghosts are noticed not only by some of the evil people, but also by the spiritually progressed people. In the human passions and in the passionate relations of the ones who are mastered by the evil ghosts, there lurks as in a hot and pestilential mud these ghosts, who are within them impulses related to these passions, like the good angels have clean movements related to the virtues and to the clean and high thoughts of the good people. Whilst the good angels can steadfastly anchor within the restrained bodies, but especially within the good souls and in the clean minds, the evil ghosts are in the most deeply anchored in the bodies haunted by passionate impulses, in their inferior parts, but also in the minds plotting cunning thoughts. Their incorporations are more obvious because of they are closer to the world, to the people, because of the people mastered by them are more numerous, because of their role is actually to get mastery upon people, whilst the role of the good angels it is to liberate the people, to help the people to really be themselves, outside any pride. The presence of the evil ghosts in the mastered ones it is shown also in their dark, wry faces, in their unstoppable laughing, in uncontrolled, obscene words, in reckless deeds. (2003: 481-482)

“Because of the tight mastery the evil ghosts lay it on the passionate ones, we speak also about some sort of possession of the passionate ones by demons, and about some sort of incorporations, about their apparitions. This closeness makes the passions produced and sustained by the evil ghosts in some people to become the evil ghosts’ their own. On the other hand, because of the evil ghosts want to attract some people’s passions towards persons and things, the evil ghosts irradiate out of attractive appearances laid on the surface of those persons and things. Thus, we talk about evil ghosts present in water, in fire, in money, in beautiful things, and in persons of opposite gender.” (2003: 482)

“Saint Apostle Paul declares that the evil ghosts are spread into sky, namely around us, everywhere, that they master the darkness of this age, namely they stretch the darkness upon this life, opposing us not to cross to the light from beyond this life (Eph. 6: 12). These evil ghosts tie us to the surface of the things, as the ascetic writings say, by making this surface beautiful, but of a non-spiritual beauty, a non-transparent one, of presenting it as being the ultimate reality, not letting us to understand its meanings. The Savior calls the devil as ‘the master of this world’ (Jn. 12: 31; 14: 30; 16: 11). It is about this world seen in itself, in its opaque surface. This corruptible but attractive surface, it can be given by satan and it is what he promises to Christ (Mt. 4: 9).” (2003: 482)

“Being close to the people who have diverse passions and by sustaining those passions, the demons have in themselves something related to these passions. Saint John Cassian speaks about the eight ghosts of the eight passions (the ghost of the covetousness, the ghost of the fornication, the ghost of the love for money, the ghost of the pride, the ghost of the sadness, the ghost of the idleness, the ghost of the vainglory, the ghost of the pride). But they work in solidarity because of also the passions are chained to one another. Even the pride, which is the most spiritual passions, it is the product of tying to the surface of the world, a not-seeing of God as infinite support of the world. This seeing would take from the created spirit the occasion of being proud. The sadness comes without our will, almost unnoticed, for the lack of success in worldly things of bigger or smaller importance. It can reach to despair and suicide. The evil ghost comes close, firstly, like an ant, and then he grows up, slowly, and he finally becomes a lion. He makes some people mute because of sadness, and others deaf to the words of others. But this ghost works upon the body and upon the surrounding world, by producing attractions or damages in it, in order to sadden us, in order to anger us, in order to weaken our faith in God.” (2003: 483-484)

“The responsibility for the Church was intentional when the Savior has given the hierarchical character of His Church. Dionysus the Areopagite connected to hierarchy the spiritual progress of the Church’s members and he saw the Church’s purpose in sustaining this progress. Of course, this responsibility will be purposeless if there isn’t a gradation in the order of the things itself. There is primordially a hierarchy of the spiritual goods, and only for some people reach superior levels before others, they are responsible for helping the ones from the inferior levels to be elevated too. (...) The ones who have been elevated on the highest level of the spiritual goods they haven’t been elevated there by themselves, for if that had been the case anyone could have elevated himself by himself and there wouldn’t have been necessary a hierarchy and a connection between levels through the help the superior ones must grant to the inferior ones, and through the dependence of the inferior ones on the superior ones. That’s why, the ones who are on the highest level within Church they have been elevated there by angels, beings who are superior to us. This highlights the role of the angels who, so, are responsible for the people – their fellows into creatural-ness. The angels are, at their turn, ordered on the nine levels. The Cherubs are on the highest level, they being in the most intimate closeness to God, and they receive the light directly from Him, and they cannot pass on a higher level. This establishing of the highest level it implies an establishing of all the angelic levels in the sense that there no longer takes place the passing from an inferior one on a superior one, but all of them eternally advance in knowledge. To angels there is no longer about a falling of one of them beneath, neither of some of them getting before others, for there is no sin. They are consolidated in good.” (Stăniloae 1992: 45)

“Each level receives the deifying light through the superior level, and in this sense the angels need the superior levels. Otherwise, they are established forever on their levels. This may be their “resting”, though this resting doesn’t mean ceasing the eternal rejoicing for receiving the godlike light, of ceaselessly contemplating the infinite deeps of God. The angels are established in good, but they are progressing in it too. This means that the angels are “in an always noble resting” of their spirit, or in a circular movement exclusively around the divine Being, which our spirit will also reach to, in the future life. The believers, unlike the angels, they ascend from on a level on another and, because they have fallen into sin, this ascension means too, on one hand the gradual annulling of the sin’s consequences, and on the other hand, the consummation of the believers’ nature by as much as possible participating to God.” (Stăniloae 1992: 45)

“The good angels do not come from the sky and they do not take the soul in the hell kindred to this sky, but they come from heaven and they take the soul in paradise, which is not but the heaven of the saved and reached into God creature. Only the demons were thrown out of heavens (Lk. 10: 18; Apoc. 12: 7-11). The good angels are in the most intimate communion with Christ and they take the soul there: “But you have come closer to the Zion Mountain and to the stronghold of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to tens of thousands of glorifying angels and to the assembly of the ones who are first born in heavens, and to God the everybody’s Judge, to the ghosts of the consummate righteous ones” (Hebr. 12: 22-23). Numerous places from the Holy Scripture say that the angels are in heavens, or in the most intimate closeness to God. “Take heed not to despise one of these little ones, for I say to you: their angels, in heavens, they always see the face of God. (Mt. 18: 10). Or: “Even if ourselves, or an angel from heavens would herald you other Gospel, let him be anathema.” (Gal. 1: 8). “And I have seen and heard voice of many angels, around the throne” (Apoc. 5: 11). “And all the angels stood around the throne... and they feel down before the thrown and they worshipped God” (Apoc. 7: 11). And the ones who have accomplished on earth the commandments of Christ, after their death they will be like “the angels of God in heavens” (Mt. 22: 30).” (Stăniloae 1997: 198-199)

“The angels know these white clothes as irradiations of our purity and they accept us within their community, for they have too these white clothes, namely out of them too it irradiates the sincerity of the communion with us. And so, we are led by them.” (Stăniloae 1997: 200)

“The angels are both witnesses and defenders of the ones who have washed their clothes in the clean blood of the Lamb, cleaning thus the impulses of their blood towards sin, with His clean blood full of the impulse for the communion with us, with His blood dead to the sin or to the egotism, blood which they have been usefully imparted with (Apoc. 7: 14). The angels will bring those souls around the Lamb, wherever He will go, thinking with Him, feeling with Him, rejoicing with him, the ultimate source of the gentleness and of the sacrificial attitude (Apoc. 14: 4).” (Stăniloae 1997: 201)

“Not only the angels receive a role for definitively establishing the fate of a soul, but all the Saints do, in front with the Lord’s Mother, and also the Church from earth. The eternal fate of a human soul it depends of the heart of each improved creature. The Lord’s Mother, the martyrs, the saints are called in the songs of the burial to have mercy on the deceased one and to deliver him of the eternal toils or torments.” (Stăniloae 1997: 201)

“But this dogma expresses something more: the importance God grants it to the world and to the salvation. The world it is the product of God’s freedom, but it is not an arbitrary or accidental product. The world is connected to God’s eternity, but with a connection which God wants it freely. It is not thought by God against His own will. God is with the world in report of free but though eternal thinking and judgment. In the scheme of this antinomy, of which living depths we cannot permeate, are saved both the dignity of the divine’s liberty and of the changelessness, and also the dignity and the importance of the world. Both of them are lived by the faith and about both of them are noticed by the theological cogitation. The same things are to be told about the report of God with the salvation of the world. God is free towards the world, but He still is unchangeable, and the world is tied on His eternity. The salvation appears like a profoundly serious work, not only for God has committed Himself in it, but also for it constitutes His preoccupation and His eternal plan. Even more than the creation, the commitment of God, from eternity, to saving the world and even through the embodiment and the crucifixion of His Son, it unveils us His endless love for world. The measure of the mystery “hidden from eternity and unknown by angels” it consists of the measure of God’s love for the world. Not even the angels would have imagined that in the bosom of God, it hides since eternity, braided with His being, such a great love towards the world. The showing of this love it is in the same time the unveiling of an unbelievable value of the world. Nobody, before the embodiment of the Son of God, was capable to give so much importance to the world, and especially to the man. The full revelation of God, into embodiment, it is in the same time the full unveiling of the most astonishing value of the man. The embodiment of the Son of God, out of love towards man, it stays in connection with the way which God Himself exists in. What He wants freely since eternity it is something according to His form of life. The embodiment didn’t take place against His will, but neither was like an arbitrary invention. This reason of the embodiment, placed into divine existence itself, it cannot be but the Trinitarian form of communion of the divine existence. The Creation is neither a Trinity's prolongation, nor it is the Salvation. So, they don't have a character of necessity. The Trinity does not need the world and the world's salvation, for His own completion and happiness, this meaning the widening of the communion. If that had been the case, the people must have been equals to the divine Persons. The Creation was accomplished through a jump outside the natural course of divine life. The Salvation stays in connection with this jump. Consequently, they are products of will, exclusively of the divine will. But it is not less true, that the Creation and the Salvation have the reason which indicated them, in the internal life of God. They are not asked by the internal life of God, but they are shown like possibilities according to it. Here we must stop: the origin of the Creation and of the Salvation it is at the point where the indication of the being and the decision of the divine will, they meet with one another. This is the general truth which is comprised by the mystery of eternal decision regarding the Creation and the Salvation, a mystery that we cannot understand with our thickened mind, with its stiffened notions, it cannot express but by combining unilateral formulas, extreme formulas, which appear to stand in contradiction" (Stăniloae 1993)

"The salvation of people cannot be accomplished without to be crushed the power of the evil spirit. "(1 Jn. 3: 8) He that committeth sin is of the devil; for the devil sinneth from the beginning. On this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil". Jesus answers the seventy disciples, when they announce Him that even the demons obey them, in His name: "(Lk. 10: 18) And He said unto them, I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven". Another time He brings in close connection His passion, the glorification of the Father, and the victory upon the Satan: "(Jn. 12: 27- 33) Now is my soul troubled; and what shall I say? Father, save Me from this hour: but for this cause came I unto this hour. Father, glorify thy name. Then came there a voice from heaven, saying, I have both glorified it, and I will glorify it again. The people therefore, that stood by, and heard it, said that it thundered: others said: An angel spoke to Him. Jesus answered and said: This voice came not because of Me, but for your sakes. Now is the judgment of this world: now shall the prince of this world be cast out. And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, I will draw all men unto me" and immediately follows the commentary of the Bible: "This He said, signifying what death He should die". (Stăniloae 1993)

"Jesus, of course, He has risen His body from grave. But we do not know if the resurrected body does not belong, to a structure and an order at which the current senses of our body cannot raise. In this case, the body of Jesus was not visible due to a compact nature similar to our one, but it was made visible through will in our plan, conforming to the perceptive capacity of the disciples, but, in the way that, in the same time, they to realize the different character of this body. He was having in a real way a body of which continuity with the earthly body it is certain and, in this real body, but of a renewed structure and belonging to a transparent plan, was based the possibility, that Jesus to make Himself visible when and where He wanted, not like an inconsistent appearance, like the theophanies and angelophanies, from the Old Testament, but with a real and steadfast body. The body of Jesus was capable to make itself invisible, but, if then its visibility in our plan it was its usual state, after resurrection the invisibility it is its usual state.” (Stăniloae 1993)

Apostles

“Christ didn’t choose a sole devotee person whom to confess Himself in His entirety, but He chose a group which, by unitarily receiving the same integral and authentic image of Christ’s Person and work, to be able to unitarily convey it to the descendants, and those ones to their descendants.” (Stăniloae 2006: 121)

“If Christ had a sole disciple, that one wouldn’t be able to receive the whole profoundness and richness of Christ’s person, of His teaching and deeds, and a sole disciple wouldn’t have been able to memorize all and he wouldn’t have given an objective guarantee to the listeners concerning the preached truth. And not a person from amongst the disciple would have been able to keep under control the integral and authentic conveying of the Christ’s image and work by the other disciples, but this control was exercised by the recalling about Christ Himself Who imprinted Himself in a prolonged time in their being, and this control was verified by the Apostles themselves through the communion amongst all of them. The twelve must be equals, for the unity of their preaching not to be crooked by the authority of only one of them.” (Stăniloae 2006: 121)

“That’s why in the New Testament the Apostles are together names the “foundation” of the Church (Ephes. 2: 20), but a foundation based on the ultimate foundation Who is Christ. Saint Apostle Paul said that the Church is “built up on the foundation of the Apostles and of the prophets, the corner stone being Christ” (Ephes. 2: 20). Christ, as cornerstone, He united the Apostles, or better said, He united their faith with the teaching about Him in a unitary foundation, in the foundation of His Person profoundly imprinted in the Apostles’ being, which the Church can be built on, until the end of time, as a unitary and always the same spiritual building. The Church is the stronghold whose wall has “twelve foundation stones and within them there are twelve names, of the twelve ones and of the Lamb” (Apoc. 21: 14); the Apostles are “the pillars” of the Church (Gal. 2: 9). But the Lord Himself is the ultimate “foundation”, which cannot be replaced by another (I Cor. 3: 11; Ephes. 2: 20). The Lord is “the One Who upholds everything; for the corner stone uphold both the Church’s walls and the foundations... and the roof and the walls and anything else; everything is upheld by Him”. (Stăniloae 2006: 121-122)

“The Apostles as “foundation” they do not render Christ superfluous as foundation, neither Christ renders the Apostles as superfluous as superimposed foundation, for the Apostles as superimposed foundation they are transparent to Christ as ultimate foundation, or Christ only through Apostles He laid down a true foundation to the Church. The Apostles unitarily indicate to Christ, they indicate Him as the cornerstone; but if Christ addressed Himself to a changing multitude, and He didn’t make out of the Apostles’ group a steady foundation, the Church couldn’t come to existence and it couldn't continue. Thus, the Church is apostolic, for through Apostles the Church knows Christ, fully and authentically, and from Apostles the Church has inherited the faith in Christ and the certitude of Christ's resurrection." (Stăniloae 2006: 122)

"Both the faith in Christ and the certitude of His resurrection, they have been maintained during the Church's historical existence, the Church maintaining itself through the apostolic succession of the episcopate in communion, or through the grace of the Holy Ghost the Apostles received on Pentecost and conveyed to the episcopate, and conveyed by this one to the priest and to the believers. That's why the Church continuously receives and has Christ Himself with all His gifts, within itself. It was necessary the Apostles themselves, and not other persons, to receive the Holy Ghost in the initial moment of the Church, namely to receive the Ghost of Christ, Who to remain within Church. This was necessary in order the Apostles to see that the enlightenment the Ghost brought them concerning the Christ's Person and work, and the power the Ghost instilled to the Apostles, in order to bear witness about Christ, and that enlightenment and witness refer to that Christ they knew, and so this Ghost was the Christ's Ghost Himself, sent by Christ Himself. Through the grace of the Holy Ghost that the Apostles received at the beginning, they were able to maintain and to communicate, generally to the Church and especially to the bishops the faith in Christ and the teaching about Him, integrally, in the same time with the grace of the connection with Christ as the One present within Church through the holy Ghost; and the bishops were able to maintain and to convey these ones, at their turn, uninterruptedly, to the successive generations from within Church." (Stăniloae 2006: 122)

"The Apostles are the first group of people who believer in the Christ's godhead, belief that was decisively strengthened within them by the fact they saw the resurrected Christ. Their faith, their witness concerning His Resurrection, it is the first foundation the Church has started to be built up on, and it continues to be built up on. If the faith and the witness of the Apostles had not existed, the Church couldn't have come to existence and it couldn't have lasted and grown up." (Stăniloae 2006: 122)

"Through Apostles we know Christ as he was, we know His teaching through which He interpreted Himself and he indicated the way of man's salvation and consummation. This teaching isn't separated from the Apostles' faith, but this teaching is the content or the basis of the Apostles' faith. On the other hand, their faith, which has been strengthened for the last time through Resurrection, it opened their eyes in order to understand Christ's Person and work and the whole content of His teaching. That's why they were able, after Resurrection, to see Christ's Person, His teaching and His work implied in the Scripture from before Christ's embodiment, therefore they were able to see the Person, the teaching, and the work of Jesus illuminating the whole Scripture, and to see Him, as illuminated by the Scripture; they were able to see Christ and His work of fulfiller of the salvation plan of God.” (Stăniloae 2006: 122)

“Christ Himself, after His Resurrection, He drew again the Apostles’ attention upon this hidden presence of His in the whole Scripture from before His Embodiment, and they were then able to understand this thing which they were unable to understand it before, though Jesus affirmed it also in the teaching He gave them before. It lacked the coronation of the salvation plan through the real Resurrection of Christ, in order to be seen the plan’s real meaning. “Then He spoke to them: These are the words I uttered towards you, while I was with you, for must be fulfilled all the thing written about Me in the law of Moses, in prophets and in psalms. Then He opened their eyes, in order they to understand the Scriptures. And He told them that it was written so and it was due Christ to suffer and to resurrect from dead, on the third day” (Lk. 24: 44-46).” (Stăniloae 2006: 122)

“Before Resurrection, the Apostles wouldn’t be able to write down the Gospels and they preaching wouldn’t have the amplitude of the vision that frames the whole Scripture of the Old Testament in the salvation’s plan in Christ, vision of which written form we have it especially in the Epistles of Saint Paul.” (Stăniloae 2006: 122)

“Jesus Himself reminds them that he indicated them often, before His Resurrection, how Moses and the prophets spoke about Him. And, actually, He often showed them how the Old Testament was being fulfilled in Him (Ex.: Lk. 4: 21). Jesus was the Same from His Resurrection, but because before His Resurrection His prophecy about His Resurrection wasn’t fulfilled yet, namely He didn’t appear in His glory yet, to the Apostles there still remained many things regarding Him, not only hidden but also not understood.” (Stăniloae 2006: 122)

“Regarding the vocabulary of the Gospels, this one wasn’t invented by Apostles, but it is the one that Christ used. Although, some forms of expressing the meaning of the Savior’s Person and work, comprised in the Apostles’ preaching and epistles, these forms belong to the Apostles, but these forms of expressing do not lack a certain connection and relating with the ones which Jesus used. Thus, the Apostles’ preaching and writing about Jesus have, on one hand, certain expression originality, so that is apostolic in a properly said manner, and on the other hand it is fully framed in the content and in the forms of the Christ’s speeches and of teaching towards them.” (Stăniloae 2006: 123)

“In any case, we know only through Apostles what Christ was teaching and how he taught. From the Apostles we have the framing of this teaching in the form and in the expressions of an explicit presentation, which has remained as the essence of the content of the teaching and of the spiritual connection of the Church with Christ. This presentation is normative for all the times, not only for it is the first exposition of the Christ’s deeds and of his teaching – and therefore it is the most authentic one –, but also for in its expression forms it organically grows out of the Savior’s expressions.” (Stăniloae 2006: 123)

“The Apostolic presentation of the Christ’s Person and work, namely the Apostolic formulation of Christ’s teaching and of the teaching about Christ, it remains the permanent and unchanged basis of the Church’s faith and teaching, for it is the most faithful rendering of this teaching, for the Apostles as true organs of the Revelation into Christ, in this presentation and in its forms of expression, they render their direct gaze in the godlike infinity of Christ’s Person and unique humanity of His, due to this fact. No other kind of expression during the Church’s history will be able to surpass the Apostolic rendering of this infinity and the Apostolic authentic seeing of it. All the next expressions will remain narrower, lacking the warmth, lacking the perspicacity and the richness in content, because of not having at their basis the intimate seeing of the Apostles into the Person of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 123)

“Another fact that raises the Apostles above all the believer generations which follow them, and it also makes them the foundation of the Church, it is that they were the first ones to receive the Holy Ghost at Pentecost and they received Him without any human mediation.” (Stăniloae 2006: 123)

“The Apostles received the Holy Ghost without any other human mediation, for they received the Ghost directly from the body of Christ that was fully spiritualized and ready for Ascent. And this happened to them for during the three years they stayed next to Jesus they reached a great spiritual union with Him, fact due to which, after Resurrection, in Christ’s first spiritualization, He conveys them the first instilling of the Holy Ghost (Jn. 20: 22).” (Stăniloae 2006: 123)

“By the power of the Holy Ghost received at Pentecost, which is in the same time the full dwelling of Christ within them and, since that, the full dwelling of the Ghost in the beginner Church, the Apostles became the first visible human mediators of the Holy Ghost, or of Christ Himself through the Holy Ghost. Through the Holy Ghost received by them, on one hand they are fully confirmed in the faith and in the understanding of the Christ’s Person and work, and on the other hand, they are baptized, being cleaned up of the ancestral sin, for the Holy Ghost dwells into Christ and for the Holy Ghost dwelled with all His actual and potential gifts and works, within the Apostles. Being the first ones to receive the Holy Ghost, namely without visible human mediation, the Apostles are confirmed in the quality of the non-transferable apostolate, a fact that means also the quality of first preachers and conveyors of the integral grace of the Holy Ghost. Thus, for the Apostles are the first one to receive the Christ within them, they become the first Christians, for the Same Christ is being received also by the Christians from after the Apostles. Although, by receiving also the mission of first upholders of the integral revelation and of the Christ's gifts and works, the Apostles received by this the power of conveying this special mission - of preaching about Christ and about His gifts and works - to a group of successors, to the bishops, for these ones at their turn to convey it to their successors. At their turn, all the bishops convey Christ, and His works received from Apostles, to the priests and through these ones, or independently from these ones, to the ones who believe." (Stăniloae 2006: 123)

"The Pentecost confirms the Apostles in a threefold quality: that of the non-transferable Apostolate; that of the Christians who convey, to the ones willing to accept it, the faith and the teaching about Christ, in general; and the one of the ones entrusted with the mission of conveying the responsibility of the preaching and of the communicating the Ghost of Christ to a group of special persons - namely the bishops - and through them, the savior grace, to all the believers." (Stăniloae 2006: 123)

"The three qualities compose a whole within Apostles. Only for they are the first to receive the Holy Ghost, namely in an unmediated manner from Christ Who was fully spiritualized in His body, they become the starting point of the apostolic succession, of the uninterrupted mission and responsibility of the episcopate for preaching the integral teaching about Christ and of communicating Christ Himself with His works in the whole Church. And only for they were the first Christians to receive Christ within them, through the Holy Ghost, so that they were the first limbs of the Church, the Apostles can convey Christ to the following generations within Church, and they can convey, in Apostolic succession, to the episcopate, the special mission and the gift of preaching of Christ within Church and of communicating Christ and His grace to the future Christians." (Stăniloae 2006: 123-124)

"As descendant in holding the plenitude of the apostolic grace, the bishops aren't equals in everything to the apostles. The apostles had something that it wasn't possible to be conveyed. This something only the twelve had it: the fact of being next to Him during the whole time the savior activity of Christ unfolded, and they were witnesses to this Christ known to them in an exact mode, and fully resurrected. Only those who were all the time next to Christ could bear witness regarding the fact that Christ resurrected or that the resurrected is Christ Himself, after they saw Him resurrected (Acts 1: 21-22). Being the disciples witnesses of Christ's resurrection and fully knowing Him and, as such, the foundation of the Church's faith (Eph. 2: 20) it was very important they to go everywhere and to give this witness and to communicate their knowledge about Him; and they went even several of them in some places, for upholding one's witness through the other one's witness. As such, the apostles weren't bishops settled down on a certain place, though they had the plenitude of the grace within them. Just in order to give steadfast shepherds to the churches they founded, who to extend the churches from diverse places and to maintain them, they ordained bishops on the account of those churches. By saying that the twelve apostles, as ones who stayed all the time next to Christ and who saw Him resurrected, we do not exclude that there were other important witnesses; but the last ones, even they stayed for a long time with Christ, they didn't stay with Him all the time, so that they didn't know Him fully (I Cor. 15: 6; Lk. 10: 1). That's why the whole faith in Christ it has its ultimate basis in apostles." (Stăniloae 1997: 104-105)

"We reckon that the Apostles, in their preaching, and the authors of the New Testament – and also the prophets and the writers of the Old Testament – they used, without any doubt, in order to express the divine Revelation, the notions and the literary forms of their times. But these words, notions, and literary forms, they experienced a transfiguration in the mode that they were combined in, in order to express a content above the natural contents." (Stăniloae 2005: 6)

"Christ didn't speak continuously, about Himself, to big multitudes of people. These multitudes were continuously changing to that they wouldn't have been capable of necessarily and surely memorize the content communicated to them. The multitudes wouldn't have been capable of memorizing the wholeness of the firm understanding concerning Christ's unique Person and work, but the multitudes would have remained with some sort of pieces which wouldn't have been possible to integrate in a unity. That's why Christ chose this small group of people whom He imprinted Himself in the authentic wholeness of His Person and work, in order to be memorized by them and conveyed not only generally and approximately to all the ones who will believe in the future, but also especially and exactly to some groups of Apostles' descendants, who to maintain the same integral and exact understanding of Christ's Persona and work over time." (Stăniloae 2006: 121)

"The way the faith comes within man it is through another man. And we do not speak only about the faith like a content, which it is taken for granted, but also like an act and like a power. The most wonderful thing it is the force which the certitude of faith is communicated with, from the man who has it to the one who saw him. He who is around of a man who confesses tensely or calmly, but firmly, his faith, he hardly can resist the urge to become a believer too. The certitude from another man it gives birth to the certitude within us. Does it come, this mysterious thing, from the trust that we have into another man? No, because the one who believes is, in other references, a man who detains a more modest place in our consideration and in the society's consideration, in comparison to much more spiritually endowed persons, and to whom we are more bonded. In an indescribable way, we are overwhelmed by the certainty that that person does not take out of his own powers the certitude of his faith, but there it is working the power of God a power that is above of any human being's powers. We know that the man, by himself, he cannot get out of doubt, and that he cannot grant certitude to himself. If we meet somebody, who has it, we have the certitude that we are looking at the shadow of God's hand in working. Paul the Apostle insisted over the fact that just because he was presenting in the front of his listeners with the countenance of a man having no power, or having no prestige, the word of God was working more powerfully through him. So, through the man who believes we have the certitude that we see God beyond him, and the One Who is working through him on us, in order to make us believing, it is again God. The other's faith is the environment, the path through which God conveys the faith to us. Of course, what is wonderful in this is not only the fact that God works, but also that He works just through man, that He speaks to us from a man. The key word used by the philosopher Karl Jaspers to show the quality of the concreteness of the thing to unveil to us, when we are able to receive it, the transcendence, it fits as well as possible especially the man of whose faith is the occasion which ignites within us the certitude about God." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The communication of the Revelation is made by "sending" the man to another man, but into the work of the "messenger", of the "apostle", there is God Himself with him. Jesus, sending his disciples to preaching, nigh to His Ascent to heavens, He promised that He will be with them to the end of time." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Who reaches a steadfast and hard like a rock faith, he can get rid of certain historical rules, but until there he must cross through them. Eloquent in this sense it is the fact that Jesus tells after He began His mission: "Who is My mother and who are My brothers?", "The ones who follow Me". But until then He also had a mother around whom He grew up. He asks the apostles for leaving their parents too. But until that moment He also had parents. They cannot get out, generally, from the historical reports with humans, but they have the duty to transmit the faith to others." (Stăniloae 1993)

“But we ascertain that the most important special element, of our faith, about what the prophets taught us, it is the certitude about God being in the full proximity to us, in the person of Jesus Christ, on Whom we have the certitude that He is God Himself. And, by following the history’s thread, we see that the apostles were the ones who had this certitude, and they have conveyed it to us, through the generations which preceded us.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The apostles have an identical meaning with the prophets, because they were the people who learned about God not through the mediation of ancient fellow humans, but they stood directly in front of Him, and they received directly from Him this certitude and the messages which they had to convey.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Unlike the prophets, however, the apostles experienced God not in His supra-historical transcendence, but in a historical man whom they knew God into, the One descended in a consummate vicinity of the world, and Who gave the apostles a more complete Revelation.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The apostles are those men that, in the presence of a Man Who they met, they experienced that He was the embodied God. They met a Man like never was met before in the whole history, Who created in them the certitude that He is God. This man did not seem to them, like everyone who receives the faith through another, like ordinary people do, or directly from God, like the prophets did, but He was Himself the source of the faith and He manifested the unshaken certitude that He is God. Moreover, not only He had this certitude, but it was born also in the ones who stood around Him. The apostles met in Him the ultimate reality, from which they didn’t feel the need to walk further in order to prop their being and their faith.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Jesus Christ, though, He was not to the apostles only a person who occasioned them the faith in God, but He was God himself. If the faith is the conscious certitude about the reality of God, being produced only by the encounter, in a certain way, with this reality, the reality of God won’t unveil itself in a deceptive way. If there hadn’t been the own reality of the Person of Jesus Christ, there would not have been experienced by the apostles, like being one with that Person, but only as caused by it, like in other cases it happens all the time.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Through what thing, the apostles sensed that Jesus is not only a man, like they all were, but He was in the same time, God? Through what the experience which they had in front of Jesus, different from the experience they had in relation with another people?” (Stăniloae 1993)

“God is a trans-subjective and absolute reality. Through His appearance like an exterior you He exposed without any doubt His trans-subjectivity, His reality different from me and, in the same time, He got out from the infinite abyss onto the plan accessible to us. He must show, though, His absoluteness too. Through embodiment, through the step onto the ontological plan accessible to us, like a you of the communion, God didn’t renounce to His infinity and absoluteness. This You Who welcomed the apostles from within Jesus Christ, was experienced by them, actually, like absolute, through the word, but also through His living and His deeds. That’s for, between the word and the acts of somebody, there is a tight correspondence. Through what experienced the apostle His word like absolute, like from an absolute Person?” (Stăniloae 1993)

“But, as in general, the faith in God, the one which a man receives it from his fellow human – eventually from the prophets –, he does not receive it entirely from that human being, but also from God, likewise the faith in Jesus Christ, which we receive it from our forerunners and, in the last analyze from the apostles, we receive it in the same time also from Jesus Christ through some direct presence of Him. God-Man, Who was the historical person of Jesus Christ, He is alive forever and ever through His ascension to heaven. The power of Jesus to raise us through word and deed it shows its absolute and godlike intensity, also by the fact that any word spoken or any deed done by somebody in His name, with faith, it awakes us with the same force like the word or the deed of Jesus Himself. In the word spoken by a human to you, like a confession into Christ, Jesus Himself reveals Himself to us, and He speaks to us like that sovereign You⁷. As He promised, Jesus is with those who preach Him, until the end of the ages.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The apostles were put in the state of preaching of Jesus Christ only after His ascension to heaven, namely after the fulfillment of all the acts that were revealing for His Godhead, producing into souls this certitude. They had personally needed this ultimate manifestation of His Godhead, but this was also a condition for the birth of faith into the listeners. Only after the man Jesus, Who lived on earth among people, in humbleness, and Who ended on cross, He ascended to heaven, at the world leadership, His Godhead imposed like the supreme certitude's fact. For that the Holy Ghost has been sent on earth and He works on the birth of faith only after the Lord's ascension to heavens. Between the evidence produced by Jesus through objective revelation, of His complete Godhead, and the subjective work of the Holy Ghost, there is a close connection, being a proof that the work of the Holy Ghost regarding its effects it goes parallel to the evidences, not against them." (Stăniloae 1993)

7 FR. GOGARTEN, w. c. p. 167.

"Thus, by the fact that God descended into history and lived among people, speaking the words to their hearing, and making in their sight the godlike deeds, the ones proven to us by people, through preaching and writing, we have the possibility to look ourselves and to convince ourselves, also in an unmediated mode, by His Godhead. The godlike Person of Jesus, is revealed from the narrations of the apostles like an independent reality in whole its majestic and conquering power." (Stăniloae 1993)

"What is experienced in front of a saint, is a pale analogy when compared to the experience which the Person of Jesus Christ occasioned to the apostles and, since then, too all the believers." (Stăniloae 1993)

"But, when saying that the dignity of a teacher and of a king of Jesus Christ it has its ultimate basis into His godhead, we do not forget that through embodiment, the Son of God has become a different teacher and king, like He was before. And this new form of His dignity of a prophet and of a king, it stays in contact with His humanity, like also His quality as hierarch. Of course, the Son of God was a teacher and a king of the mankind also before the embodiment, but, in the precise sense needed and related to the work of salvation; Christ has all of the three dignities only since the embodiment. The dignities have their reason in His godhead; Christ hasn't received them from outside. But they express the mission in the ministration which He embodied Himself for. He has received them like a duty from the Father and through them He does the work of salvation. Jesus is the Anointed One and the Apostle of God in all these three dignities." (Stăniloae 1993)

"But this idea has not a base, neither in the Holy Scripture nor in the Tradition of the Church. The apostles saw Jesus ascending with the body and so the people will see Him, coming on the clouds of heaven at the second arrival. Sergei Bulgakov admits that Jesus will dress Himself again in His body on the second arrival. But where had His body stayed, until then, if He would have left it?" (Stăniloae 1993)

"Thereby, the people didn't feel either His supreme closeness after His crucifixion. They could not support the simultaneous inrush of the whole closeness of Jesus and, through this one, of the Holy Ghost. The apostles must firstly accustom themselves, to the fact of the resurrection of Jesus Christ and they must be grinded within, for a while, by the amazing thought - and of an ethical overwhelming signification - that He is Himself the Son of God. He crucified Himself for the people. A certain belief, so a certain closeness to God, through Jesus Christ, it was also this whole closeness through the Holy Ghost they could receive, though, only after a time of getting used to less than that." (Stăniloae 1993)

"What has been changed through the ascent of Jesus, it is that starting since then, there doesn't stay on the supreme throne, where all of them are leaded and are sustained from, only the almighty God, Who judges people according to the inflexible norm of the justice and Who makes them feel His majestic power, but on that throne the Lamb has been elevated too, the One Who watches the world with the eyes of the One Who endured the death out of His love for world. Next to the almightiness which imposes through the majesty frightening and awakening the admiration, there stays to the right, so even on a more honored placed - but only because such is the will of the divine Almightyness - the loving tenderness, which penetrates inside the souls, in order to gain them through love. That is why Jesus says on the moment of His ascent: "(Mt. 28: 18) (...) The whole power it has been given to me in heaven and on earth." From the moment of the ascent and of the placing to the right of the Glory, a new regime was installed at the leading of the world, to say so. It has been invested with the whole power and with the whole authority, a new method of dealing with the people. That's why Jesus sends the apostles to teach and to baptize all the people of the world. He has the authority to do it and He will give them also the power. Though it will work though a new method, because it has been elevated on the godlike throne, Jesus, Who represents it, He will be the One Who has godlike authority and features, in any place and on every day with the ones who activate into His name (Mt. 28: 19-20). The consummate humanity, in the supreme closeness towards people, by transmitting through Himself the godlike power in the form which the people is not frightening by, this consummate humanity is raised on the throne of the divine authority. This event isn't important only to Christ, but to the entire humanity. The humanity staid before at distance, locked under the sin and under the divine anger, now the humanity is elevated on the God's throne, in order to work with His power, but with fraternal closeness and ardor for the salvation of the human subjects. God raises the man near to Himself, and He tells him: Save Your brothers, by yourself, but in order to do this you have at your disposition the whole My power. Better said, He makes His Own Son a true man, born on earth and twinned with the people in everything except the sin, and then, God places His Son, in this quality, on His right hand, in order to work with godlike power and with human intimacy, for the salvation of His brothers.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Bearing in mind that in Jesus Christ existed both the divine and the human will, but into a harmonious interweaving, and Jesus, by conveying the power of faith to the apostles and through them to the followers, He has conveyed His divine-human will itself, and this is the center of the faith of every man, but not because everyone is taken isolated; it is the nucleus of the will and of the churchly faith, on which it is connected the will of every member of the church. In this way, the Center of the Church, the Leader of the Church, Who has the initiative, is Jesus Christ, of Whose divine-human will prolongs like a central will of the Church in all the times and in every man for he is a member of the Church. Between Jesus and the Church, there is not a space like between two realities, Christ is not beyond the Church, but He is the life, the substance, the reason, the core of the Church, like the soul is the life of the body. Like in a consummate transparency, through the community of the Church we see Jesus Christ. The vast community of believers is not else but the mysterious body of the subject Jesus Christ. More than any other religious community, the Christian Church has God like its own subject Who leads to the propagation of the faith, due to the fact that He has embodied Himself, He has come close to the man into history and He has remained close after His resurrection too. The heaven where Jesus has ascended, it coincides to the intimate center of the Church.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“They speak into the theological and churchly circles, like on a well-known thing, about the dependence of the Scripture on the Church, because the ones who have recorded this part of the apostolic preaching in writing, they were members of the first churchly communities and these communities guaranteed through their testimony the provenance of the writings of the New Testament from persons with authority, from the churchly communities’ bosom, and the identity of the content from them to the apostolic preaching, warranty on the basis of which the Church constituted the canon of the holy writings. But this external aspect of the report of dependence, into which stays the Holy Scripture towards the Church, it doubles through the interior aspect, manifested into the fact that the intimate certitude about the godlike character of the Scripture and about the actuality of the Revelation from it, through the experience of the present living of God, it cannot be born and upheld but through the bosom of the Church's community of faith and prayer. The fact that also in the sectarian communities are born such certitudes, it does nothing anything else but to confirm the truth of the Church, the uninterrupted community from the time of the Apostles, which it could not be preserved without - in the bosom of the humanity - the conscience of the provenance and the godlike character of the Scripture. The sectarian communities reflect in their fragmentary existence, of a turbid mixture of the community spirit with the one individualistic and anti-traditionalistic vanity, in a distorted manner, the community of the Church, bearing witness for it." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Only in time, for different reasons, among which it is also the one of better preserving the exact form of some preaching, it was recorded a part of the words or of some apostles in writing. But a part of them have continued to be spoken by mouth and the one recorded in writing, not through the individual reading, they had to exercise their full power, but through the uttering with a loud voice, into the community." (Stăniloae 1993)

"But there is not about the oral preaching, invented at will and therefore being in a continuous change, but it is that of repeating of the same Revelation, namely of all that was spoken by Jesus Christ and by Apostles, who stayed around Him and who were inspired by the Holy Ghost to know then or later somewhat from the mystery of His will and being - and the repeating of the same preaching it is the Tradition. At the beginning, the Church had the entire Revelation in the form of Tradition. In time, a part of it was recorded in the text of the Holy Scripture, and later, the other part into the writings of the Holy Fathers, but this one in a mixture with interpretations which constitutes the churchly Tradition, unlike the godlike Tradition, which is a part of the Revelation." (Stăniloae 1993)

"These are the group of the chosen ones ("the clergy") for the exclusive role as preachers of the Revelation. They do not take from themselves this power of the fully awakened subjects to the responsibility of the preaching of the Revelation, neither other member of the Church give them this responsibility, because neither those ones have this responsibility. This responsibility cannot come but from the intensive depth of the Church, from its subject, Who is Jesus Christ. He must stay a lot of time around the ones who are in the state and in the role of the subjects of the churchly responsibility. From them the believers must receive the entire content of the Revelation like certitude of faith. The whole this preparation is crowned through ordination, which brings them the intensity of the Church, through the mediation of the subjects who live in full responsibility for the propagation of the faith and for the salvation of the people, the power to be also they in this role. Like this did Christ to the Apostles, and the Apostles did these things to the ones whom they called to the episcopate or to priesthood, and this is what has been done until today, within Church. In order to be priest or bishop, something special must come upon the man, from above, after a serious period of preparation. This something is the divine grace of the ordination. Into their responsibility it is incorporated the responsibility of the Church. The entire Church upholds them, so the Church works properly through them. That is why, in the cases when the conscience of these persons is not at the height of the responsibility which they were burdened with, the Church stays for them, it gives the works which a certain person does in the Church's name - in a direct way - force and efficacy. The Church is committed to cover with its powers the churchly words and works of a person whom the Church has placed through rule, in the role of the bearer of its responsibilities." (Stăniloae 1993)

Art

“The symbolical understanding of the world it is an anticipation of the future world, lightened by the glory of the godlike prototypes. These prototypes were seen in the primordial paradise, but they will be seen even clearer in the paradise from beyond. The art trying to become transparent to (to express, E. l. t.’s n.) the things’ prototypes, or the culminant beauty and the consummate form of the seen things, it is driven by such a nostalgia of the paradise.” (Stăniloae 2005: 114-115)

“There is within man, doubtlessly, the impulse to search for the world’s reason beyond the world, to transcend those visible, being driven also by theirs and by his own obvious insufficiency. And this impulse, this necessity to transcend the immediate things, we can call it a fundamental availability to faith, helped by the structure of the world and the existential structure of his being which is so bitterly being experienced, who cannot find satisfaction in the bounds, miseries, and powerlessness, neither in what the world gives him. This inclination towards faith is a part of the shadowed face of God, which has remained within man. It is common, to all human beings and it stays at the basis of all their endeavors of raising them by thinking, by art, and by ethical deed, so that we can tell that it is the aprioristic heart of everything that makes the man a being differing from animal. It cannot be pulled out of man, but only together with his humanity, by descending the man into animalism, together with his ceasing to watch upwards, towards wide horizons.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The person of an average man, through himself, no matter how much he has the feature to confirm us in existence, and to make us to grow up, we still feel him as limited in what he can give to us. On many occasions, we are turning back disappointed by the fact that we trusted him, as much as he is inferior under moral aspect. A human person in vicinity of whom, one experiences the presence of the holiness, he attracts the people with a force which nothing from the splendors or mightiness of nature or of ideas can attract us with, and he occasions us the feeling of a true mysterium tremendum. In front of purity and moral steadiness, mixed with a divine presence, which the saint appears us with, the man, aware of his sinfulness, he continuously experiences a shiver of metaphysical fear, yet this relation gives him the power to exceed himself. To the man who has experienced all kinds of nature’s mightiness, of art, of culture, but he has also had this contact with a saint, it is so obvious the feature of the saint to represent a much superior transcendence to all other objects and principles, so that he cannot explain the doubts of the others in this regard, but only through that that they haven’t passed through the whole range of the experiences.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“This pneumatological understanding of the Bible it cannot be forced by any human effort, and even much less through the exegetic art of a lonely individual”⁸.” (Stăniloae 1993)

⁸ W. c. p. 28. This pneumatological understanding of the Scripture it is considered as the only capable to know its reality, also by Ewald Burger (Der lebendige Christus, p. 195-207). Otherwise, the Scripture remains external letter, or means of awakening of some entirely subjective internal sentimental movements. Only the faith, which experiences the meeting with the living Christ also today like an objective reality, different from me, it notices the content of the Scripture, what the Scripture wants to tell to us, what the ones who wrote the Scripture experienced. Our belief, however, we have it from the preaching of the fellow human, who believes, from the community which we live into.

Ascesis

“One cannot reach the state of consummation and of mysterious union with God except through long efforts or asceticism, and the efforts not tending toward the coronation with that final moment of the asceticism, or towards the mysterious union with God, they seem to be as a purposeless thing.” (Stăniloae 1992: 7)

“The bond between asceticism and the mysterious union with God is even tighter than the one between road and target, for, even though the living of this union takes place at the final end of all the ascetic endeavors, its aurora starts in the soul from before, during those endeavors.” (Stăniloae 1992: 7)

“The Christian perfection requires a long string of endeavors in order it to be achieved. The Apostle Paul compares these endeavors to the bodily exercises which the athletes submitted themselves to, in order to become victorious in fights. Without using the term, Saint Apostle Paul used the icon of the old bodily exercises in order to characterize the Christian’s endeavors aiming to achieve the consummation. Clement the Alexandrine and Origen later introduced the terms of asceticism and ascetic. Gradually, these terms receive in East a monastic tint. The monasteries are called places of exercise, and the “ascetic” is the monk who strives for achieving the consummation by observing all these rules of restraint and or cleaning of passions. Origen gave the name as ascetics to the zealous Christians, who were exercising themselves in mortifying their passions in other enterprises in order to achieve their consummation.” (Stăniloae 1992: 7-8)

“In the current acceptance the word asceticism is associated to a negative meaning. The asceticism would be on all the line: temperance, restraint, and negative endeavor. This opinion is explained by the fact that the sinful tendencies of the nature, the habits leading to the nature’s death, they have reached to be regarded as the positive side of the life. Actually, the endeavor in asceticism, though seemingly negative, it confronts the negative element from within our nature, aiming, by permanently opposing the sin, to eliminate the sin.” (Stăniloae 1992: 9)

“The asceticism has a positive purpose. The asceticism aims to fortify the nature and to liberate the nature from the worm chewing it, from the worm that promotes the nature’s corruption. The asceticism plants the virtues instead of passions, the virtues supposing a truly strengthened nature. It is true that the final target of the asceticism it is to liberate the nature not only from the movement of the sinful lusts, but also from the ideas of the things which occur in the mind after the cleaning of passions. But this is only in order to gain independence from the created things, which enslaved the mind before, and in order to desire God even more.” (Stăniloae 1992: 9)

“It is true that the asceticism must prepare to God, on the ascetic efforts’ last stage, also a mind emptied of all the earthly preoccupations, namely a pure mind. But this “void” isn’t something totally negative. This is for no matter how much they speak about the passiveness of the human factor under the work of the godlike glory, they say nowhere that this passiveness of the mind it would equal to inertia, with a total minus. The mind’s “void”, offered to God, it positively represents a thirst exclusively towards Him⁹, after a long experience has convinced the human being about the corruption of all the passionate preoccupations and about the relativity of all the intellectual preoccupations oriented towards the created things, which, consequently, the human being has rejected from himself in order to receive God instead of those things¹⁰.” (Stăniloae 1992: 9-10)

“The resurrection with Christ it follows like a continuation of the mortification, or of the death, and not as changing direction. It is true that, in the union with Christ in death, His presence is not so visible to us; but this belongs to the fact that while we are gradually dying to the former man, Christ also dies with us; but His death is a humbling too, a hiding of His glory. Christ cannot be seen during our mortification stage, but he is present and we know He is. And founding our certitude regarding His presence within us on faith and not on seeing Him, it again proves the heroic character of the ascetic phase.” (Stăniloae 1992: 11)

“The fact that through asceticism one doesn’t aim only to clean himself of passions, but also to achieve the virtues, it shows that the asceticism isn’t something negative, but it is a strengthening of the nature. During the asceticism are suppressed, through long perseverance, the vicious habits, and are planted into nature virtuous habits. And one needs much tenacity in order to impede the old habits to occur again, and in order to consolidate the new good habits.” (Stăniloae 1992: 11)

“In this general characterization of the asceticism we owe to notice one of its formal aspects too. The asceticism follows a determined road, an order and a chaining of stages which cannot be disregarded, a precise discipline taking in account the laws of the normal development of the soul’s life, on one hand, and on the other hand it takes in account the faith’s principles. This struggle according to the law it means that its road is established according to a well-founded rationality. This fact shed a light also upon the final phase of the spiritual life.” (Stăniloae 1992: 11)

9 “We reckon that through this positive element of the supreme „thirst” for God, that “void” isn’t a disappearance of any creaturely element from the spirit and of any sentiment of creaturely, in order to be only with God, as Eckhart affirms, consistently with his pantheistic doctrine. (footnote 11, p. 9)

10 The mind’s crossing through the created things’ rationalities it hasn’t been vainly, for, even if it rejects now their present memory, he has gained, consequently to them, wisdom - an enhanced understanding - like the virtues have fortified the human being so that now he can be an environment which the work of the Ghost is being done through.

“We must point here that the Christian asceticism isn’t an artificial and unilateral technique, which to produce by itself the living of the mysterious unity with God. Such a false asceticism it has as consequence a false coronation which is characterized by the following signs: a) it doesn’t imply any moral condition, but it it’s a matter of temperament; b) the ecstasy is sought for itself, because of being the supreme goal; c) this kind of ecstasy is sterile, when not being degrading; the man doesn’t come out of it neither more educated nor a better man; d) this ecstasy seems like a “hand stretched in a void, out of which it doesn’t bring but nothingness”. (Stăniloae 1992: 12)

“A first cause of the erroneous conception about asceticism and about the asceticism’s culmination in the union with God, it is the wrong opinion that the man has in his possession all the means which can lead him on the supreme spiritual level, and it depends only on a certain training, a more or less ingenious one, in order to bring these means upfront.” (Stăniloae 1992: 12)

“The Christendom reckons that one cannot reach the unmediated seeing of God without the grace given him by God, and in order to receive this gift it is necessary a moral perfecting of the entire human being through the ceaseless godlike help and there isn’t enough a human training in order to awaken who know what asleep force of our nature. In Christendom, God hasn’t a nature resembling to an object, which we can conquer through a human incursion guided by well-prepared tactics; God is a Person and as such, without an initiative of His, He cannot be known. And we must sincerely become worthy of this Self-unveiling of God in a mysterious seeing, and clean, and good. For He is above any offensive that uses force and cunningness. So, the Christians asceticism is a road lightened by rationality - and not only by rationality but also by faith, by prayer, and by the help from God, a road along which the entire our nature is being purified of sin and it is morally mortified.” (Stăniloae 1992: 13)

“But they were born there through the lack of care of the hypostatic center. Anyway, where the subject pays attention to and when he strives towards good, the nature is pure. The fact that of being the purity ruling within nature it depend on the subject. This is the sense which detaches out of the asceticism of the East, which values the watchfulness and the intentional effort so much.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“KARL HEIM in “Jesus der Herr”, Furche-Verlag, Berlin, 1935, speaks in a not understandable way about a sort of bipolar aspect of the world (the world would be in the same time good, but yet bad), which he reduces it, at the end, again, to the unique aspect of the good. Any usual act can be done without sin, but the author must in connection with God. He can kill too. (“Wie der Zeugungsakt heilig ist, wenn wir dabei in der Gemeinschaft mit Gott bleiben, so muss es darum auch möglich sein, mit seinen Herzen zu töten, immer vorausgesetzt, dass wir überhaupt imstand sind, bei Gott zu bleiben und ihn über alle Dinge zu lieben“, p. 147). The question is though: can the man remain in communion with God doing some acts? It isn’t here hidden an indifferentism in what concerns the life of the man in report with the world, being taken away any serious and responsible meaning of his earthly destiny? We believe that there exists a certain incompatibility between some general acts of the existence of this world and the sinless life. The righteous man must restrain himself from some patterns of the living on earth. Here is the sense of the asceticism. That’s why, the one who militates for an absolute good in full purity, he must suffer, if not even to fall crushed by this world. Generally, the one who decides himself to follow the path of God in this world, he must take, inevitably, his cross.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“A Romanian philosopher¹¹ issued the idea that the human being is provided with a bridle through his constitution itself, in order not to ascend too higher and to menace the sovereignty of the Great Anonymous from the top of the existence. The Christian teaching admits, at its turn, the utility of a brake. But the Christian teaching also affirms that this brake is imposed by the human being himself, in a free manner; this brake isn’t a force that the human being is fatally submitted to. And this brake’s purpose isn’t of impeding our being to ascend towards the absolute being, but its purpose is, on the opposite, to untie the human being from the chains which hold him back from this impetus. In the Christian conception, God doesn’t fear of elevating the man to the impartation with His own Being, to the man’s deification. This is for the man even becoming God, by the fact that he has a created being he is god by grace, and therefore the deified man doesn’t ever menace the sovereignty of the divine being.” (Stăniloae 1992: 116)

“The restraint exercised in a free manner by the believer, it isn’t restraint from ascending to God, but it is getting us away from evil things, having the purpose of defending the man against totally sinking within world. Of course, the world, as created by God, it has its positive purpose. The world helps us in our ascension towards God. The divine rationalities irradiating out of the world, they fill the world up with a light and with a transparency which give our understanding an infinite perspective. Anything, by its never exhausted meaning, by its never fully unveiled purpose, in the universe's ensemble, it always must give our conscience something to meditate at, and it must to elevate our conscience beyond the respective thing. Anything, through the meaning of the infinite and by its rooting into infinite, through its bonds of endless complexity with the meanings of all the things, it is a mystery. All the more it is so the person of our fellow human, which never can be comprised in a closed rational formula, which can never become exhausted in communicating himself and in his thirst for knowledge and love. How much, a fellow human of ours, can help us to elevate ourselves towards the infinite of mysteries through the endless meanings from him! How much, our fellow human fortifies us in our spiritual ascension through his untold and endless powers of encouragement, of trust, which irradiate out of him!" (Stăniloae 1992: 116-117)

¹¹ Lucian Blaga, The Transcendent Censorship.

Asceticism
and Mysticism

“A detailed comparison of the ascetic to the fighter from the arena, we are offered with by Saint Nilus the Ascetic in the Ascetic Word. So, the asceticism is that part of the spirituality treating about the rules and the efforts which lead the man from the first stage of the ascension towards consummation, to contemplation and union with God. The asceticism indicates the active part of the spiritual life, the part of cooperation required us by God, the endeavors which we are required to; and the mysterious union with God, a contrary, it indicates the aspect of passively enduring the work of the grace within us, the initiatives of God which we must only follow and which do not belong except to Him.” (Stăniloae 1992: 8)

“The ascetic efforts also are helped by grace, and the passivity from the phase of the union isn’t inertia; this means only that the culminant personal experience doesn’t have its source in the human spiritual powers, but exclusively in God, while the ascetic efforts are due to an active contribution of the man’s soul’s powers too.” (Stăniloae 1992: 8)

“The asceticism is the “killing of the death” from within us, in order to liberate the nature from the death’s slavery, as Saint Maximos the Confessor said. This is for there are two deaths: the first one is caused by sin and by nature’s death, and the second one is the death in the likeness of Christ, namely the death of the sin and of the death caused by sin. But as the nature’s death, as decomposition caused by sin, it doesn’t come only in the final moment but it chews like a worm for a long time, likewise the death’s death, or of the sin, it isn’t only something for the moment, but it is something that must be prepared for a long time through ascetic mortification. Therefore, the asceticism is a gradual elimination of that poison which leads the nature towards decomposition, towards corruption. The asceticism it, in other words, an elimination of that disease that leads the nature towards death and it is a strengthening of the nature. The asceticism is of-life-maker mortification as Saint Simeon the New Theologian called it. It is the gradual killing of the sin and of all then tendencies towards sin.” (Stăniloae 1992: 8-9)

“Christ is since the beginning the “Way” for the ascension towards God, even since the phase of the practical asceticism, when it would seem to us that we are preponderantly focuses on ourselves.” (Stăniloae 1992: 40)

“Christ, dwelling within us since Baptism, he leads powerfully not only our endeavor of adorning us with virtues, namely not only the positive work for fortifying through will the new man into Christ, but he leads also the negative work, that of killing the sin, of weakening, through will too, the former man. This is for the new man in Christ doesn’t grow up and he doesn’t stretch within us except on the measure the former man cedes and diminishes. In fuelling this spiritual process with power, it is manifested the meaning of the Baptism as participation, of the one who is being baptized, to the death and to the resurrection of the Lord. The Baptism's Mystery isn't only a momentary accomplishing of a mysterious death and resurrection of the one who is being baptized, but it is also the inauguration of a process in which these death and resurrection continues to consummation. This continual death is an aspect of the ascesis, and it is the struggle against the former man of the sin; the resurrection is the positive aspect, it is the growing up of the new man of the virtues. The death is intertwined with the sufferance. We chock up and we cut off from us a way of life that was characteristic to us. But then we think at the fact that the Lord too, he suffered dying and through our sufferance we participate at our turn to what he suffered. In this meaning, the ascesis is our participation to the death and to the resurrection of the Lord, in the continuation and in the actualization of the Baptism, through our personal efforts. Christ, as source of power sustaining the endeavor of the ascesis, He is the force, He is the "being" both of the virtue, as positive side of the ascesis, and of the struggle against the former man, of the sin." (Stăniloae 1992: 43-44)

"The purpose of the active phase is to liberate the man of passions. This is to the monk an accessible target, and not a utopian ideal. This state of dispassion is considered as equal to, or better said it is a benchmark of the love for God. And this spiritual love constitutes the crossing from the active phase to the contemplative phase." (Stăniloae 1992: 50)

"Only that one who has cleaned his mind through dispassion is able to direct himself towards knowledge (Gnosis), or towards contemplation. Profane erudition can be achieved by the unclean ones too, but the contemplation is had only by the clean ones. And the cleanness or the dispassion we can achieve it only by working the commandments, this constituting the preoccupation of the active phase. Only the clean soul can be a mirror not-narrowed and undefiled by the passionate attaching to the world's things, capable of receiving the godlike knowledge. This mind is empty. Only this mind is in a state of contemplation, of existential knowledge. Once has reached this state of dispassion, or of cleanness, or of quietude, or of peace, or of serenity, the soul is elevated on the level of the contemplation or of the Gnosis. But the Holy Fathers strictly discern this Gnosis, or contemplation, from the spiritual knowledge of the world, which at its turn, is different from the profane knowledge, being knowledge through the godlike grace." (Stăniloae 1992: 50)

"The division of the spiritual life in two phases it becomes a division in three phases: 1) the active phase or of the doing; 2) the phase of contemplating the nature; 3) the theological phase or of mysteriously contemplating God. It is important that in this scheme describing the progress towards consummation, it is mentioned absorbed also the knowledge about nature, about creation in its wholeness. Accepting the clean contemplation of the nature as act of spirituality, it is characteristic to the Eastern Holy Fathers. (...) The clean contemplation of the nature is a stage that reestablishes and that proves the restoration of the human soul's power of knowledge. But this scheme is ramifying even more. Inside the "natural contemplation" it can be discerned "the body's contemplation" and "the contemplation of the bodiless beings", or of the angels. Those we have three levels of the knowledge: of the corporeal world, of the incorporeal world, and of the Holy Trinity." (Stăniloae 1992: 51)

"The order of the spiritual ascension it is very clearly presented by Saint Maximos the Confessor. He too divides the ascension, firstly, in two levels. The spiritual man is elevated from virtues to knowledge or from doing to contemplation or from the active philosophy to the contemplative theology, or to the contemplative Mystagogy. Then he presented a division in three levels, as the contemplation following after doing it refers either to the rationalities from within beings or to God. In this threefold division the levels of the spiritual life are called as: 1. Doing; 2. Natural contemplation; 3. Mystical theology. These three levels are called also as: doing – natural contemplation – theological Mystagogy, or the active phase – the contemplative phase – the theological grace, or, virtue – spiritual contemplation – clean prayer. For the contemplation of the creation can refer to the seen or to the unseen world, Saint Maximos the Confessor sometimes presented a division in four levels." (Stăniloae 1992: 51-52)

"The second level is called contemplation, though Saint Maximos, as we have seen, he doesn't use this unique word, but he gives it many meanings, according to the object of knowledge it refers to. By and large, though, this object of knowledge is almost always a creature. Only rarely, namely when Saint Maximos divides the ascension in two levels and not in three, he understands by it also the mysterious contemplation referring in an unmediated manner to God. But when he divides this ascension on three levels, the contemplation constituting the second level, this one almost always means the contemplation oriented towards creatures. In this meaning, the contemplation has as object the "rationalities" from within beings. Through it the man achieves a spiritual sight of the rationalities from within the created things; through it the nature is to the man a "pedagogue", a guidebook towards God." (Stăniloae 1992: 52)

"The third level, that one of the mysterious knowledges, it no longer occupies itself with the "rationalities" from within things, but with God Himself. Its object is the godhead: all-holy, and all-happy, supra-untold, supra-unknown, and above any infinity. This knowing of God is an ecstasy of the love, which persists unmoving in a focusing towards God. One obtains this knowledge in the state of deification of the man, or of man's union with God." (Stăniloae 1992: 52-53)

"The purification's level categorically belongs to the ascetic toils, and the level of the consummation, or of the seeing, or of the deification and union, it represents the target of these toils. More difficult it is to situate, between these two levels, the level of the illumination." (Stăniloae 1992: 53)

"Instead of dividing our study in two parts, namely in that one of purifying and that one of mysteriously knowing God, we divide it in three, according to the three levels which we mentioned before. This is for, on one hand, the illumination's level belongs to the knowledge, for through it the soul has reached knowledge of God other than the natural knowledge, knowledge through the divine "rationalities" from within things, but not less knowledge limpidly and firmly related to God. Then this level is no longer a fight against passions, but it is something positive, which crowns the ascetic toils, resembling in this concern too, to the culminant phase of the spiritual life. But, on the other hand, the illumination's level belongs at its turn to the road towards the final target; the knowledge on this level is at its turn knowledge directed towards creatures and as such it must be overcome, in order one to reach the final target of directly knowing God. It is on one hand a positive result, obtained at the end of liberation of everything evil, but on the other hand it is neither the final positive result, though it is a good result, and it is not the absolute good which the ascetic toils search for, but it is a result than must be overcome too. We can say that the illumination's level belongs both to the ascetic ascension and to the target of the ascetic ascension, or that on this level the mysterious knowledge meets the asceticism, or the understanding meets the effort of overcoming this understanding too. It is the encounter of the light of the Morningstar with the dawn, the first one being overwhelmed by the last one." (Stăniloae 1992: 53)

"But let's now analyze in detail the ramifications of the three levels of the spiritual life. For the first level has as preoccupation the liberation of passions and to replace the passion for virtues, it is necessary to know firstly the being of the passions, their way of birth and of growing up. Then we must research the mode of overcoming the passions by becoming accustomed to the seven virtues, in the order presented by Saint Maximos the Confessor: of the faith, of the fear, of the restraint, of the patience, of the hope, of the dispassion, and of the love, to which are connected: the fasting, the taking of vigil, the prayer, the pious readings, and the enduring of troubles, as means for achieving the mentioned virtues." (Stăniloae 1992: 53)

"What is rejected in asceticism is not the new spiritual soars and inspirations, but the exaggerated tendencies of the sense's lusts, which, far from bringing an enrichment of the spirit, they actually narrow the spirit, they infinitely tie the spirit on finite things, it impedes the spirit in his tendencies of widening his possibilities of understanding. There are constantly removed the boulders thrown in the way of an advancing river, a river getting wider. To the body's life it is accepted the satisfying of the strictly necessary needs. But no really rational argument can plead for the removal of this dam from the way of the lusts which direct themselves in muddy and narrow streets." (Stăniloae 1992: 87-88)

"In the Eastern ascetic literature are known writings specially destined to the method of gradual purification of passions, through the contrary virtues. We have "The Ladder to Paradise" of Saint John Climacus, "The Exact Method and Rule" of Kallistos and Ignatius Xanthopol, and "The Words" of Saint Isaac the Syrian - though the last one is less systematic." (Stăniloae 1992: 91)

"The Ladder to Paradise" of John Climacus, dating from the Seventh Century, it is a complete treaty on the spiritual life. It describes thirty levels which a monk must cross through, from the moment he has renounced to the world until he will reach the consummation, namely until he will reach the love. Saint John Climacus wrote only for monks. He barely addresses himself to the ordinary Christians, and only in order to show them that they can bring their life too, close to the monks' life, the last one being, without any doubt, the consummate one." (Stăniloae 1992: 91)

"John Climacus wanted to take in account, in the levels of his "Ladder", the climbing from a less consummate level of the life to a more consummate level, namely he wanted to take in account the laws which the live can become consummate through. Following these rules, and for he wrote for monks, John Climacus has established the rejection of the world - as external renunciation - as the first level. ON the second level he placed the mortification of the "addiction" to the world, namely of the impulses tying us to the world, as internal renunciation. The third level, that one of the estrangements, it consummated the first two levels. To these renunciations which rather aim the bodily passions (the covetousness of the belly, the love for money, the fornication, and then the sadness and the anger growing up out of the mentioned ones), it follows, as the fourth level, the obedience, through which one must cut off the vain glory and the pride. Here is shown the necessity of having a spiritual father, and on this level too, it is described the humbleness as opposite to pride. It follows the repentance for the life from before (chapter 5) and in immediate connection with it, it follows the meditation at death (chapter 6) and the crying, which brings joy (chapter 7). Out of tears are born "the lack-of-anger and the gentleness". That's why those ones are placed on the eighth level. "For as the water slowly it totally sets the fire off, likewise the tear of the true crying it kills off the whole flame of the anger and of the fury". Because of giving birth to remembering the evil did to us by others, after the author showed how one can remove the anger, he spoke about the virtue contrary to this sin, namely about forgetting the evil did to us by others (chapter 9). A consequence of the hatred and of the remembering the evil it is the gossiping; this is combated on the next level (chapter 10). "The gossip's door is the much-speaking. Restraining the much-speaking through silence, it constitutes the preoccupation of the eleventh level. The twelfth chapter treats about lie, the child of the much-speaking, and the thirteenth chapter speaks about laziness, and the first grandson of the much-speaking. On the following levels the author described each passion and the means for combating them, starting with the covetousness of the belly and ending with the pride (chapters 14-23), and then he described on the last levels the simplicity or the innocence as contrary virtues (24), the humbleness as the highest destroyer of all passions (chapter 25), the discerning of the thoughts (chapter 26), the appeasing of the body and of the soul (chapter 27), the dispassion, as being heaven on earth, the consummation and the resurrection of the soul before the general resurrection (chapter 29) and the chain of the three virtues: the faith, the hope, and the love (chapter 30)." (Stăniloae 1992: 91-92)

"The "Method" of Kallistos and Ignatius, written in the Fourteenth Century, it is also called as Centuria, because of being divided in one hundred heads. At a first glance, it creates the impression of some long chaining of quotes without a rigorous plan. (...) The truth about the "Method" it can be detaches by presenting the order which this book treats the ascetic efforts for consummation in: in the first chapter it speaks about the Holy Ghost, Who is in the believers' hearts since Baptism; in the chapters 2-4, on the book's purpose, it is about the beginning and the final end of the spiritual life, the beginning consisting of "living according to the Savior's commandments, and the final end consisting of coming back to the grace that we have been given with at Baptism". The chapter 5 and 7 treat, more thoroughly, about the grace that we have been given with at Baptism, about the passions which covered this grace up, and about rediscovering this grace, again, by fulfilling the commandments. The beginning of working the commandments stays in calling the name of Jesus Christ, out of which the peace and the love spring out (chapters 8-13). The 14 and 15 chapters treat about rejecting the world and about submission. Until here it was an introduction of principles, and from here it follows the practical teaching. In the sixteenth chapter (divided in ten parts) it is treated again the theme of the faith, of the good deeds, and the need for a peaceful soul, not-scattered, and serene. After in the 17 and 18 chapters it treats about the beginners' fear, in the chapters 19 to 24 it is exposed the method of the Prayer of Jesus. Then it is shown what the diverse parts of the day must be lived like, and the diverse days of the weeks, and the holy fasting periods (25-37), about the diverse virtues, as the humbleness, the gift of the discernment, and the repentance (38-47), and then it is treated again about the theme of the clean prayer (48-54), and then it speaks about the warmth produced within heart by the clean prayer and about the love for God comprised in this prayer (55-57). The following chapters treat about tears (58), about the godlike working (61), about the godlike light (60, 63), about the good and the evil imaginings (64-69, 73), about mind and the mind's dispassion (70, 72), about the godlike comforting and pleasure (74-76), about gentleness and quietude (77-78), against about repentance (79-81), about attention (82), about calling Jesus within our heart (83), about the ecstatic love (84), about forsaking (85), about dispassion (86-87), and about the difference between dispassion and addiction (88-89). The chapters 90-92 are a lecture about the three theological virtues and about Eucharist, and the chapter 94-100 close with two recapitulations, by recommending this way of life as the best one, though there are other savior ways too." (Stăniloae 1992: 92-94)

"In the "Method" of Kallistos and Ignatius we don't find a detailed exposition of the passions and of what each one can be combated like, as we do at John Climacus, but the "Method" rather presents the positive part of the spiritual ascension, paying a great attention to the Prayer of Jesus, this fact showing the recent influence of the hesychast movement upon the "Method". That's why the method of the "Centuria" it completes well the method of the "Ladder". (Stăniloae 1992: 94)

"Although the Method of the "Centuria" comprises many repetitions, they are explainable by the fact that on the diverse levels of the spiritual life the virtues of the previous life must be always worked in a superior form. In the chapters of the "Centuria" one can, though, easily distinguish the three phases of the spiritual ascension. After the recommendations of general soul's attitude (chapter 16-24), starting with the chapter 24 and ending with the chapter 39, there are exposed several percepts regarding the external discipline of the spiritual life; starting with the chapter 40 and ending with the chapter 89, the "Centuria" continues with teachings referring to the life live through powers from above, this culminating into dispassion." (Stăniloae 1992: 94)

"Saint Isaac the Syrian's "Words" have a similar content to that of Saint John Climacus' "Ladder", but they aren't so systematically exposed. In exchange, the analyses of the diverse passions and virtues are more detailed. Saint Isaac the Syrian put a great accent on the importance of bearing the troubles in order to achieve the purification." (Stăniloae 1992: 94)

"The simplest and the most comprising scheme corresponding to the development of the spiritual life, it seems to us that of Saint Maximos the Confessor, who considered the spiritual ascension as having the following levels: the faith, the fear of God, the restraint, the patience and the long-suffering, the hope, the dispassion, and the love.” (Stăniloae 1992: 95)

“The light of the communion with Christ, it is endless, as it is too, the joy provided by this communion. It is an endless mysticism of the light. Though it is seen, it is inexhaustible in the joy and in the eternal novelty which it gives like a gift to the ones who see it. This endless advancing into the light of Christ it is lived by the one who, through ceaseless prayer, he reaches to see Christ shining within His heart, when his heart is united with the heavens. The Orthodox mysticism is a mysticism of the light, or a mystery of the light, and not one of the darkness. One cannot advance into darkness. In all the Orthodox religious services they speak about light, and in the content of the gifts mediated by these religious services one can advance endlessly.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 205)

Birth-Giver, of God

“The One Who is born out of Virgin Mary as man, He is God. The Church has been always considering Virgin Mary as Birth Giver of God, for in this is implied the confession that The One Who has been Born out of Her, He isn’t a human person differing from His godlike person, but the Son of God Himself has been born out of Her, according to His human nature. There never is born a nature, but a hypostasis, who in the human order is a person, for the nature doesn’t come to real subsistence except as person. The Person born out of the Virgin Mary is identical to the Person of the godlike Word, Who, through embodiment, He makes on Himself also the person of the human nature.” (Stăniloae 2006: 33-34)

“Out of Virgin Mary has been born the Son of God Himself, as person of the human nature. Rejecting this quality of Virgin Mary, it means rejecting the embodiment of the Son of God, it means contesting that the Son of God has made on Himself man, it means denying that Christ is the Embodied Son of God Himself Who is in an eternal dialogue with us, on this purpose making on Himself a human person. Denying that the Virgin Mary is Birth Giver of God, it means denying that the Son of God has made, On Himself, Her Son, and therefore the Son of man. What Jesus Christ highlighted so much His calling as Son of Man for? If he had been only a man, this would have been obvious. He has insisted to be called the Son of man in order to show that - though He is God - He really has made on Himself the Son of man. Only for the Son of God has made, on Himself, the Son of the Virgin, He has made, on Himself, also the Son of man, and also the Brother of the people, and by doing this he has made the people sons of God, by grace. Only thus the Son of God has imparted on Himself with our sufferings and with our death, and by doing so He has defeated those. Only thus he has deified the human nature.” (Stăniloae 2006: 34)

“If the Son of God gave the man existence, at the beginning, addressing him as an alter ego of His subject, now He makes such a subject, on Himself; but this doesn’t mean He ceases to be Himself the creator Subject. He wants to pass - in the dialogue with the people -, from the position as partner from outside people’s order, into the people’s order. On this purpose He can no longer use the human persons, who are born one out of others. He produces to Himself, out of Virgin Mary, a human nature of His own, as human subject. He gives birth to Himself as man. This isn’t only a new act, but it is a totally new beginning, which took place in the history of the mankind.” (Stăniloae 2006: 34)

“If there had been another human subject, born on a usual way, from man and woman, he wouldn’t have fulfilled the plan of the Son of God to make, on Himself, a human subject, in dialogue with the people, and in the same time remaining the Son of God. If it had been about a birth out of the human autonomy, namely out of a man-woman pair, which is sufficient for bringing to existence another human person by the human powers, it wouldn't have introduced in the string of the human persons, a human person Who to be, in the same time, a godlike person. The birth of the Son of God out of Virgin Mary, it has taken into account the helplessness of the human immanence to save by itself, to break upwards the horizon closed to the human submitted to the repetition and to death, of framing all the people born out of Christ, by grace, in the string of the ones "born" out of God." (Stăniloae 2006: 34)

"From this point of view the birth of God-the Word, as man, it is a unique birth, not having anything like the birth of the other people. "Neither His first birth, out of the Father, nor the second one, had nothing in common with the birth of somebody else" (Leontius of Byzantium). His second birth is not a birth out of the nature's necessity, but out of the benevolence of God. Through this birth the divine subject is born, as man too, free, for He isn't born out of the nature's order. Besides, even the human person isn't born only like an object, but the human person is born also, or the human person is properly said born, also as subject, by having from the first moment an active role in forming his nature, in forming, on himself, as man. Properly said, the apparition of the human subject, it is explained as support of his human nature – or the apparition of the human nature it is explained as having its support in itself, in the support or in the deeper Hypostasis of the godlike Word Whose partner of discussions the human nature becomes from the first instant, at the calling God-the Word addresses to the human nature. But in Christ, the Word makes, on Himself, in an unmediated manner, the hypostasis. In Christ, He calls, on Himself, to existence as man. The deeper Hypostasis of the human hypostases, this time He makes, on Himself, in an unmediated manner, the Hypostasis of His own human nature. Thus, the birth of the Son of God as man, it surpasses even more the possibilities of the human nature. The fact of this wonderful birth isn't a fact of nature, but it is a fact of nature's overwhelming by the godlike Ghost, in a way fuller manner than in the birth of the other people. That's why in Gospels and in the Symbols of Faith of the Early Church, it is attributed a decisive role to the Holy Ghost in conceiving and in the birth of the Son of God as man." (Stăniloae 2006: 35)

"The Holy Fathers observed that, if at the beginning God was able to take, only out of Adam, another human subject, why He couldn't be able to take out of a woman, Himself, not a human subject, but only a human nature for Himself as Subject? But, if then He took in an instant, a human subject out of Adam – for the man needed from the beginning a partner of dialogue - now God-the Word goes through the whole process of forming His nature, of His forming like man, as a new man's dialogue partner, except the human initiative of the birth which couldn't have formed but another human subject in the human immanent string. Saint Maximos the Confessor shows that, through this new mode of birth, not only God accepts a temporality, which doesn't contradict His eternity, but also the human nature is reestablished in original state, being overwhelmed by the godlike Ghost through the fortifying of the human spirit. This is for Christ, like man, He comes to existence, like Adam did, through an act of godlike creation, and therefore unstained by the sin of voluptuousness. But on the other hand, Christ remains in continuation also with the Adam's successors, who come to existence through the natural birth." (Stăniloae 2006: 35)

"By working thus, or by contributing as Person to the accomplishment of the act through which the Son of God makes, on Himself, Hypostasis of the human nature, the Holy Ghost work also upon Her Who has become through this the Mother of Christ, as also the Word Himself has worked upon Her too, by forming His human nature out of Her, as Person too. But the efficiency of the Ghost upon somebody is proportional to the purity, or to the availability of the one the Ghost work upon. This is for purity means undiminished availability for God, it means the integral commitment to the dialogue with God, in the role of the one who answers and who gives away, on himself. The Mother of the Lord fully gives away, on Herself, to the Word, and not only through the Word but also by putting Herself, integrally, at His disposition. Thus, the Ghost could fully overwhelm, in Her, the natural law of the birth. Who surrenders to voluptuousness, he isn't pure, he isn't integrally available to God, to the Word, and he isn't in a state of spiritual lucidity and of responsibility before God. In this one, the power of the Ghost cannot overwhelm the birth's natural law. The Word of God couldn't form Himself, to Himself, in a sovereign manner, His body; if that had been the case, the body would have been formed by the nature's law and it would have been imprinted by the voluptuousness from the beginning of its forming. The Word's Hypostasis, if that had been the case, he couldn't have fully impropriated the body that would have been formed thus, and such a body wouldn't have found its supreme fulfillment or its full accomplishment like Person in the Word's Hypostasis, but it would have partially remained: not-free, not-full as Person, and not-fully available to the spirit." (Stăniloae 2006: 37)

"By descending Himself in Her, as Hypostasis, and by starting to form His body out of Her, with the together-working of the Ghost, as whole Person, the body of the Birth Giver of God which She kept in the purity of the virginity until then – in the purity of the total availability to God –, it is cleaned also of the ancestral sin, for the godlike Hypostasis not to take His body out of a body that still was under that sin and under the natural law of the birth in voluptuousness." (Stăniloae 2006: 37)

"The Mother of the One Who has formed His human nature out of Her, and the One upon Whom He could work for hypostatizing the human nature that was being formed within Her, in Himself as God-the Word She must be virgin before conceiving, during conceiving, and at birth. The quality Mary has as Birth Giver of God and Her virginity are inseparable. This wonder happened to Her, so that it would have been impossible to Her not to remain, also after the birth, totally committed to God, namely virgin. The One Who held the Son of God in Her arms, as man, and Who was being imparted with His purity, as She was imparted with the liberation from the ancestral sin, on the moment He started dwelling within Her, at His conceiving as man, She couldn't remain non-virgin." (Stăniloae 2006: 37)

"Whether the Virgin Mary was able to bring, by Her purity, a contribution to the embodiment of the Son of God as man, to His assuming of the human nature in Himself as Hypostasis of it, this was also due to the fact that Herself brought to fulfillment a power God "has seeded in Her against sin", from the beginning. BY this, "She covered the whole evilness of the people and she showed the people worthy to be united with God and She showed the earth worthy for God to live on it". She also had the ancestral sin, but in Her "the human being... showed very vigorously the power seeded in him against the sin, by avoiding - through an awoken spirit and through right decision and through the greatness of the wisdom - all the sins from beginning to the end". "Through Her beauty, She showed God the human natures' common beauty and "She moved Him towards loving the people". Properly-said, She fully opened Herself to God and by doing this She was united with Him, even before He consummated His union with Her, by forming His human nature out of Her human nature. "That One Whom She later was to dress Him up with body out of Her body, and thus to show Him to everybody's eyes, She designated Him within Herself by Her deeds." When the time came - about which Apostle Paul spoke too - the humanity contributed too, through Her, by the fact that She made Herself able for this insertion of God amongst the human persons by assuming our nature in His Hypostasis in order to deify our nature." (Stăniloae 2006: 37-38)

"Thus, between the kenosis of the Son of God and His embodiment, or the quality of the Virgin Mary as Birth Giver of God, there is an internal connection, as also between all the implications of the union of the two natures in one Hypostasis. Leontius of Byzantium, he tightly connected to the birth of the Son of God out of Virgin Mary, or to Her quality of Birth Giver of God, His kenosis and the deification of His human nature. Only for the One Who has been born out of the Virgin Mary was God, He received Himself the human sufferings, overcoming them, and He was able to resurrect. Concerning other dead people, Leontius said: They cannot resurrect because of not being in them any power after death." (Stăniloae 2006: 38)

“Jesus Christ not only He didn’t commit personal sins or contrary acts to God and to His fellow humans, but He neither has come to existence bearing the ancestral sin. He wasn’t, as man, the result of an act of voluptuousness, in which is manifested the state of human species’ fall under the necessity of this mode of breeding, of which cannot get rid of even the ones who are cleaned up of the ancestral sin. Christ has been the result of His own initiative, free of any necessity manifested through such voluptuousness. That’s why the freedom of Jesus from the ancestral sin, it results out of the fact that He has been born, like man, by the initiative He has had it like being the Word of God, by the fact that the One Who has been born like man out of the Virgin Mary, He is God, or by the fact that She is Birth Giver of God. And this means the Christ has been born on a supra-natural way, without the initiative of a pair of humans. This is for all these things relate to each other. But one can say also the vice versa: out of the fact that Christ had no sin, it results that He has been the embodied God. This is because only God has no sin, in the radical meaning, for He cannot commit sin. That’s why was necessary that the Son of God to embody Himself, for also His body to be imparted with His lack of sin, or with his helplessness of committing sin. (...)

One could say that we have here anthropological pessimism, like the Protestant one is. But, while there the man is forgiven without being transformed, here one believes in the real elevation of the man above the sin, by the impartation of the godlike lack of sins. We have here a fundamental vision of the Holy Fathers, applied to the theme of the lack of sins, according to which the godlike nature is united with the human nature in the Person of Christ, in order the human nature to participate to the godlike nature, and in order the godlike nature to take upon itself the human nature.” (Stăniloae 2006: 39)

“The Lord’s Mother comes before humanity and everybody follow to Her”. She comes before in love, in cleanness, and in closeness to God. She is the first to cross the death which Her Son has made it helpless and, that’s why, in the prayer addressed to Her at Her Dormition, everybody asks for Her sheltering. “Into Dormition, You Birth Giver of God, You haven’t forsaken the world.” The ascension of the Lord’s Mother it closes up the death’s gates, Her seal is laid on nothingness. It is laid from above by God-the Man and from beneath, by the “first new creature”, resurrected and deified.” (Stăniloae 1997: 214-215)

“That’s why we ask, incomparably more often than to all the saints, for the Mother of the Lord to pray for us and for all our fellow humans. Always, after two troparions addressed to God, the third troparion is addressed to Her. If to each saint is dedicated a main day in the churchly year, for honoring and praising, the Lord’s Mother is praised daily, though She has also a few important holidays especially dedicated to Her. She is not only asked for praying to Christ for us, but She is asked for many other things. We address to Her with requests like these ones: “Save Your servants of all the needs”: “Master, help us, having mercy on us”; “Run, Master, Birth Giver of God, ad deliver us from dangers”, “Only in You I hope and I run to You to shelter me”; “You All-Holy Birth Giver of the Lord, do not forsaken me during my life, do not entrust me to the human help, but Yourself defend me and save me”. It is relentlessly repeated the chorus: “You”, All-Holy Birth Giver of God, saves us”. But She is never told: “Have mercy on us”. Through this expression only addressed to God, it is affirmed the belief that we totally depend on the mercy of God. “Save us” addressed to the Lord’s Mother it hasn’t the meaning of salvation, as work done by Christ, but of “escaping” or “deliverance” from diverse hardships, troubles, dangers, temptations, which still are related to the salvation.” (Stăniloae 1997: 215)

“Everything we ask the Lord’s Mother for, She is asked for, though, for She is in the tightest union with Her Son, so that He is, in the last analysis, the source of the help She provides us with. Only for She is the Mother of God the Savior, She is directly asked for certain help, and not because of Herself being savior, or co-savior (co-redemptix, as is the tendency to be considered in Catholicism), for She cannot be placed on the same plan with Jesus Christ, the author Himself of the salvation. It is said for many times that She helps us for She mediates at Her Son with a special efficacy. “The defender of the Christians, not-confronted, steadfast mediator at the Maker, do not overlook the voices of the prayer of the sinner ones, but run as a Kind One to our help, of the ones who are shouting out with faith towards You, hurry up towards mediation, the One Who always shelters, Birth Giver of God, Your servants”. (Stăniloae 1997: 215)

“The help from the Lord’s Mother it is so necessary, for a reason why Christ has mercy on the ones who faithfully run to Him, it is that one that they honor His Mother. This is because the ones who do not recognize Her as Birth Giver of God into virginity and out of the power of the Holy Ghost, they do not recognize Him as God. “He has become strength and salvation to the lost ones, the One Who was born out of You, the Master of the World Who saved from the hell’s gates the ones who glorify You with faith” (from the religious service of the burial)”. (Stăniloae 1997: 215-216)

“The fact that She is the Mother of God-the Savior it is also the reason why we grant Her not only a veneration like to the saints, but a supra-veneration (hyperdulia). This supra-veneration is shown in the in the incomparably greater multitude of prayers addressed to Her, in asking for some direct help from Her, in motivating our requests addressed to the Savior with the fact that He was born out of Her. The Lord’s Mother has a unique position within Church’s cult. She is above all the deified human creatures – and above the angels – who are united with Christ. But She is not identical to God and to Christ, God-the Man. She is only a human being. But She is the human being elevated by the grace of Christ above all the saints and She is more venerated than all the saints, but without being worshipped as God or as Christ, the embodied God, as the One on Whom we depend totally and absolutely in our eternal existence and happiness. Everything She has, She has it through God, as we do too, and especially through the embodied God, though She has more than all of us and though She has been elevated through Her cleanness and through Her love for God above the whole creation; and though in the pan-human solidarity into Christ, She brings more love than all the conscious creatures.” (Stăniloae 1997: 216)

“More united with Christ than all the saints, and that’s why above all the saints and angels, there is the Mother of the Lord, the One Who bore in Her womb the Son of God conceived out of Her like man and then carried in Her arms like a child and remained united with Him through the supreme human affection lived by a mother live for her son. The bond of the Lord’s Mother with Christ is more intimate than any bond of any saint with Him, for His body has been formed in an unmediated manner out of Her body, and She carried Him in Her arms, and She ceaselessly looked at His face and in His eyes, She nourished Him and She loved Him with the culminant human love characteristic to a mother, being in a certain sense identified to Her Son. That’s why Her daring towards Him is greater than of all the saints and Her love towards us it is influenced by the maximum love of Christ for us. The Orthodox iconography shows Jesus taking Her soul, at Her Dormition, in His arms, by inverting His carrying as little child in Her arms. His love for Her is equally affectionate as Her love for Him; the Child, reached at the fullness of His powers, He carries in His arms His Mother who remained with diminished powers. In Her person Jesus felt and he continues feeling, at maximum, the human love for Him, and in His affection towards Her it is included the affection towards the man by and large, and towards mothers and their love for their children.” (Stăniloae 1997: 214)

“In the Mother of the Lord we have in heavens a mother’s heart, the heart which melted down the most, for Her Son, and which beat and still beats together with His heart, for His cause, which is our salvation, for the salvation isn’t a matter of justice, but of love between God and the people; a love that has become fiery and culminant from the part of the people by being concentrated in a mother’s heart and being manifested through it. The embodied God takes account of this Mother’s heart, Who has become our Mother, for She is His Mother. She is the most precious gift that God has given to the mankind, a gift which God rewards us through, with His countless gifts. “What we will bring to Your, Christ?... The heavens bring You angels, the earth brings You its gifts. But we, the people, we bring You the Virgin Mother”, it sings the Church on the occasion of the Lord’s Birth.” (Stăniloae 1997: 214)

“Denying Christ’s birth out of Virgin it means submitting Him to a law superior to Him, and affirming about Him that He hadn’t the power to definitively get rid of the definitive death of the body. But the power of the Son of God was shown not only in His birth out of Virgin, above nature, and in defeating the death which He accepted willingly, but also in the fact that He didn’t let the body of His Mother to disintegrate in a tomb, but he resurrected Her Body and he elevated Her body to heavens, where He is too. It was natural that Her body, out of which has been formed the Christ’s body as able to defeat the death, to receive the power to resurrect at its turn, not out of Her power, but out of the power of Son of God Who worked within Her, while forming His body. By this we have been given the reassurance that not only the body of Christ, as body of the godlike Person, it has resurrected, but the bodies of our human persons will resurrect too. The Mother of the Lord is, in this regard too, the connection bridge between the Son of God born and resurrected as man, and the people.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 209-210)

“The fact that the Mother of the Lord hasn’t resurrected and She hasn’t ascended to heaven by Herself, it was shown by the fact that She didn’t show Herself with Her resurrected body either in the act of the ascent. The act of Her resurrection and ascent was done through Her resurrected and ascended Son, in an unseen manner.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 210)

“We have in heavens not only the Son of God made man Who to send His power to the ones who believe in Him, in order them to be elevated amongst angels at the glory he has received as man, but we also have His Mother in heavens, as a creature from amongst us, but united with Him in a special manner, and She prays, at Her turn, for us. That’s why we do not pray only to Christ, but we also pray to Her, in order Her to pray for us and, trusting Her prayers, we tell Her: “Rejoice, You Who stay before the throne of Your God, You Who pray for us. Rejoice, You the Mediator between God and man, for You deliver us from needs.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 211)

“In order to understand the light which will irradiate out of our body after the general resurrection, we must try to understand the light from the resurrected body of Christ. We’ve mentioned that, through the resurrection from dead, Christ has brought to the humanity a new escape from the natural laws, which are considered as fatal, and which the people were submitted to. Christ showed in the act of His resurrection, again, fully as God, above the natural laws, even in His humanity. If the Son of God had defeated the nature’s laws only by His coming as man into history, He would have remained as man, through death, submitted to those laws, and defeating those laws it would have been somehow inutile. But He has defeated those laws also by the fact that He didn't definitively died, but He has defeated the death too, by resurrecting. And if through His birth out of Virgin and without sin, He has defeated the law of the natural birth, through His resurrection He has defeated it for everybody, of course by the fact that He gives the Holy Ghost to all the ones who believe in Him, Whom His resurrected humanity has been fully filled up with, for through This Ghost Whom they are born again through, they to prepare themselves too, for the resurrection with the body. Only thus the history is shown as defeated by Christ, and as receiving a meaning from Him. If all the people had died definitively and totally, what would have been born Christ out of Virgin for? What would have He defeated the natural law of the birth for, if the natural law of the definitive and total death had remained valid? The birth out of Virgin has as consequence not only the fact that Christ died for us and not for Himself, but also the deed of His resurrection, namely He resurrected not only for Himself but also for all of us. Therefore, His birth out of Virgin Mary, it is important to us, despite the fact that it doesn't change for us too, our natural birth with the body for a birth out of virgin." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 119-120)

"But, also after the Birth, Her motherly report with the Child born into virginal purity, it had to remain clean of any lust; She had to remain Virgin into Her entire existence as Mother of Jesus Christ, because the connection between mother and child is so intimate that after the birth takes place a continuous soul transmission from Her to Him¹²." (Stăniloae 1993)

"But, if the Subject Who has formed His human nature within the Virgin Mary, He is the Son of God, She could be called, rightly, as Mother of God." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The attributes of the Birth Giver and of the Mother of God, they express the report of profound intimacy which has been established between Virgin Mary and the embodied Son of God. If through the word Virgin it is indicated rather the divine initiative into the embodiment of the Son, the words: Birth Giver and Mother of God, they express Her positive role and the report with the One Who has embodied Himself." (Stăniloae 1993)

"According to the real meaning of the communication of the features, the attribute of the Virgin as Birth Giver of God, it doesn't mean to express this dogmatic truth only in the sense that the human nature subject, which has been taken from Her, he is the Son of God. It would be insufficient the idea that Her whole being is was, during the time of forming of the human nature of Jesus, into a direct report only with this nature and, only because the subject who was leading this process was the Son of God Himself, She can be called Birth Giver of God. The divine hypostasis itself, by becoming also hypostasis of human nature, He was becoming whole through this process, His divine face being penetrated by the human face too. And, whereas the face is the real and the concentrated expression of the nature, through the divine face the divine nature itself was into a real report with Virgin Mary in this interval, by attracting into its contents the elements of the human nature from the being of the Virgin. Without receiving itself the existence from the Virgin Mary, the divinity of the Logos has settled herself through hypostasis, into a receiving report towards Her, without the divinity to change Her in something, of course.” (Stăniloae 1993)

¹² It could be recognized also the opposite fact: Jesus, by being not only the child of Mary, but also of Her God, He was transmitting to Her, at His turn, the sanctifying power which guarded Her continuously into virginity.

“God—the Word, places Himself in a real report as a Son towards Mary, by receiving a part from Her being and a way of His existence. Even if only a part of Him takes its existence from Her, He places Himself entirely, in front of Her, in this relation of a receiver of existence.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“One of the merits the Christianity has, it is that it has reestablished the dignity of the woman, by raising her at the height of the man, though their roles into life remain different, according to their natural aptitudes. The reason of this dignity stays into the amazing fact that the Son of God deigned to make Himself the Son of the woman. Through the fact that He comes into world like a man, the woman does not remain on the second plan, because to Her it is given the great plan to be His mother, as long as He dispersed Himself like man, into His act of the embodiment. Toward the woman He placed Himself into the supreme intimacy and tenderness relation. The sole and the highest human authority, towards which God-the Word behaves with tender reverence, it is the maternal authority of a woman. The equilibrium between man and woman it is so perfectly reestablished, so nobody could ever answer to the question: who it is most precious in the eyes of God, the man or the woman?” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Through the act of the birth of God—the Word from woman, the Christianity fully humanizes the sky. That it is humanized also by the fact that on the throne of the supreme existence stays the Son of God, Who made Himself man. But this would continue to leave fear vibrations into the soul of the mortal, because the Man from the helm of the universal destinies He is also God, and the man represents anyway the rigid and the inflexible principles.

When the mortal, thereby, knows that Man has a Mother, he gains courage, because the Mother is the quintessence of the loving affection. And this Mother is entirely from amongst us. God voluntarily recognizes the maternal “authority” of the feminine sensitiveness into His report with us. The Son of God gave us Her in order to dare more and to get closer to Him, and the criteria of His humanity to have even more power in His reports with us.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“How much humanity does not bring the presence of the Virgin into the Christianity life! The Christianity ceases to be a rigid doctrine, of theories and speculations, by the fact that it introduces a woman and a Mother into the middle, between us and God. The sky humanizes itself, it is no longer distant, scary, and far away from us, because in heavens there is a Mother who stays next to God, having, on one hand, through His benevolence, the authority of a Mother upon Him, when She prays for us, and on the other hand, a motherly tenderness for our hardships.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The godlike hypostasis was reduced to that minimum degree of efficiency which makes possible that from the blood of the Virgin to be formed exactly a human nature with his limitations; to the human nature He meant one human hypostasis.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The supernatural birth is not something else but only the expression that the One Who initiated the conception into Virgin Mary, He was the Logos Himself, Who also has conceived Himself like man. He is in the same time active and passive factor to His conceiving and birth. His transposition into a maximum state of passive suffering of the birth, it is watched over by another godlike person, by the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Therefore, the teaching about the supernatural birth of Jesus Christ it doesn’t prove itself like being a forced piece into the Christian doctrine, with the goal of satisfying only a pious thirst for miraculous, but it is a necessary article in the logic of the full achievement of the Revelation into world. Thereby, the virginity of Mary, which is only the empirical negative side of the supernatural conception of Jesus Christ, it is a Christological dogma. Not admitting that Mary gave birth to Jesus while still remaining a virgin, it means not recognizing that His subject is not the product of the immanence. And this means the denial of the Revelation¹³.” (Stăniloae 1993)

13 E. BRUNNER, Der Mittler, p. 288-292, rejects the virginal birth. He says that the biggest wonder is the fact that God has embodied Himself. This wonder doesn’t need another wonder of a “biological” character, in order

“Of course, the supernatural birth of Jesus Christ does not imply directly the virginity of Mary for all the time, but only for the fact that She didn’t conceived and gave birth to Jesus on the natural way. But his eternal virginity results indirectly from His supernatural birth. The embodiment of the Word, realizing an initiative of God and not of the man, excludes the state of human lust through it is initiated any new human hypostasis. The conceiving of a new man it is done into sin, into lust. From the first moment, the new human hypostasis burdens with the hereditary sin. Into the supernatural conceiving of the Son of God it shows both the heavenly initiative of His embodiment, but also the fact that the Lord, like a man, not emerged from the mud of the hereditary sin. His mission of a Savior of the mankind, through substitutive sacrifice for the sin of others, it was requiring indeed that He had to be sinless¹⁴. But the human initiative for a to explain the way in which the birth happened. Then, whether Jesus has taken the full humanity, He received it on the usual way of the natural conception. The Brunner’s considerations don’t stand to the arguments from our text. Besides that, Brunner, by rejecting any wonder, any wonderful how of the life and of the embodiment of the Jesus, what he can base on, his faith in the fact that Jesus was the Son of God? No matter how much the faith would be an act of daring, of risking, though it has to have some reasons. Otherwise, the faith would totally be an arbitrary act. A renowned Calvinist theologian, Karl Barth, he combats this error of E. Brunner: “The negative attitude of Brunner, of denying the virginal birth, it is not a good enterprise. It extends, like is the case of Althaus too, an equivocal on his entire Christology. The sigh of N. Berdiaev it is also my sigh: «I read the book of Brunner with an extraordinary interest, because I felt in it the tension and the sharpness of the cogitation, the religious pathos. But when I arrive to the place in which Brunner confesses that he doesn’t believe in the birth of Jesus Christ from a Virgin, or, at least, that it is indifferent to him, I become sad and the issue starts boring me. Because it seems to me that all that was good in the book it was erased and all it follows it doesn’t have any meaning»” (Orient und Occident, Helft, 1929, p. 19). K. Barth sees the reason and the necessity of the birth from a Virgin in the proving of the fact that God initiates the Revelation and the Salvation, and not the man: “Die Jungfrauengeburt bezeichnet dies: dass Gott am Anfang steht, wo wirkliche Offenbarung stattfindet, Gott und nicht die willkürliche Klugheit, Tüchtigkeit oder Frömmigkeit eines Menschen”. Karl Barth, Die kirchliche Dogmatik, erster Band, zweiter Halbband, Zollikon, 1938, p. 199 – 201.

¹⁴ Saint Maxim the Confessor shows that the prolongation of the sin into the world it is done through the lust which stays at the beginning of the birth. The pain, in the last phase the death, it is the payment for our sinful life, which comes from this lustily beginning. The man, searching to escape the pain and the fear of death, he takes refuge into pleasure, including the pleasure from which a new life takes its beginning. But, instead of escaping the pain and the death, the voluptuousness which he ran at, by being a sin, it brings a new pain and it offers to the death a new victim (G.P. 90, 629 D). (Of course, Saint Maxim the Confessor was able to see also the positive role of the love between sexes). Jesus had His beginning into a birth without the sinful voluptuousness, thereby His life is also clean. But He has taken upon Himself the pain and the death. Only on this way His death, by not being the end of a lustily life, and by not having its origin into a sinful pleasure, it is savior. He has to be born from a Virgin for His life to be savior. Only on this way He could save the people from the vicious circle of pleasure – death – pleasure – death etc. “After the breaking of the commandment, all the people have the pleasure in a natural way like their beginning anticipation and none of them was free of the lustily beginning through pleasure. Thus, all of them were indebted through nature to suffer the suffering and the death which come through them. It was in no way possible to liberate the ones who were tyrannized by the unjust voluptuousness, from the right suffering, and from the totally just death which comes after. For the abolition of the most unfair pleasure and, by its cause, of the most unfair suffering, under which the man was torn apart in a pathetic way, by having the origin of his existence into the corruption of the pleasure and by having his end into the decay of death – for the straightening of the suffering nature – it must be an unfair suffering and death and, in the same time, undetermined by a cause. Undetermined by a cause, like not having a new man, without to be eo ipso reconciled, it is indissoluble interweaved with the sinful lust, so that a man born on the natural way he cannot be Savior. For salvation there must be a man into whom the human nature to have a new, clean beginning, like it had it for the first time. The clean beginning, far from being a contrary one, it is the one truly normal to the human nature. The beginning into the lust is a deviation from the norm given to it through creation. Only being reestablished the normal, clean beginning of it, it could be removed its death too, and it could be restored the original immortality¹⁵.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“At the birth of Jesus like man, it took place another intervention of God. Only on this way it could be taken out the human nature from the vicious and tragic circle of sin and death. If this intervention didn’t do a new creation from nothing of the human nature of Jesus, but it gave Him the origin into a Virgin, it is for the humanity of Jesus Christ had to be a part from the communal humanity, which He had the mission to save it. God did not seek to destroy the human nature founded into Adam, but He sought to restore it.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“If Mary hadn’t been Virgin when She conceived the Son of God, She could have mixed, through memory, in Her state, the human lust, awakened before.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“It was told that the femininity represents, by itself, the passive part, the receptive part of the mankind, unlike the manly element, which is initiative and lofty confidence in its own power. Therefore, by the simple fact of Her pleasure like an anticipation of the existence. Unfair, like not being the consequence of a passionate life. Caught in the middle between the right suffering and death, the suffering and the death would have to totally abolish the unfair origin from the pleasure and the right end through death of the nature, and to become again free of voluptuousness and suffering, re-receiving the clarified nature from the beginning, un-dirtied by the attributes imprinted into the ones who are under the sign of the beginning and of the corruption”. Jesus fulfilled this work, He “not having, at all, the pleasure from disobedience like anticipation in time of His birth from woman, and He by His will assumed that pain which, caused by that, it is the end of the nature, due to His love for the people, like suffering unfairly to abolish the origin of the beginning which tyrannized the nature from the unfair pleasure, because the death of the Lord didn’t come to Him like a payment which was owed to Him like to the other people, but it came against the sin. Thereby, it abolished the just end of the nature produced through death, not being anymore at Him the pleasure due to which the death penetrated into the nature”. (Questiones ad Thalassium, 61, Migne, G.P., 90, 628 D – 629 B). H.U. von Baltazar summarizes on this way the idea of Saint Maximos the Confessor: “To break the dialectic of the sin there were demanded two conditions: a death, which was not a punishment for passion, and, therefore, a birth for a Virgin”, W. c. p. 189.

15 Maxim the Confessor, Qauest. ad Thalass., 63; G.P. 90, 632 D. C.

femininity, Mary would have corresponded to the embodiment of the Logos by divine initiative¹⁶.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Mary made possible the accomplishment of the embodiment, like a full initiative of God, especially through her full virginity, through the lack of sinful lust.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“It is understood that, by attributing to God the whole initiative in the act of the embodiment, we do not reduce the role of the Mary to an inert passivity. In the limits of the receptivity, of the obedience, there still is a possibility of an intense participation. Virgin Mary places Herself with the whole Her being at the disposition of God, being only obedience, only purity, and only serving.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The One born out of Virgin Mary, by not being the product of an autonomous human initiative, He was not an autonomous human hypostasis. The humanity of Jesus Christ, though individual, it did not constitute an own hypostasis, but it started to form under the divine hypostasis care. Therefore, it was not separated from the general human nature through an act from its content, but through the divine hypostasis’s impulse.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Though He has not received the human nature through the natural generation and the Holy Ghost protected Him at conceiving against the hereditary sin, though, His nature, received from the nature of Virgin Mary, it is entirely a human nature, in intimate interweaving, like the nature of all the human individuals, tied on it with all the threads, painfully vibrating by the burden of the sin which presses it, feeling Himself in solidarity with the human nature. If in a huge building all the bricks are wet, and only one is dry, without any doubt that that brick will be influenced too by the aspect and the general atmosphere of the building; or, if into some community, all its members feel themselves burdened by a certain disposition consequently to some reproachable antecedents, and on the basis of some forebodings, even there is one who personally has nothing to reproach to himself, he will feel also the general pressure. Everybody feel guilty in report with the shortcoming of his fellow humans, even if he was not copartner to causing it, for the simple reason that he has not done everything to save them¹⁷. And until He succeeds to save them, he works out of this conscience of the guilt.” (Stăniloae 1993)

¹⁶ Dr. RUDOLF GRABER, Maria im Gottgeheimnis der Schöpfung, Regensburg, 1940: „In Maria ist das All in seine seins massige Stellung des Empfangenden und damit des Weiblichen zurückgekehrt“, (p. 21).

“It is right that Jesus has resurrected also like a man into a region, surpassing the whole creation - and even Virgin Mary -, into the region of divine glory and authority. This is the glory where He was elevated. But, for this region is not spatially superior to any created region, it is not necessary a leaving of any form which stays in connection with any of the created regions. The supreme intimacy of the body in report with the divinity, it does not mean but the perfect capacity of this one to reflect the divinity over them. But, in any case, the human body remains like an eternal form of showing of the godhead and of the Logos and, through these, it is somehow assimilated to the godhead also like an own face of the godhead. Besides the whole ascent, Jesus remains in connection with us, and this means that He remains fully a man. He is tied to us through the same threads, the same fullness of the human nature, like in case of Virgin Mary. Though, He is higher than her for, due to His godhead, the center of His person it has its residence into the intimacy of the godhead.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Only because Jesus keeps His entire humanity, similar to us, His ascent, by being a supreme elevation of the humanity in the divine residence, on the right hand of the Father, it is, in the same time, a supreme closeness to the divine efficiency of man, because His humanity can now transmit us the entire divine power. It is close to us through the same plenitude of the humanity like in case of Virgin Mary, but with a superhuman intensity and vastness, due to the fact that His humanity is the perfect environment for the almighty action of the omnipresent godhead.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Another consequence of the hypostatic union is the supernatural birth of Jesus Christ. The Savior didn’t appear into the world like a being that was formed entirely from the content of this world. He has existed beforehand like a Subject, therefore like an initiative for a new form of existence. By this fact, and especially through that one that His existence from beforehand it is godlike, He didn't submit Himself to a human initiative in what concerns His coming into the world dressed up into a human nature. If that had been the case, He would have ceased to be subject since on the heavenly plan of His existence, and what would have been born out of Mary, he would have been subject only through the divine grace of the man, so not a godlike subject. Over all, the initiative of the salvation wouldn't have belonged to the godhead, but to the man, and a salvation forced by the man it is not salvation by any means. The Son came into world voluntarily, therefore He came like a divine subject and not forced by some power from the world." (Stăniloae 1993)

¹⁷ Heidegger defines the conscience of guilt also like a responsibility for the shortcoming of others. We feel guilty for the minus from the life of the people, because we have not covered this minus. [“Der Begriff des Schuldigseins: Grundsein für einen Mangel im Dasein eines Anderen... das Ungenügen gegenüber einer Forderung, die an das existierende Mit sein mit Anderen ergeht“, (Sein und Zeit, p. 282)]. But, as the ordinary man cannot escape by this guilt, because he cannot exceed his incapacity to remove the others from the insufficiency of their existence, Jesus Christ could do this. But until He did the whole salvation of the people, He felt the guilt more than any other man, since, unlike any other man, he knew that He could save them. Of course, that He voluntarily assumed this conscience of the responsibility, through His free embodiment.

"Only through His conception as man out of Virgin, the Son of God has given to His human spirit power to defeat death with the body, and through this, to all the people who will attach themselves to Him through faith. Between the conception out of Virgin and resurrection, there is therefore a tight connection. The son of God has formed His human nature out of Virgin not only for showing His freedom from the general law of the people's forming according to the species order, but also for setting a full mastery upon the animated body of the other people who have their souls weakened, for He has been having His soul strengthened since the beginning." (Stăniloae 1995: 146)

"In His non-passionate conceiving, Christ showed and He also exceeded, a more felt presence of God in the human being's birth, as it would have been happened if the man hadn't fallen. This is for God works even after falling, in the pair of people, to conceiving a new human being, but this work of His is covered by the violent sensation of the union between bodies, consequently to the exaggerated sensitizing of the bodies after the falling into sin. If the man and the woman hadn't been spiritually blunted, through their falling, to the feeling of the work of God in their bodily union, this would have been equivalent to an overwhelming of the bodily pleasure that dominated them. They would have felt, through their spiritual love not deprived of freedom, more intensely, the work and the freedom of God, and this would have imprinted also to the conceived child a more accentuated virtual power of the freedom. Although, what would have been conceived out of parents, it would have been too, a simple human hypostasis, if taken in itself. But, in the case of Christ, the human nature assumed by His Hypostasis, it doesn't consist of a hypostasis in itself. So, by being the effect of His exclusive work, as lived and as facilitated by the cleanness of the Virgin, His freedom is expressed in the will of His human nature. Maybe that's why the Holy Fathers said that the Son of God worked to His own conceiving, through His understanding soul. And one cannot deny the power of the spirit for triggering processes within body." (Stăniloae 1995: 146-157)

“The virgin lived the whole time previous to conception, in obedience to the God’s words, words which She felt as working within, the Word as Hypostasis. But, when She heard the Archangel’s words, She heard through that words the godlike hypostatical Word, as telling Her that He wanted to form through His humanity out of Her and, in the same time, She felt too, as already beginning, the forming of His humanity within Herself, or, in other words, She felt the Word in this work of His. “I the same time with the voice, She saw You, Lord, as embodied” - we say when reciting the “Akathist of the Annunciation” (Hymn I). The Word of God has the power, to make, when utters on Himself, out of Himself, the things He utters. This is for He has within Himself all the models which He gives a concrete existence to. How couldn’t have been Him able to produce His own human image out of Virgin, then? How couldn’t Him have had the power to make the Virgin to answer His Word, not only by word, but also with the whole Her being, and with the movement of Her being for forming His humanity out of Herself.” (Stăniloae 1995: 171)

“The Virgin is called in the Church’s hymns not only as the Mother of the Lord, but also as His Bride. He produced, through His creator power, within Virgin’s body, the movement of forming His humanity as concrete image of His Hypostasis, as concrete human image of His, image virtually existing within Himself.” (Stăniloae 1995: 171)

“The Virgin, with Her spiritual sensitiveness, She somehow hear spiritually, the Annunciation brought by Archangel, but She heard and She realized spiritually, that the Being She felt as coming nigh to Her, and Who spoke to Her, it wasn’t the supreme Being, because She felt the Archangel as fearfully speaking on behalf of the supreme Master. And She felt also the Master Himself speaking to Her. And His Word, of on Himself, as Person-Word, She felt Him as entering Her bodily being through Her spirit, and as starting to form His humanity within Her.” (Stăniloae 1995: 171-172)

“The Word of God firstly dwelled in the understanding soul of the Virgin, forming with Her consent, His understanding soul and full of the powers or full or the spiritual roots of His body and, by that, He formed His body out of the Virgin’s body. By dwelling into the Virgin’s human spirit, the Word firstly formed His human spirit, full of the spiritual roots of His body. The godlike Word dwells spiritually, in the most intimate communion with the Virgin, and She fully gave Herself, as gift, to Him. Out of this encounter, that is in the same time an interiorization, of His, within Her, it results the forming of His body in Her body. The virgin lived within Herself the godlike life of the Word, Who formed within Her His human nature, which grew up as life of the absolute Master. She started to live as Mother and as Bride of the absolute Master Who made Himself man, or as Her human Son. She lived that as her glorification, but with untold humbleness. She extolled God Who formed Himself as man, within Her. She extolled God Who extolled Her, by looking at the humbleness of His servant. She knows that all the nations will bless Her for this extolling brought to Her humbleness.” (Stăniloae 1995: 172)

“The Virgin didn’t receive the cleanness ever since Her conceiving out of Her parents, namely the lack of the ancestral sin, because She wasn’t brought out of the solidarity with the people from after falling, but She was elevated to this state through and for the conceiving of the Son of God as man, out of Her, through His first entry in union with the humanity, and that meant also Her decision for the full union with Him.” (Stăniloae 1995: 174)

“The Virgin was conscious Birth Giver, out of the power of the Holy Ghost and of the Son of God Himself, as man. She lived this totally supra-natural and overwhelming fact. The Holy Ghost gave Her the supreme conscience of that event taking place within Her, and He granted Her the quality as Birth Giver of God, giving Her the power to give birth, sinlessly, to the Son of God. By that, Herself was reborn, with a conscience and with an intensity exceeding any intensity of our conscience about the presence and the work of the Holy Ghost at our rebirth at our Baptism. This is for the Holy Ghost gave Her the living of an extraordinary work taking place in itself Her body. She entered a new life in order to give a new life to the humanity taken by the Son of God. She lived the fact that within Her was taking place not only the coming of the Person-Absolute, but also Her collaboration to His assuming of a new humanity out of Her. She lived a living communication between Her renewed body and the new body of the Word Who was forming within Her, and that meant that there was such a communication between Her conscience and the Word Himself.” (Stăniloae 1995: 177)

“The Virgin lived the Godhead of the One Who has made Himself as Her Son, differently than we live it. She lived it as the Godhead of Her Son Who born out of Her, as man, and Who has remained with Her in the affectionate relationship as Son with His Mother. We only live His Godhead as the Godhead of our Brother, but He is our Brother only according to humanity.” (Stăniloae 1995: 179)

“The Virgin Mary has ascended on the highest level towards God, amongst all people, and the greatest descend of the Good God towards people was that of the embodiment of the Son of God, being born out of Virgin Mary, and then through His sacrifice on the cross, for us, sacrifice that He bears in Him as deed of love, a sacrifice lived forever. And if the kindness can bend and it can overwhelm the rigid laws of the material matter, in the embodiment of the Son of God as man, this overwhelming reached a maximum degree for He has assumed our humanity.” (Stăniloae 1995: 180)

“In the union through faith, with Christ the absolute Subject, we feel too, this continuous ascension in the communion with the All-Kind One, descended, at His turn, to welcome us. And this living of ours, with Him, based on His descent towards us, it starts at Baptism. This living is a living of our transcendence too, that includes also the fact that the soul transcends beyond the body, and also the fact that the body itself, as crossed through by the soul, it transcends beyond itself. And, by this, the whole human being transcends towards God Who is the absolute Subject. Any human being can accomplish this transcendence, in his quality as image of God, for the human being has kept this quality as image of God, even after falling, for it is seeded in the human being’s nature as aspiration towards the Absolute. But the One reaching the most intense living of God - as Subject-Absolute - She is the Virgin, for Himself descended through Her soul within Her soul, and he even has made a body to Himself, out of Her body. That’s why She has reached to live the transcendent God within Herself, as Person differing from Her, but united, at maximum, with Her. In Christ, though, the humanity has reached even higher, for it has been lived and it is being eternally lived not as different Person, but as humanity of the Subject-Absolute Himself. The godlike Hypostasis is no longer a stranger, but it is own Hypostasis, and by this the humanity lives a maximum union, a union which the man cannot understand because he cannot experience it. In order to reiterate the difference between the living of God’s kindness by the human being and by Himself, we have to specify here that the human being lives this increased kindness out of God’s mercy, Who deigned to come, as man, to us, and the human being lives this kindness in an accentuated manner through the humbleness of God’s being, so that the human being feels by this too, how much God exceeds us through His kindness, namely, feeling even in this lowering His absolute superiority as God.” (Stăniloae 1995: 180-181)

“The Son of God has made Himself man out of Virgin also in order to overcome, since the beginning, the excessive sensitiveness of the body, that was easily inclined towards pleasure, after the human species falling off the tight connection with God, a fact that diminished the human spirit’s power for stopping the process of the body’s corruption, a process leading to the body’s death.” (Stăniloae 1995: 146)

“The embodied Son of God unites us within Church, or with Him through His Holy Ghost, and the Ghost, by penetrating within us with His holiness, He removes from us the whole passionate separation of the egotism. The Mother of the Lord, united with Her Son in the most intimate mode through the Holy Ghost, She helps us too, through Her closeness to us, to become spiritual, namely to become unified in Her Son, namely within Church.” (Stăniloae 1995: 66)

“The God’s act of reestablishing the connection with the human nature, this time for eternity and in the whole fulness, in order Him to exercise the whole His power for definitively escape, the human nature from death, it was an act of maximum union with the human nature, by assuming it as nature of His Person, but without ceasing to be Person of His godlike nature. And the positive answer given by the human being to His will, in order to be accomplished that maximal union, it came from the part of a human person too: from the part of Holy Virgin Mary. And this maximal union wanted by God and accepted by the human being, it cannot be explained except through love.” (Stăniloae 1995: 68)

“Given the fact that in Christ one nature belongs to God and the other is created by Him, namely one nature belongs to God Who shows in His creator power His absolute freedom towards creation, and that in the created nature it is shown the fact that this one is totally dependent on God in its coming to existence, this freedom of God Who has made Himself man and the dependence of Him of His human nature in what regard its coming to existence, it is shown also in the mode in which God-the Word has brought His human nature to existence, and which He has united his human nature with His godlike nature in. Being preexistent from ever, as Hypostasis of His godlike nature, He “has assumed” His human nature, by using to a certain extent, His creator power, which he has formed His human nature without man’s seed, but out of Virgin Mary, in order to still maintain the human nature assumed by Him in solidarity with everybody’s human nature. He hasn’t made Himself man through the power of a general law, of course a law established by Himself, in virtue of which any human being is born without being consulted, as an individual of the general species, through the bringing to existence of a new soul, united with a new body, in a unique person, a person differing from the godlike Person and from any other human persons.” (Stăniloae 1995: 145-146)

Body

“Only the human subject – to not say here about the angelic subject – he is simple in his spiritual foundation. But for his completeness he needs also a body composed out of numerous identical and various elements, as he also need the world, out of which his body is taken, the world being his environment of thinking and of activity.”

“The human body has, at its turn, its rationality too. Even the human being it has his being, as one that is always constituted of body and soul. But in each component and in each connection from within body, there is a something higher than what can be comprised through the analytic rationality. Thus, in this total rationality itself, of each unity, there already is a meaning, that can be intuited, but it cannot be strictly know and defined. There is a meaning that is intuited increasingly more and to which belongs the endless and always new connections each one is seen into. The mind, or the rationality, as understanding, it sees in this higher meaning also all kinds of connections between the diverse unities and in understanding of each unity it takes in account the other unities. This also highlights the more complete rationality of each thing. There is therefore a general logos of the unities’ logos, or one above the logos of all logos-es. The more general rationality is the meaning or the richness of meanings of a thing connected to the rationalities and to the meanings of all its components and to all the other things.” (2003: 362-363)

“According to the Christian faith, the body is, in a particular manner, internal to the spirit, participating by this to the spirit’s life, by exceeding the biological and physical-chemical plan. In body, the rationality receives a particular complexity, due to the richness of the spirit from the body. At its turn, the rationality of the spirit himself is being actualized in a complexity of great finesse and subtlety, in the work upon the body. Besides that, the sensitiveness of the matter, already accompanied by the pain and by the pleasure in the animals’ organisms, they are reflected in the human spirit as a pain and a pleasure lived by conscience with a special intensity. But this sensitiveness, live by spirit and by body in common, it com poses a unity and it is itself an occasion of development and of actualizing the spirit’s rationality, either for placing this spirit’s rationality lived through the body in the service of the sensitiveness in a manner that is damaging to the human freedom, or in order to strengthen this rationality, still through body, towards fortifying the spiritual liberty against the body’s sensitiveness.” (2003: 382)

“The body’s life is thus constitutive part of the life of our soul, whose basis is the spirit. This life is in the same time the first contingent object of the spirit’s freedom, which either let the life to go down to the state of almost automatic processes, by weakening the spirit’s freedom, or it imprints in the life a increasingly greater spiritual liberty. In the second case, through the body is being exercised upon the world, in a more accentuated manner, the freedom of the spirit, and the world is thus elevated by the spirit towards the superior purpose of being united to the supreme spirit. Without a body, the human spirit wouldn't have been able to modify the world's movements, but these movements would have remained determined by causes purely intrinsic to the exterior world and extrinsic to the spirit. Participating to the spirit as subject, the body cannot be defined purely as object. The man's body isn't only matter, or only materialized rationality as object the man's body is a matter made subject, participating to the spirit as subject; In my body's reality there is something that transcends the body's materiality and its purely automatic movements, something that cannot be reduced to the body's material properties." (2003: 383)

"There is a partial non-objectivity of the body. If my body had been a simple subject, it would have been as stranger to me as the external nature, and it wouldn't have been an intermediary between my spirit and the exterior world. My body can by no means to become a complete image of mine, as other objects can, because my body is part of my subject who notices the image of the other objects. Neither the body of somebody else, in its quality of participant to the subject of that man can, it cannot become totally a subject to me. I can see the interior of my body, or of somebody else's body, radiographed, and therefore in movement, but I cannot see its quality of subject that sees it as an object. My body forms together with my spirit, the subjective screen of the images of all the objects. But in order to do this my body must be in the same time in a connection with those images. My body is partially a subject, and it is partially an object. My body takes part to my act of thinking and of feeling all the objects, but it is also object of thinking and feeling. I feel my body as object and my body takes part to the feeling I have about it as object, in its quality of participant to my subjectivity. I feel the whole world and I think at the whole world, through my body. The pain is object of my feeling and a subjective act of feeling. And not only the body, but the world itself take part through my body to the act of feeling through my body, by remaining an object of the feeling." (2003: 383-384)

"The body cannot be understood without the spirit who has organized the body and who penetrates the body, by combining the rationalities of diverse material elements in the system of rationalities of the body, through which are being manifested the spirit's rationalities. The body is being continuously adapted to the spirit, or the body is being imprinted in a particular manner by the spirit. The body is the first reserve of countless material contingent possibilities, which are actualized by the spirit through his equally many possibilities able to be actualized. Without a body, the spirit's possibility couldn't have been actualized. In a way, the soul himself is formed through the body, or the soul receives a seal of the body." (2003: 384)

“It has been said that the body is the image and the prime and fundamental sensation of all the images and of all the sensations of the human subject. The body isn’t only the object-image, or the object-sensation, but the body is also the subject-image or the subject-sensation. The body belongs, on one hand, to the subject who notices the images and who feels the objects, together with the spirit, and on the other hand, the body is the fundamental image and sensation the other images and sensations are gathered in. The body has the same role in the order of the action too. Upon the body it works, on one hand, the spirit, and on the other hand, the body participates to the work of the spirit. The body makes the crossing from the active subject to the objects’ world which is submitted to his activity, the body being both subject and object.” (2003: 384)

“This great mystery of the body being formed as participant to the spirit’s subjectivity, it wouldn’t have been possible without a certain rational character of the matter. The rational spirit as subject he penetrates the matter’s rationality and it assimilates it to the rationality of his body as participant to the spirit’s subjectivity. The spirit does this by impropriating the materialized rational sensitiveness, or the rationality sensitized as matter. This opens the perspective for the entire cosmos to be made subject, by each human subject, namely the perspective the cosmos to be live by each man in its rationality and sensitiveness.” (2003: 384-385)

“The body is a mystery and it must be respected as such. The body is, in a way, transcendent to our understanding and to our arbitrariness, for our body isn’t produced by us, neither by our parents, nor simply by nature. We aren’t allowed to let our body prey to the inferior impulses in report with the nature. In such a case, we ourselves fall from the state of subject to the state of nature, and we become enslaved to the nature. The destination of the body is that the human spirit to work through the body the transfiguration or the spiritualization of the entire cosmos, of the entire nature. The body must be ennobled and transfigured or spiritualized in its feelings, in order through the body the world to be transfigured by us. We are given this example and this power by Christ.” (2003: 385)

“The actualization of the world’s contingency, and through this the elevation of the world to increasingly spiritualized states, in the same time with the man who transcends himself towards the communion with the infinite Person, and towards the continuous enrichment from the infinite Person, it is a work of the human spirit into body. The world itself, without the human spirit, it wouldn’t have been able to get off the rigid, linear frame, of an automatic repetition. The embodied human spirit is a mirror that, through the feeling and the thinking mediated by the body it gathers in himself, in a conscious manner, the things’ rationalities and images, by making out of the whole world a unitary image of his conscience, on the basis of which he intervenes in a certain manner into things, in the nature's forces, by combining them and by directing them as he wants, in a good transcending, when he moves according to his true aspiration and rationality." (2003: 386)

"The man's body is a palpable reality, a concrete and special reality, in connection with the palpable, concrete reality of the nature. The human body represents the most complex system of materialized rationality. If the materialized rationality of the mineral, vegetal, and animal order, it has its origin in a creator act of God, Who has given this rationality an own existence through materialization, as to an image of the endlessly complex divine rationality, and if the actualization of this complex materialized rationality it develops its potencies, continuously led by the influence of the divine rationality, in the human body this materialized rationality it reaches its maximum complexity." (2003: 392)

"The body, as materialized rationality, it ceases to exist once dead. The soul though isn't one with this palpable and special rationality of the body and that's why the soul doesn't cease to exist when the body does it. This is for the soul, whose presence gives the palpable reality of the matter the quality of proper-said body, it is a subjective, conscious rationality, exceeding the whole rationality and the whole passive sensitiveness of the nature." (2003: 392)

"The body, as participant to the conscious and free subjectivity of the man, it isn't identical to the materialized rationality of the general nature. The body differs from all the material nature by the presence of the soul within it. The body isn't only a part of the materialized rationality of the general nature, but it is a human body crossed through by soul. But the human body had into nature as materialized rationality a reality that is somehow able to be transformed in a body capable of special reasoning and sensitiveness, or of participating to the conscious and free rationality of the soul." (2003: 392-393)

"The soul must be within body from the beginning of the body's forming, in order the body to have this special complexity adequate to the soul, and to offer the adequate environment for the spiritual movement, namely for the soul's conscious and free thinking and will. It is right that the Genesis tells us that God firstly formed the body out of dust and then He instilled the soul. But we must understand this in the sense that since the human body started forming with a maximum biological complexity, the body had within it the soul instilled by God, through which God contributed in a special way to the accomplishing of the human biological organism that has a maximum complexity. That's why the forming of the body is considered in the Genesis as a special creator act of God." (2003: 396-396)

“The fact that the body and the soul come to existence as a unity, but not as the unity of a sole substance, it cannot be explained except by the fact that at the beginning the man was created by God, and then, through birth, out of the pair of humans existent as unities, by the propagation of the man-species or of the human hypostases in the frame of the same species formed by free subjects. The mystery of the union of the soul and of the body in the individual man, it hints towards the existence of the man-species, as union between soul and body.” (2003: 396-397)

“The body is entirely an apparatus of endless sensitiveness. Into body is perceives in an endlessly varied manner all the vibration of the world with its forms in continuous movement, as well as through the body too it is expressed the equally complex relation of the person with the world. The body is the apparatus of as inexhaustible sensitiveness and expressivity. But the sensitiveness is conscious and the development of this expressivity it depends in a great measure on will. Through the body the man interleaves himself as factor which interrupts the nature’s processes, by establishing wanted, spiritual-natural connections. Through sensations, the man elevates himself to the meanings which are superior to the sensations from the nature, and he establishes in the nature connections which are conform to intended meanings. Into body the spirit and the world meet one another, the spirit which endlessly shapes the body in order the body to notice the world, as also the reaction to the world. More than that, the spirit expresses his infinite nature, on one hand with the superior spiritual order, and on the other hand with the world’s order, by connecting them together. The spirit elevated the world through the body in the superior horizon and he imprints that horizon to the world.” (2003: 399)

“Unlike Barlaam, who asked for a total killing of the passionate part of the soul, Saint Gregory Palamas didn’t ask for an annulling of it, which is connected to the body (wrath and desire), but he asked to be put in the service of the good and of love.” (2003: 402)

“The intimate insertion of the spirit into body and its qualification starting on the first moment of his existence as embodied spirit, or as soul, it doesn’t mean that the soul cannot exist after death and before the resurrection of the body, because of no longer being into body. The spirit brings with himself his qualification as soul of the body, with the roots of the body deepened within him during life. This fact too, it shows that the soul is a factor that differs from the body, but without being pure spirit and unqualified through body, with which he lives in a certain place and time.” (2003: 403)

“Genesis specifies that the act of the man’s creation it is a special act in the part referring to the body too. On one hand the man is a being differing from nature, and on the other hand, a unitary and compose being in the same time. Likewise, the act of the man’s creation it differs from the nature’s creation. The man is unitary and bifurcate in the same time. The act of man’s creation differs from the act of the nature’s creation even in its composition referring to the body. God made the body by ‘taking dust of the ground’, so he didn’t order the earth to produce it giving the earth power on this purpose. By this, God made different the man’s body from the rest of the nature, more than the animals’ bodies differ from nature. God made the body for the soul which is especially kindred with God.” (2003: 406)

“The malleable nature it has within the corruptibility and the corruptibility is being actualized because of the nature remains by itself, without soul, and the soul remains by himself, without God. But through the soul who is partaker to God, the nature can achieve the incorruptibility.” (2003: 433)

“The glory we have is one with the irradiation of the good fragrance of Christ’s surrender to the Father, but it is, in the same time, the irradiation of the unique divine-human Person, to Who the body isn’t a barrier. This is because though the body is the occasion of living the communion with the Person of Christ, we forget about His body, as we forget about ours too, said Saint Apostle Paul (II Cor. 5: 16; 12: 2).” (Stăniloae 2006: 74).

“The body won’t cease to exist, but it will be transparent, so that, without mediation, we will see God into glory, everything being spiritualized, everybody and all the things will belong to everybody, beyond the division between subjective and objective, beyond the nature’s chains, beyond the passionate struggle for mastering the nature and the others as seen like external objects, and beyond everyone’s fight for defending himself against others. Only the resurrection opens us the perspective of escaping from the nature’s fatality that leads to death, and it opens a plan worthy of us and of our aspirations; and in the same time with this, it opens us the perspective of an increasingly deeper sensitiveness and delicacy. Only the resurrection will escape us from the wrong struggle for providing to ourselves an ephemeral existence, with the price of taking advantage on others, with the price of some imaginary experiences fulfilled through pleasures, and through conceited and hollow achievements.” (Stăniloae 2006: 75-76)

“The human body has in itself a unitary rationality corresponding to the rationality placed in the man’s head. But the rationality of the man’s head imprints, or shapes, according to itself, the body’s rationality. Then the head gives the entire body an orientation, a light which is projected around the body and much further. The entire body can move itself, thus, in the light in which the head it moves.” (Stăniloae 2006: 90)

“Christ’s Resurrection and Ascent with His body, they actualize – by His inhabiting within us – His quality as Head of the Church, the Church coming to existence by this, especially for the Church makes the churchly community to receive in the Head-Christ the beginning of the eternal life and to see the endless perspective of this life with the body, and even to taste something out of it. The Church’s community receives through Resurrection, the perspective and the earnest of the resurrection and of the eternal life. The Church has imprinted the virtuality of the resurrection but not only in the Christ’s body as Person dwelling within Church, but also in the beings of the ones who compose the Church as mysterious body of Christ. This is for their souls are filled up with the power of the Ghost of the Resurrected Christ Who is going to make them capable, at the end of the time, to bring back their bodies to an incorruptible life. Their souls are filled up with the power of the Ghost of Christ, Who is full of the powers of the sacrificed and resurrected body of Christ, through the Church’s Mysteries, through their living animated by the Ghost of the Resurrected Christ and by the power of His resurrected body. And this has an effect also upon their bodies whilst still being alive, and this effect is going to bring their bodies to resurrection at the end of the time.” (Stăniloae 2006: 94-95)

“Christ’s resurrection highlighted the signification of His life that was obedient until death, as liberation of the man from himself and from the inferior powers, in order to be capable of the endless relation of love with God. Through this, we know that through our life of loving obedience, of sacrifice, or of forgiveness and advancing into virtues, we advance towards resurrection. We know that, by not belonging to this world, or to the sin, we belong to the kingdom of the resurrection. We know that by not having lasting stronghold on this earth, on which all the things are destined to death, we have imperishable citizenship in heavens (Hebr. 13: 14; Acts 3: 20). This is for the sacrificed Christ – for He is imprinted in us - He walks the road towards His resurrection within us and towards our resurrection together with Him. The Church is pilgrim towards heavens for Christ is the way to heavens and The One Who travels with the Church and within the Church towards heavens. This doesn’t mean that the Church’s members aren’t active on earth, but their activity doesn’t have as sole purpose to sustain the body, like everything would come to an end with their death. But, through their activity, they lay down the foundations of the eternal communion with the Son of God become man, and with their fellow humans. They help other materially too. But by doing this, they want to lay down the foundations of a love which to last eternally. Namely, they do not see only their own and the bodies of others. They do not serve the corruptibility. They do not toil for something that is being corrupted, as the Danaids by pouring water in a bottomless barrel.” (Stăniloae 2006: 95)

“The Mysteries highlight - as the Lord’s embodiment does too - the great importance of the human body and its eternal value as environment transparent to the godlike richness and depths. Within body there is the whole soul, and the soul can become within body increasingly overwhelming, on the measure the soul is being filled up with godhead, and the godhead itself unveils through the human body, increasingly more, its infinite dimensions and richness. And in Christ there dwells the whole plenitude of the godhead (Col. 2: 9). Sanctifying the body, it means sanctifying the soul as well, or to make the soul increasingly transparent environment and increasingly adequate organ to the godhead presence. Any body’s gesture it has repercussions upon the soul’s life, and any thought or feeling from the soul has repercussions upon within body. The thinner, the cleaner, and the more nuanced feelings of the soul, the more they are manifested within body. The body’s clean feelings are being imprinted into the soul. But the body’s feelings have become clean by the will of the soul. And these feelings, by being imprinted in the soul forever and ever, when the soul will resurrect his body, the soul will extend within body the cleanness of his (the soul’s) feelings. It is impossible to totally detach the body’s soul from the body’s roots, as it is impossible too, to see within body only matter, since the body is materializing rationalization which is fully lightened through the conscious rationality and opened to the infinite rationality of God, or it is darkened, in the absence of the work of That One within it. The materialized rationality into Body it is influence by the subjective rationality of everyone or by the soul’s conscience and will. This explains the possibility for the body to have its roots into body and to imprint its feelings into the soul, and vice versa. Thus, the soul can lead the body towards the state of an organ that fulfills the cleanest and the noblest aspirations of the soul. The body becomes transparent to the man’s personal characteristics, namely to his specific personal features, and one can see through the body the whole road the man walked during his life. Thus, the objective materialized rationality into body, it bears within itself the mark of the human person’s subjective rationality, or it imprints its own in the human spiritual subject. That’s why, even after the body’s detaching, the body’s mark remains imprinted in the soul’s subjectivity.” (Stăniloae 1997: 10)

“The body’s sensitiveness it becomes specific to a person and as such it is shown not only into the body, but also into the soul. But it happens also the vice versa: in the soul’s subjective rationality and in the soul’s conscious sensitiveness, there could be imprinted the purity or the defilement, within which the body’s life has been lived, and which the body’s sensitiveness has been imprinted with, and it will remain within soul until resurrection, when the soul will imprint that to the resurrected body.” (Stăniloae 1997: 10)

“By and large, one cannot live a clean life into a defiled body. That’s why, a spirituality limited only to ideas, no matter how refined it would be, it is not the spirituality or the man's total spiritual state, in its Christian meaning." (Stăniloae 1997: 11)

"In the objective rationality and in the subjective sensitiveness of the Christ's body, there have been imprinted not only the mark of the Christ's human clean soul's rationality and subjective sensitiveness, but, by these ones, it has been imprinted also the subjective mark of supreme light, cleanness, and power, of the godhead. And through this they are communicated, through seen works touching our body, both to our body and soul." (Stăniloae 1997: 11)

"There takes place a reciprocity between soul and body. Everything the body's sense touch, it is imprinted to the soul, and all the body's sensations bear within them the mark of the soul's specific feeling and they are framed in the light of the soul's more superficial or deeper understanding. One cannot influence the soul without working upon the body, and any influence the body receives it bears the mark of the soul. In the same time, the soul manifests through the body his specific way of being and the whole quality of cleanness of or defilement the soul has achieved, and therefore also his state of cleanness received from Christ through the Mysteries which touch our body." (Stăniloae 1997: 11)

"The Word of God has taken a body in order to gather in Himself, in the Mystery of the unity of God with the creation, not only the soul but the bodies too. As the body of Christ isn't only an intuitive symbol of the godhead separated from Him, but His body is framed within His soul and godhead, likewise our soul can be united, in a real manner, with the Christ's godhead, by being our body touched by the Christ's body. It happens something analogue to the flowing of the power produced through Christ's body when the sick people were touching His vestments. But, for Christ's body has become pneumatized and invisible through ascent, still remaining a unitary constituted body, His body's touch on our body is no longer visible, but it is being used the matter which our body stays in connection with. Christ wants to sanctify our body by using the matter, not in a mode detached from the material world the body stays in touching with, or out of which the body is nourished, is watered, and by which is penetrated and which is being imprinted through its sensations within the soul, but by filling the matter up, as well, with His power. That's why He chooses for Mysteries, out of all the matter's forms, the ones which are fundamental for the needs of sustaining the human body: the bread, the water, the oil, and the wine." (Stăniloae 1997: 11-12)

"Anointing the main limbs and the senses' organs, it is shown the importance the Church grants– or, through Church, Christ – to the human body, importance Christ has shown it by His embodiment. Through body it is enriched and it is given a good or a bad orientation to the man's life in total. Through body the man is communicated even the Holy Ghost. This is for the body is crossed through by senses, and through senses works both the soul and the mind, which can open themselves and give themselves as gift to God. Consequently, through soul and mind works and communicates Himself God Himself. There cannot be a sanctification of the man without the sanctification of his body. But the Ghost has been poured in the Lord's body too, and out of Him the Ghost irradiates within our body as well." (Stăniloae 1997: 53)

"Like the Son of God has come into body in order to open in Himself, for us, the entrance at the Father, and He is thus the unique man in Whom we are united with the Father and amongst ourselves, likewise he uses people in body and one man for each community of believers, in order to keep us united with Himself. And the man whom He has chosen, he must impart himself with Christ's holiness, in order Christ's holiness to be extended through the man as unifier power. The believers must have in this man taken from amongst them – like it has been taken Christ's human nature out of us – an organ chosen from above, as a means of their unification with Christ Whom this man represents. Through the priests is working Christ Himself, as the unique Priest per se, for the seen and unseen unification of the people in Himself. By having Christ as the unique Priest working through them, the priests are the seen organs of His unseen priesthood. Christ hasn't taken his hand for nothing; but, for he no longer works with the hand in a visible manner, His hand is active through the hand of the ones through whom He prolongs His unseen Priesthood in the seen plan. Likewise, for no longer uttering with His mouth, in a seen manner, His words, he utters them in an unseen manner through the mouth of the seen organs of His Priesthood. He works through the hand of these ones for they do all the sanctifier gestures and they say all His words and prayers towards Him too, with the conscience that they serve Him, or with Him, and, through Him to the Father. The human body is important not only when the Mysteries are received through it, but also when the Mysteries are committed, for it is active through it the Ghost out of the Christ's body." (Stăniloae 1997: 100)

"After the Revelation, the man is an active being and therefore he is complete only into body. The man works for his consummation through the spiritualization of his body, namely by the fact that he makes of the body an environment of the good feelings and deeds." (Stăniloae 1997: 166)

"Our life will find a meaning only if it crosses through death to the plenitude of the eternal life. But the man won't be able to obtain this plenitude if he cannot live it also in his resurrected and liberated from corruptibility body. This is for the human complete life is the life into body, which gives the human existence a specific complexity and makes the man able to give the spiritual life a beauty in the richness and in the harmony of the seen forms.” (Stăniloae 1997: 237)

“The unique and complete of the human life into body it was highlighted by the Son of God, Who has assumed the human body and he has resurrected the body for eternity. Thus, God has justified the creation of the matter which, through the assuming of the body and through resurrecting the body, it has been elevated on the plan of the culminant participation to God’s spirituality, not letting the individual body prey to the eternal decomposition.” (Stăniloae 1997: 237)

“The Holy Fathers’ conception is that the world and the bodies will be resurrected for God has made them good and He doesn’t change his mind upon His decision regarding their existence. Some Saints called the body as “our brother”, and Seraphim of Sarov calls it as “our friend”.” (Stăniloae 1997: 279)

“In the burial songs the body is called as “our beauty in the image of God”, or “the image of the untold glory of God”. Saint Gregory of Nyssa calls the body as “collaborator”, or constitutive part of the man, which the man isn’t man without. But it is a collaborator of the individual man, and not of the collective man.” (Stăniloae 1997: 279)

“The mystery of the resurrected body and of the restored universe it is the mystery of the spiritualized matter. But the matter isn’t a monotonous uniformity, but it is organized in units tied amongst through their “rationalities”. And the man’s body is equally destined to its eternity in its uniqueness, as it is the man’s soul too, as it is the man’s person. Through the Holy Ghost the individual body of the Lord is transfigured on Mount Tabor, anticipating His state from after resurrection and at His second coming. Through the Holy Ghost extended in the resurrected bodies, these ones will be in the image of the Lord’s body, but they won’t be confounded either to it or amongst themselves.” (Stăniloae 1997: 280)

“The resurrected bodies remain unchanged according to the nature, but they will be spiritualized. The body will be changed from corruptible in incorruptible, and it will be elevated from the state of humbleness to the height of the brightness. But the bodies won’t cease to be bodies neither the body will get out of its own natural state. But the body will be elevated from mortal to immortal. “It is sown in corruption, it is elevated in incorruptibility: it is sown in dishonor, it is elevated into glory; it is sown into weakness, it is elevated to power; it is sown a soul’s body, it is elevated spiritual body” (Nicephori, Patr. Constantinop., Antirretica, cap. XLI, la I. Pitra, Spicilegium, tom. I, p. 433.). Even the bodies of the righteous ones from now they are spiritual, through the work of the Ghost Who is dwelling within those bodies. But then the bodies will be thinner and lighter, in order to be able to walk through the air, and more spiritual. The speakers about God they say that the Ghost will ceaselessly remain within their bodies. That's why we believe that there will be both flesh and body (και σαρκα και σωμα). They won't be unnoticeable as neither the body of Christ will be unnoticeable." (Stăniloae 1997: 280-281)

"But we cannot now understand the mystery of the spiritualized matter. Anyway, the spiritualize matter will be elevated by the Ghost on a new plan of the existence, which will differ from the animated matter of our earthly body much more than this one differs from the inanimate matter. The extraordinarily complex brain circumvolutions present the complexity of the attention and of the reactions to all the states of others' conscience. Corresponding to them, the entire matter of the body is organized in a much more refined unity, more complex, more specific, and more penetrated by spirit than the one of the animals. The conscience and the relations amongst consciences give the whole special complexity of the human body. Thus, as each body is organized in a uniqueness of great finesse, penetrated by the unique and complex work of the own soul, for through it to be able to see, to hear, to uniquely feel all the different persons, likewise it will be, or even much more organized, on the highest plan of the maximum spiritualization of the nature." (Stăniloae 1997: 281)

"Nobody can describe the mystery and the functions of the spiritualized body. Nobody can describe its spiritual sensitiveness, its capacity of expression of extraordinary finesse of noticing. Nobody can describe the state of the spiritualized matter of the entire universe. We know that in that matter there won't be corruptibility, oldness, death, and that it will receive an eternal youth, an unimaginable brightness and beauty, in order to correspond to the state of the resurrected bodies, given the communication and the solidarity between the matter of our body and that one from universe. This is for though then won't be a feeding and an elimination of matter, though then still will be a much greater communication between our body's matter and the matter of the universe; there won't be a complete immobility of the matter, but neither a violent agitation. The material energy will be unchained from the chains from now, and it will even be potentiated, being increased by the energy of the supreme spirit. But the power of the supreme spirit will move the matter in a serene order and harmony. The matter's movement laws, in the first place of the bodies, they will be overwhelmed by the laws of the Spirit and of the love, the matter being elevated on the plan of a superior order. We cannot understand now such a state of the matter, except still in a naturalistic manner. But that state will be the effect of a great efficiency of the spirit, and all the new qualities of the matter will be influenced by that. We can see now that there exists a young matter and an old matter, a nimble and full of force and agility matter, and an aged, clumsy, sclerotic matter. Or we see what the young matter becomes old like, especially in organisms. The matter of the resurrected universe will be an eternally young, diaphanous, perfectly transparent, and of a great finesse of the beauties of the spiritual state and movements, without ceasing to have the capacity of some forms and a consistency. The forms will be the thinnest expression of the spiritual states, and the consistency will be full of elasticity, if we are to use some terms from the present world. The transformed universe will have an untold beauty of great finesse and expressive depths, and the bodies, likewise, if the sensitive beauty consists of the transparency of the infinite complexity of the spirit through the matter's forms, in the matter's transfiguration by the infinite richness of the spirit's dimensions. That's why some Christian thinkers say that the eternal happiness will consist of beauty." (Stăniloae 1997: 281-282)

"Towards the state of holiness, of spiritualization, are elevate somewhat still in this life, the ascetic, the saint. That's why nobody understand like the saint does, the value, the beauty of the human body and its great importance, for the saint experience a body cleaned up of everything that is violent sensation, for he manifests through his body the thinnest delicacy in noticing the spiritual states of the other people and of his own. Also, nobody can see and experience the world like the saint does, as an endlessly nuanced and rich wonder of God." (Stăniloae 1997: 282)

"The state of the resurrected bodies of the sinner will be different. They will be incorruptible too, but in the same time able to feel the torments. They will have a lack of rottenness too, but in an evil sense, as an eternally living flesh." (Stăniloae 1997: 286)

"The human body is a special palpable reality by the fact that it has in itself from the beginning the special work of the soul, imprinted in the human body with the whole complexity of his rational activities and of his forms of sensitiveness." (2003: 392)

"An analogy we would have in the report of the body with the human subject. If the body had stood by itself, it would have been its own center and the bearer of the movements. But, in togetherness with the soul, it has taken the function of a subject of this one, the role of a bearer of all body movements¹⁸." (Stăniloae 1993)

¹⁸ The archpriest P. SVETLOV clarifies the mystery of the hypostatic union: "Every man bears in him the resolution of the mystery of the embodiment or of union in Christ of the two natures in one person undivided, not separated, unmixed, and unchanged, what into man it is his «self», that determined or individual personality which is composed of his spiritual and material features, from soul and body. Without body, and even more without an own body, different to everybody, the man cannot be a full man, a determined personality: every human «self» not only thinks, wants etc. but he also sees, feels, moves etc.; that why the body features, like the soul ones, they compose the distinct property of each person, and they enter in its determination. Though,

“We saw that a part of a substance separated from a vaster whole it gains its own center of movements. But it can be ascertained also the reverse phenomenon: a part of substance rounded into an apart hypostasis, if it is placed back into the continuity of a vaster whole, it won’t continue having the center of its movement in itself, but, somehow, this center will have moved into the center of the larger unity, without that part of the substance losing something of its character. Its need for movement, its kinds of work, they are not annihilated, and they are not directed from the own center, but from the center of the whole. This center of the whole has assumed also the function of center and guide of the part. And this center of the bigger unity it does not choke the part’s needs for manifestation, but it also receives the characteristics of the center of it. The laws to which the matter of our body would be subjected, when it would stay by itself, are felt by the whole subject of our being since the matter it has been taken into our being. The acts of feeding and changing of our body’s matter, they are acts of the same unique center from us, once the body is a part of this unity. Though the subject from us is of spiritual origin, he has become like a material center - in what concerns the matter from within us - and it has taken its countenance, even if to his basis he has a spiritual character.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Of course, the body, by the fact that it has a common center with the spiritual nature from within us, it experiences a spiritualization, an accordance with a higher order. But its nature does not suffer any changing.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Something analogue we find in the human nature constitution, where the soul, even he doesn’t gain the features and the material works of the body, he stays into a connection with them, by bearing them through the person’s unity and by imprinting into them His seal, and vice versa, the body is despite the close union, indivisible, of two natures into a human personality, each of them preserves its integrity and its relative independence, like two separate beings, without fusion and without mixing with one another. What is bodily into man it remains bodily or material, and what is spiritual it remains spiritual, and only the man, his «self», he is in the union of one with another, but without being one fully found into another, and remaining above of one or another, but serving like point or center of the union both the bodily ones and spiritual ones. Put in the place of the human «self» the godlike «Self» or the Person of the Word, in the place of the soul, the Godhead, in the place of the body, the humankind, and this analogy will enlighten the mystery of the embodiment in such a measure, that it almost will lose the appearance of a mystery that is entirely unsearchable for the rationality”. The Christian Teaching in Apologetic Presentation, vol. II, translated in Romanian language by Serghie Bejan and Constantin Tomescu, Chisinau, 1936, 586 – 7.

making itself bearer and determinant factor of the soul's features and acts." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The subject, though, he is not produced and he does not exist according to the natural laws. Though the laws which direct the physical life of the man are the same existing in the entire physical universe, nowhere these laws produce subjects anymore. Though needs a body which to function according to the laws of the nature, though he manifests through his body, the subject cannot owe his beginning only to these laws of the body and his love develops on a plan superior to them. That is why, a ceasing of the biological life of the body, produced according to some natural laws, it cannot mean eo ipso and a ceasing of the existence of the subject. He can no longer manifest himself through the bodily environment, which is usual in our world, but its abolishment cannot be, by any means, the direct product, the organic product, of a phenomenon of a natural order. The death experienced at others, and it cannot demonstrate the abolishment of those subjects. That death only tells us that a subject ceased to exist into the world accessible to us. In order to the abolished, by and large, a subject, there should take place, beyond the natural, experimental phenomenon, of the physical death of the others, an act of another character than the one owed to the natural laws." (Stăniloae 1993)

"A contrary, by applying the logical cogitation to some data of the experience, these data can provide us, indirectly, deductively, a series of very plausible arguments on the continuation of the spiritual principle from within us also after the disintegration of the body¹⁹." (Stăniloae 1993)

"A number of contemporary researchers, by observing some spiritual phenomena, they have drawn the conclusion that the body is not a fully adequate environment, which our spiritual life to manifest through, but it is a "limit and a barrier". Out of this conclusion they have pulled out a powerful argument for the immortality of the soul. We present, according to mister Ion Petrovici, an exposure of these phenomena and of the conclusion derived from them²⁰. "On the deep plan of our memory there exists the totality of our memories, but they are not actualized in the conscience all in the same time, but as more as our cerebral mechanism allows it, which always – even when functions perfectly – sorts, one by one, our memories, by letting to pass into the conscience only the ones which are useful in that moment and to our individual preservation. (Anybody can imagine what danger would represent to this preservation, the simultaneous invasion into the conscience of all our memories!). When the problem of the preservation – which interests especially our cerebral mechanism – it eventually isn't put anymore, then this apparatus of selection does not function anymore, the dam breaks and the whole deposit of our memories overflowed into the conscience. Bergson brings, in this regard, an impressive example: the people who were on the point to drown themselves, they tell us that, on the moment which they have lost their conscience, they had the integral vision of their life, the complete kaleidoscope of all their memories". (Stăniloae 1993)

¹⁹ One can find a lot of new arguments, extracted from the results of the modern psychology and science and presented by the Romanian philosopher Ion Petrovici in the study entitled "Dincolo de orizont" ("Beyond Horizon"), published in the magazine Gândul (The Thought), September, 1939.

²⁰ "Beyond Horizon", in "The Thought", September, 1939.

"Another domain, which shows that the body is a limit, an impediment to the full manifestation of our spirit, it is that of the rationality. The shapes of the rationality succeed to embrace and to organize somewhat the field of the sensitive world, but into a very incomplete way. "A partial matching between our spirit and the sensitive world, of course there exists, but there's not a perfect superposition. Our spirit cannot accomplish his fundamental exigencies in the surrounding world, and his shapes seem like heterogenic frames, which are clumsily and imperfectly applied. For sure, not this world is his natural arena, but he has the right to wait for another world, into which to fully and happily accomplish himself". (Stăniloae 1993)

"At least in the domain of the sentiment, the love cannot be completely accomplished due to the corporal separation. The complete union is impeded by the wall of the body. The heroes of Wagner: Tristan and Isolde, from too much love, they shatter their bodily covers, to no longer be impeded from the perfect union." (Stăniloae 1993)

"But, if the body is a creation of God, constituting the natural environment for the manifestation of the human spirit and, if it isn't the body the cause of the sin and of the spiritual life narrowing, its destruction won't be but a condition for its renewal, for its raising into a form which no longer wears the stigma of the sin. Who believes that the man is created by God, namely like a whole composed of body and soul, and who also believes that the sin didn't definitively destroyed this creature, that one must believe in the resurrection of the bodies like into a necessary conclusion, namely he must believe in the restoration of the man, as a whole." (Stăniloae 1993)

“But here isn’t important the time which the resurrection will take place at, but it is important the fact that it will take place once. The signification of this fact is that a happy existence of the soul after death it is not full without a body. The body, far from being the cause of the lack of the fullness of the man’s spiritual life, it is a condition for this fullness. But, this isn’t the body of the earthy life, of which structure bears the traces of the sin, but it is the resurrected body, which won’t bear these traces anymore. In this way, the spiritual life of the man after death, it is superior to the one with the body from here, but the one from the resurrected body will be superior also to the last one.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“It is the place, therefore, to ask ourselves the question: it is presented the report between the soul and the body in such a way that the body to appear only like a barrier to the soul, and not like an instrument which eases the spiritual community amongst people? If the body would present to us in all the regards only like an impediment to the spiritual life, we can conclude that this function belongs to the body’s being itself. But, if in other regards the body appears to us like a happy environment for the manifestation of the spirit, if the function of the body like a barrier is confronted to a function of the body like a mean of soul’s revealing, then we are justified to affirm that the body is meant to ease the showing of the soul, and not to impede it.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Such aspects of the role of the body we have so many, so that a lot of thinkers and artists consider the visibility of the body and the sonority of the word and of the human voice, like forms necessary to showing the spirit and the beauty.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The function of the body, even in its present state of sin, it cannot be determined only negatively, but also positively, namely in contradictory terms, being shown by this that only through the sin the body’s positive function was mixed with a negative one, and the sin could not destroy the original function of the body, but it can only darken it.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“In any case, through the anterior affirmations we did not highlight the fact that, by being us into body, the subjects of the others are more unveiled, more certain, closer, while they are clothed in body. But we cannot draw from here the conclusion that in fact, they cannot manifest so easily while they are bodiless or, maybe, it is due to us that, by being clothed in body, we cannot perceive their manifestation? Besides these, we can ask: if we do not satisfactory know them when they are disrobed of their body, they too won't know us either we are clothed into body or we are bodiless?" (Stăniloae 1993)

"About the life of the human spirit disrobed of his body, about the way of knowing its reports of communion, we cannot know anything concretely. We can suspect, though, that on one hand it is freer, it is fuller, it is higher in thoughts, after the removal of the present thickened body, but, on the other hand, it cannot be imparted with the joys of the full communion, which are occasioned by the precise reports, which between the human subjects can take place only when they are into their bodies. Probably, the degree of communion, possible to be accomplished through the earthly bodies, thickened after the sin, it is reached and even exceeded by the souls after death. But they can reach the fullness of the communion only into the resurrected bodies." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Between body and soul there is a mysterious penetration. For instance, the gaze of a man isn't only a combination of cells, it isn't only an agglomeration of fleshy matter, but it is also meaning, idea, sentiment, voluntary attitude, and moral state. The man's face is the most wonderful thing in the world. The man's face is an incontestable union of spiritual and material. It is a mystery for we understand through mystery, in a wide sense, a union between spirit and matter. The matter and the spirit compose the whole called human face. The human faces are equally numerous apparitions of the spirit in the world of the material nature, interruptions of the nature, envoys of another world. The whole body is image, and image of the soul. The portrait presents also the reality of the soul from within body. The eyes are image of the sight, the hands are image of the action, the ears are images of the hearing; any organ of the body is an image of a spiritual function and all of them together, the body in its entirety, are an image of the soul with its functions. And if in a soul there is dwelling heavenly grace, he can also be seen through the human sight and face, by the whole seen behavior of a man. When we are nigh to a man who is spiritually elevate through godlike grace, we feel and we see the grace from within him, not directly, but through his body, through a certain spiritual physiognomy of his face." (Stăniloae 2005: 53)

"Jesus the Savior wore under His human countenance the Godhead Himself. The Godhead isn't something incompatible to the way of being and of manifesting of the spirit within man. If the divine grace isn't except a power elevating the spiritual features from within man, the Godhead springing up will have to be cogitated as being on a line that leads from the human soul upwards, as a spiritual consummation. The human souls ought to be the most appropriate environment which the Godhead manifests through. And the human spirit, no matter how loaded with Godhead, it has in his body the necessary and proper instrument of man infestation.” (Stăniloae 2005: 53-54)

“No matter how much would we accentuate the role of the memory, we mustn’t diminish the objective traits of the portrait. If those traits do not express the image of the know person, the memory isn’t called to action. The man is endowed with the great and mysterious power of suggesting through some lines, colors, and shadows, not only somebody’s portrait, but also that one’s soul. It is here about a prolongation of the mystery of the human body, which is image and environment for soul’s manifestation. That one who draws no matter how schematically – but faithfully – a human face, he implicitly shows that man’s soul. If there had remained a picture of the face of Jesus, this portrait would suggest, not being influenced by the chaos of the memory of the ones who were following Him, also the godlike seal imprinted in His soul’s manifestations imprinted on His face. In antiquity, there were opinions that such portraits of Jesus existed. They tell us that the Lord would have imprinted the image of His face on a woman’s scarf, a woman called Veronica, who gave Him her scarf to wipe His face of sweat, when He was carrying His cross on Golgotha. They also tell us that Jesus would have imprinted His face on a linen scarf that He sent it to Abgar, the tetrarch of Edessa, who asked Him through a letter to come and heal him of a grave disease, and the scientific studies undertook in the year 1933 upon the traces on the holy shroud, which is preserved in Torino, they lead, on one hand, to make clearer the contours of a body and of a figure which almost certainly belonged to Jesus, and on the other hand they confirm the great probability that Jesus imprinted His face on those scarfs while he was alive.” (Stăniloae 2005: 54-55)

“The body of Christ remains after His Resurrection too, as a body that is forever and ever saved and deified, and through it so could be our bodies too.” (Stăniloae 2005: 163)

“If the body hasn’t remained, we will no longer be able to say that Christ resurrected and He dressed Himself up in incorruptibility.” (Stăniloae 2005: 165)

“If the shape had been indissolubly and essentially tied to the body, it couldn’t have been totally changed either at the Transfiguration, for in such a case Christ, by no longer having a body, he couldn't have suffered.” (Stăniloae 2005: 168)

“The Christendom, by affirming the eternal keeping of the body of Christ, and through it the eternal keeping of our bodies, due to the fact that the human body has been united, for eternity, with the hypostasis of the Word, it affirms in the same time the keeping of the body's shape, of its human form as person. This is for this form is the reflection of the rationality of the godlike Word as Person Who is, in the same time as hypostasis and as Person, everything that can be more existent and more existence-giver.” (Stăniloae 2005: 168)

“Christ transfigured Himself in order to show His disciples what kind of body he is going to have on His second coming. It will be a body of glory, but a real body.” (Stăniloae 2005: 174)

“The Son of God has deified the body He has taken, namely He has beautified His body with an untold brightness, He has made it spiritual, and He has elevated His body above all the material and earthly thickness, but in order to do that He has kept His body. So, His body hasn't ceased to be body and, therefore, to be circumscribed. The affirmation that He forsook His body through Resurrection, it is a Manichaeism's affirmation. His body has been freed of the bodily sufferings and of the earthly weakness: as thirst, tiredness etc.” (Stăniloae 2005: 177)

“If the body of Christ – said Patriarch Nicephorus – it is incomprehensible after His Ascent, what our bodied will become like, in the likeness of His body? Will our bodies become incomprehensible, or we won't have any body at all? But Saint Apostle Paul says that we are going to have a spiritual body, unlike the natural body from now (I Cor. 15: 44). “Behold, even now, the righteous' bodies are spiritual, through the work of the Holy Ghost dwelling within them. But then their bodies will be even thinner and lighter... and more spiritual; and the Ghost will tarry with their bodies ceaselessly. That's why we believe that we will be of flesh and bones too. So, what will be incomprehensible the Christ's body like, if the bodies formed according to it aren't incomprehensible?” (Stăniloae 2005: 179)

“Palamas drew Barlaam's attention upon the fact that there is a difference between the works of the senses caused from outside and the works moving the sense from inside. The senses produced by external works must cease to the ones who focus themselves inwardly, but not also the ones coming from the soul, for these works do not impede them focusing but, on the opposite, they even help them. We've been given our body, or our body have been subordinated to us, in order to be a collaborator to us. That's why, when our body rebels up, let's restrain it, but let's also allow our body the appropriate things. It is true that the sight and the hearing are cleaner and more rational than the feeling of the bodily mood, but their work cease when the external objects lack, and they do not feel pain by ceasing this work. But the feeling of the bodily mood, even in the absence of the external objects, it cannot be stopped from working and it feels the lack of those objects as a pain (for instance, the fasting).

"Besides, one mustn't suspend the feeling of the bodily mood, for this work and this pain accompanying it, they do not impede the ones who pray in spirit, but they are even beneficial to them. The ones who are advanced in the mental prayer, they have emancipated themselves from passions, but until reaching there they had to modify the sinfulness of their body and this modification cannot be done without pain. "The contrite heart, God won't punish it", says David, and the Lord says that the prayer can do much more when joined with the fasting. The absence of the pain, called by the Holy Fathers as petrification too, it is what negatively affects the prayer, but the pain felt in the body's mood it does the opposite. The hunger, says a Holy Father, it is the substance of the prayer, or its quality, and the tears are the prayer's daughter or mother, said another Holy Father. A prayer without this, it is colorless, it is dry." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 47-48)

"The true prayer it is a perpetual work produced by the grace within heart, and rooted into soul, a source of holy joy which attracts the mind, and which gets the mind out from under the multiple and profane imaginings; and the spiritual joyfulness from it, it is overflowed upon the body, working within body, but still remaining spiritual. Like the pleasure coming from the bodily things, it passes upon the mind it makes the mind being bodily too, and therefore the mind isn't being improved by entering a higher region and the man becomes totally a body, likewise the pleasure overpoured from the mind over the body, it isn't altered while being communicated to the body, but it recomposed the body and it makes the body spiritual, so that the body rejects the bodily evil lusts and the body obeys the soul, and the whole man becomes ghost. The Psalmist says: "Towards the Lord hoped my heart and He helped me and my body has flourished" (Ps. 27: 1021), and Saint Diadochus says that the joy produced by the godlike grace within heart it is given to the body too, as an earnest of the body's future incorruptibility." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 48)

21 In KJB we have Psalm 28: 7. (E. l. t.'s n.)

“The way leading to the love for God, it crosses through dispassion, by avoiding every evil thing, by cultivating the remembrance of God and by fulfilling His commandments. Therefore, one must present to God, his passionate part, as living and working, as living sacrifice; likewise, it is the body, which to do with all its limbs the things pleasant to God. The works done through the body’s limbs in the honor of God, they consummate the soul. All the more do so, the movements of the passionate part, a part which is closer to the mind, by connecting the body to the mind. The Apostle demanded us to mortify some parts of the body. But these parts are: the fornication, the uncleanness, the evil passion, the greediness (Ephes. 5: 4), but not, for instance, the kneeling, not the works of the Holy Ghost done through body, and neither the blessed sufferings.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 51)

“Palamas answered that it is essential that this union between soul and body exists. The mode which this union it takes place in, it is totally mysterious.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 52)

“At the general resurrection, the body (the new body which we will resurrect with, E. l. t.’s n.) will be fully transparent to the godlike light or even to God Himself.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 119)

“Each one’s body remains with its material matter become an environment of the godlike light and the body’s material matter will be brought to the state of material light, united with the godlike light which it was created within, but off which it fell through sin.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 132)

“The Trinity’s light, which is characteristic to the Son of God too, it was shown through the body he took as embodiment, and through His loving deeds, but it was fully shown into His body after His resurrection. And His body has been spreading in all the ones who have believed and who have done deeds similar to His deeds, during their life on earth, but fully after their resurrection. If the body can be environment, which the wise words are spread through, and which the good deeds are committed through, it is natural the body to be also a seen environment of the spiritual light, and out of the body to irradiate this light in the universe which the body is connected to, though this showing of the spiritual light through the material matter it is a great mystery.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 201-202)

“Christ showed to His Apostles that He descended and that He followed to ascend not only for Himself as man but for us too, in the presence there of Moses and of Elijah, who believed in His embodiment and sacrifice as man, before those happened, and that meant that Christ did that for the ones who followed to believe in Him in the future. On this purpose, Moses and Elijah appeared to the three apostles as speaking to Christ about His end, namely about His death and resurrection, which were to bring Him a brightness like that of the sun. It is shown through this both the fact that the light comes out of Him, for He is God, and not out of Moses and out of Elijah, and the fact that His light isn't in contradiction with His sacrifice, for He showed His love by going all the way to death. But by this is shown also that our loving relation with the supreme light of the kindness, it will also be a dialogical communication through body, namely our bodies will live, at their turn, in connection with His body and in a mysterious communication with Him through His body. And this shows that there will be a real dialogue of ours, with Him. Besides that, it shows us also that there will take place a transfiguration or a deification of the whole cosmos, and therefore of the material cosmos too." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 204)

"The knower self is, in his foundation, spiritual. But the knower self doesn't know anything, neither knows on himself, except by having or for he had a body. The body is so tightly united with the soul, so that is part of the human being's self, or the body participates to the human being's quality as knower subject, or self. In the same time, the body is also an object to be known, as there is to be known, partially, the soul too. The body is known as visible object, organized and noticed through physical senses, unlike the soul is, as known reality. But the body is organized by the soul and the body has the soul within, and the body cannot be separated from the soul, as, likewise, the soul cannot be known without having a body." (Stăniloae 1995: 88)

"In both its qualities, the body is influenced by the soul's work. Both in its quality as object, and also in its quality as participant to the person's subjectivity, the body is penetrated by the soul's qualities, or, in other words, the soul's qualities are extended within body. That's why the soul too, he knows and it is known through body. The soul cannot be seen without having eyes, while the mind doesn't cogitate without having a brain. The material eyes participate to soul's sight, and any body's movement participate to the soul's movement. In my body's organization and functioning, there is something transcending what we could call as the body's materialness and the materialness's automatic movements, movements which would obey some laws of a blind repetition; there is something that cannot be reduced to the body's material properties." (Stăniloae 1995: 88)

"There is a non-objectivity of the body, united with the body's objectivity, differing from the objectivity of the purely material things. The body is, in both its qualities, internal to the soul. The body's roots as known object and as participant to the quality as knower subject, feeling and active, are into the soul. That's why the body is transparent to the soul and to the soul's senses caused by the body. The human being, as soul-and-body being, he specifically has this mission of making the material matter, as organized into body, increasingly transparent to the soul, increasingly elevated above the material matters automatism, and increasingly participating to the human conscious life." (Stăniloae 1995: 88)

"The spirit's rationalities as human soul, are extended in the two qualities of the body, namely they have in themselves the power for organizing the material matter as a complex body, in the body's two qualities, as known object and as participating to the knower subject, corresponding to the soul's qualities. They can be shown as such, in the human being's body. But these rationalities are united with the material matter and they produce the feeling of the conscience. The soul is actualized, by organizing the material matter in a body of extraordinary complexity, corresponding to the same complexity of the soul, in order the soul to work through the body's organs. The soul is being actualized through the richness of the feelings produced to the body, a body organized by the soul in such a complex manner. By this, the material matter is organized as body participating to the soul, as knower self, and increasingly richly known." (Stăniloae 1995: 88)

"The living, sensitive, and organized body, it shows in itself the knower and organizing rationality of the soul, working in the body's material matter, made sensitive also in the soul's relations with the material matter external to the soul. But these relations aren't exhausted in the soul's work within body, but they last in the human spirit united with the body, as in a source out of which constantly flow their powers and their lights, as out of a source having in itself the rationality that gives the body as seen shape, being somehow, by nature, since the first moment of existence, as body forming. But the soul extends his organizing and working power within body, by using the material matter as concretized rationality, given, through creation, on an inferior level. When the body dies, the rationality that has been manifesting before in that body, by organizing the body, by maintaining the body, and by committing through body cogitated, wanted, and felt deeds, that rationality won't be lost, but it remains within the soul enriched by the effects of the thoughts, of the feelings, and of the deeds, as those have been practiced and as lived through the body." (Stăniloae 1995: 88-89)

"The knower rationality and the cognoscible rationality which work, from the human spirit (from the soul) to forming the body, and in the deeds committed through the body, they don't have only a theoretical character, but they have also a virtuality capable of becoming a feeling that accompanies their work within the body composed of material matter made sensitive. That's why the soul lives the body's pleasures and pains, unlike the material matter can do it by itself. (...) The man has a "spiritual sensing". (Stăniloae 1995: 89)

"What happens within the human being, regarded as existence bearing of the image of God, makes us thinking that even the Word of God "Whom all the things were made through", He has - in the rationalities whose images form human souls and out of which are extended in the human bodies - a certain virtual sensitiveness, which gives those rationalities a capacity of achieving a sensing working in the sensitive material matter. This is for the sensing contributes too, to knowledge. So, one can presuppose that even in God there is a certain superior and infinite form of sensing. That is a sensing which the godlike Persons love One Another through, and which They manifest understanding and mercy on the people who suffer or who rejoice. God-the Word formed to Himself a body which He endured the pains on the cross, pains which weren't only of His body, but He felt them, somehow, through His soul too. So, we can understand the affirmations of Saint Maximos the Confessor that Jesus Christ committed His miracles through commandment or through power and through bodily touch. These two could be united in a sole work, without being merged in that work the godlike and the human work, though the one who were experimenting His touch, that one felt not only His human work, but also the godlike power in that work." (Stăniloae 1995: 89)

"My body, imprinted by my spirit existing within my body, or my body being crossed through by my spirit, organized and upheld by my spirit, it forms the subjective and sensitive screen of all the objects the body reaches having a connection, or of the seen images; into our body are imprinted, in the same time, all the conscious senses, produced by the objects belonging to other persons or by those persons. The body imprinted by spirit, it is actively participating to perceiving them, to defining their meanings, and to expressing them in words addressed to others. In order to do that, the body must be in a connection, through senses: with the things, with the persons, and with the persons' images. My body is partaker to my acts of feeling, of thinking at all the thinks, of sensing and of knowing the feelings and the thoughts communicated by others, but it is also an object of the knowledge, object of the thinking imprinted in them. It takes place in the body's case too, as penetrated by spirit, a turning upon itself. I see my body, a cogitate it, I sense it like an object, but I see it, I cogitate it, and I feel it through itself, or, the body is partaker to the sight, to the thinking, and to the feeling of the universe's realities imprinted in the body. My body makes it easy to me, in my quality as participant to my quality as subject, my thinking, my sight, and my feeling of everything, but I also perceive my body as object which all of these are imprinted in. If my body hadn't participated to my quality as thinking subject and as feeling of the soul, there wouldn't have been gathered into my body, as in a central object, the images and the sensations of all the things, persons, and of their features, and, so, my body wouldn't have been a bridge between me as subject and the universe. If my body had been only a known object, which the objects universe is imprinted in, it would have missed, again, a connection between my spirit and the knowing and the feeling of the universe through body." (Stăniloae 1995: 90)

"The body is continuously being adapted to the spirit, in its quality as participant to the spirits' acts of knowledge and of feeling as subject, but also in the body's quality as objective screen, which the images, the features, and the perceptions of the things and of the persons are gathered in, a screen that never lacks its quality as subject. When I say "I am washing myself", I express both the quality as subject of my body, more precisely of my hands, by the fact that they are crossed through by my spirit, and the quality of my body as object. My body vibrates, in the same time, differently, in these two qualities. My body is, as bridge to the spirit and as penetrated by the spirit, a reserve of countless freely chosen and freely activated possibilities, possibilities which are at the disposition of the possibilities freely activated by the spirit, accentuating, in their fulfilling, the vibration lived by the spirit. If there hadn't been a body, the possibilities starting from within spirit wouldn't have been possible to be actualized. Neither the possibilities corresponding to the body could have been actualized without the spirit having extended his possibilities into the body." (Stăniloae 1995: 90)

"The human being gives, starting from the spirit, a freely chosen form to the hands' movements, and by this he imprints a great complexity to the hand he works with: he gives countless nuances, freely chose, to the eye's movements, and he gives tonalities of great richness and finesse, freely chose, to his voice. Each human being is unique in the richness of these nuances manifested through the movements of his cognitive, communicative, and perceptive organs. They come from spirit through the brain's circumvolutions, and are imprinted through them the organs of the senses, of the hands, and of other body's organs." (Stăniloae 1995: 90)

"It has been said that the body is the prime, general, and fundamental image and sensation, or all images and sensations of the human subject. But the body isn't only the image or the object-sensation, which the things' multiple sensitive images are imprinted as on a screen, making of body an image and a sensation of untold concentrated complexity, but the body is also the subject-sensation, that notices on himself as unitary image and sensation, or as a screen-object which the images and the sensations receives and then communicated, are imprinted on. The body as penetrated by the spirit, it has this double role as subject receiving, feeling, and thinking at the full of meanings images and sensations, as also as object which those images and sensations are imprinted on and are known through. One can even speak about a repeated concomitance, of these two qualities, on other and other levels. I see and I feel a thing through my subjective sight, but I see myself and I feel myself, as imprinted in my eyes, in my body, by the image of the respective thing. And this sight of what is imprinted again, on another level, into my body, in my body's quality as object, it shows my body as subject too, a subject living what is being imprinted within it, always in another mode, with other meanings and feelings." (Stăniloae 1995: 91)

"I do not perceive a thing, or a feature, through my body, without finding out in that perception a new meaning. The sensitive function of the body is unseparated from the understanding, conscious function, connected to the sensitive function, and that shows even more the body's participation to the body's quality as subject of the spirit. But it is a difficult to be understood thing, how do I live consciously, therefore spiritually, the body's sensation of pleasure or of pain. This is for that sensation doesn't belong only to the body, neither only to the spirit. The animals have purely vital sensations, setting their body in movement unconsciously. The human being doesn't have powerful sensations without they being noticed and lived consciously. This cannot be explained except by the fact that the pleasures and the pains are lived by the body penetrated by the spirit, or by the spirit which the body has its roots – or its rationality full of the sensitive virtuality – within." (Stăniloae 1995: 91)

"I cannot see something beautiful, with the body's eyes, without spiritually rejoicing myself. I cannot live a bodiless joy, or a joy with a bodily more thinned participation, without rejoicing myself with the body too. I cannot reach a spiritual understanding – or to have a bodily more thinned participation – without having a pleasant sensation within my body." (Stăniloae 1995: 91)

"In the fact that my body cannot be seen only as an object, but itself participates to his sight, it is shown that the body exceeds its purely material quality. The human being lives spiritually the touches, the pricks, the materially produced sounds, within body or in the contact of his body with the objects' universe; or the body lives those ones spiritually. The human being's sight, his hearing, his face, all of those show within them the human being's spirit as person, and everything taking place with the body enriches the spiritual life of the person. The child's face, his eyes, they still aren't completely defined spiritually. At an old age, the spirit can be seen in a "definite" mode on somebody's face, in his gestures, and even in his specific as person. Thus, the spirit's powers are extended in the body's complex organization and movements, they giving to the body their imprint, but also the spirit receiving, in nuanced forms, the life lived through body. Saint Gregory of Nyssa affirmed that the hands given the human being the spiritual possibility of speaking. (...) By and large, the whole body is organized in order to speak. But who organizes the body in order to speak, it not the understanding and rational soul? By this, the body participates to the human being's spiritual acts. The hands do not remain either as purely material organs, but they are imprinted with a great spiritual complexity." (Stăniloae 1995: 91-92)

"During life, there has taken place a certain spiritualization of the body, in good or in bad sense, but it has been also imprinted a living seal of the body into the soul, a seal taken by the body through a certain mode of being used by the spirit. By remaining, after the human being's death, with the imprinting of the acts and of the feelings manifested while being into body, the soul needs to externally express those acts and feeling, and this need will be satisfied to be body after resurrection. Then, if the seal the soul imprinted upon the body it is that of a body dominated by spirit, the body that spirit will be given with, it will be the maximum spiritualized form, as also, on the contrary case, it will make very visible the evil form taken by the soul in the live in the material body." (Stăniloae 1995: 92)

"Saint Gregory Palamas said that, like in the present life the soul can be seen through the body, likewise, in the future life, after resurrection, the body will be seen through the soul. The body will be maintained, but it will be overwhelmingly imprinted by spirituality or by the spirit's powers, which will be seen and they have been activated during the present life. So, the human being's soul will be seen, in an accentuated manner, in the body's traits, so that, when you will meet somebody, you almost won't notice that the one whom you are talking to still has a body. But this will mean too, an untold luminous irradiation of spiritualized meanings and feelings, through his body. The body will no longer be a wall separating the human being from others, but the body will be luminous and transparent and a means of unimpeded communication. The body, that constitutes the soul's walls, it will be totally transparent, by being overwhelmed by the soul's light from within body. The each one's soul will be fully communicated to others, but without being confounded to theirs, and the soul will irradiate far away. The soul will be together with all the ones whom he thinks at, with love, being shown to everybody through the transparent body, which the soul illuminated far away through. The soul no longer will hide himself with insincerity, for the soul will no longer had anything evil to hide. The soul will only have within himself the love he wants to communicate.” (Stăniloae 1995: 92)

“The difference between the resurrected body of the Lord and the bodies we will have after the general resurrection, it is that the resurrected body of Christ, by remaining for a while amongst people bearing material bodies, it was covered too, because those ones didn’t have a soul’s openness for seeing that body. But, as to the ones resurrected to the eternal life, Christ will be present to all of them through His transparent body, likewise all of them will be present into Christ, all of them and to everybody, since their bodies will enjoy a maximum transparency. The ones from hell will have also a certain transparence. But that transparence will be a transparence of the hatred amongst them, which, on one hand, it will spiritually lock them up to one another, and on the other hand, it will uphold amongst them a non-communication through communication, a communication of the repulsion for one another, a communication which they won’t be able to get rid of, a communication which will be, in the same time, a great loneliness. Like their bodies were to them a motif for division, during their life in the material universe, likewise, there their souls will be a motif for an even bigger division, because their lack of love and their unfriendly thoughts will be openly shown.” (Stăniloae 1995: 92)

“The body can be seen as a simple object only when it is forsaken by soul. But the body isn’t seen as a simple object by its former owner and it isn’t actually a body. Such a body no longer notices anything, no longer feel anything, and it no longer is imprinted by anything which to be imprinted to the soul too. As long as the human being lives in the material universe, he is able to see his external organs which he works through, and, by using the technology, he can also see his internal organs. But he sees those organs as objects for they are partakers to his quality as subject.” (Stăniloae 1995: 92-93)

“The human being cannot do something with his body as object, except by using his body as partaker to his quality as subject. When the human being is no longer able to use his body as partaker to his quality as subject, he is no longer able to do anything with his body. To the self that works upon his body as object, there participates also the body as subject. And this means that even in quality as object, the body isn’t only an object, as also in its quality as subject, the body isn’t only a subject.” (Stăniloae 1995: 93)

“Even seeing my body from outside, like in a mirror, I do not see the body entirely like an object, because if my body hadn’t been, in the same time, partaker to my quality as subject seeing on itself, I couldn’t have seen my body. This is because I cannot see myself as only a subject. I do not see the subjective act of my sight or, by seeing myself as a subject, I remain unseen in this quality, namely transcendent to my quality as object. I see my eyes as objective organs, but I do not see my eyes in their quality as participants to my quality as subject. I see my eyes through an act which I do not see, and act which my eyes participate to.” (Stăniloae 1995: 93)

“No only my body remains to me as not-fully an object, namely as not-fully known to me, but the another’s body too. I do not live his quality as subject even as he lives it, though I feel his quality as subject by the fact that looking at me as object of his quality as subject, who looks at me and who knows me, or I know this quality of his through a mysterious communication between me as subject and him as subject. I feel him as subject when I have him in front of me, when I hear his words, and when I feel his deeds directed towards me. But by this, he is to me, in the same time, as object too. In addition to that, even by feeling him as subject, I cannot live him as subject as he lives on himself as subject. Therefore, he will remain to me even less know as subject, if I know myself as subject. The idea of the Greek theologian Yannaras, on the “body’s metaphysics”, it could be understood like this.” (Stăniloae 1995: 93)

“I can enslave the another’s body, as object. But I cannot take from him the living of his state as subject. The another remains to me as equal to me and as opposed to me, more or less felt, in my quality as subject. His living as subject remains in his inner sanctuary. That is the dignity which he cannot be disrobed of, by anybody, not even by himself. Of this consists, by excellence, the image of God within man, the image of the supreme Subject. The image of God can be in communication with me, in a way or another, but it cannot be annulled.” (Stăniloae 1995: 93)

“Through his body’s senses, the human being perceives the objects’ universe and the universe of other persons, and through the understanding associated to them the human being notices their meanings and he enters the communication with other persons. Through the body’s senses, the human being catches in his feeling not only the events happening around him, but also the phenomena falling under the human being’s senses. He feels the pains caused in his body by the strikes from outside, as also the pleasures produced him by the sweetness of some of the things, al also the salty or the bitter taste of others. But, through his working cogitation, through his brain, the human being knows correspondingly the organization of the things, and the possibility of understanding and of using them. Through his body the human being notices the materialized rationality of great variety and harmony amongst things, and between that rationality and the concretized rationality of his body. Amongst things, some of them are salty, and they satisfy a need of the body, and other things are sweet, satisfying another need of the body, and through them it produces a pleasant feeling to the soul.” (Stăniloae 1995: 93-94)

“The human being comprises, through his eyes, a wide frame of the nature, and through his capacity of moving his body in space, and through the soul’s memory, the human being can widen and preserve in his conscience an increasingly wider frame. Through the instruments the human being fabricates as extensions of his senses, or as extensions of his movement possibilities, the human being can widen, in huge dimensions, the frame he notices with his sight, even by directly encountering the visible things. The universe becomes, on constantly increasing dimension, as felt through the body or as a kind of second-degree body, of the soul.” (Stăniloae 1995: 94)

“Through his body the human being enters the connection of perceiving, of understanding, of communication with his fellow humans, due to the fact that they have bodies which they can be perceived through, they make themselves understood through, and they communicate through. Due to their bodies of the same nature, crossed through by their souls, the people are able to talk to one another, so that they widen their spiritual horizon and widening their communication, which not confound the people to one another, but it enriches them spiritually. Thus, they ascertain on themselves as identical rationalities and feelings, by noticing, in common, a sensitized, various, and harmonious rationality of the seen universe. Thus, the universe is unveiled to them and it is actualized to them, as a second-degree body, without confounding them to one another, but as strengthening the communion amongst them, and as they being their spirit enriched reciprocally, for each of them sees and communicates in a diverse manner, according to the spiritual difference amongst them.” (Stăniloae 1995: 94)

“Through his body, the human being is capable of increasingly widely comprising the universe and to strengthen his connection with increasingly more of his fellow humans. But as this thirst isn’t fully satisfied during the people’s life within material bodies, we think that we will reach on such a level by continuing our life on another plan, by comprising the whole universe and by entering the consummate communion with all our fellow humans.” (Stăniloae 1995: 94)

“From the body’s quality as partaker to the human being’s character as subject, destined to know and to feel gladly, in their endless richness, all the things, and in the body’s quality as object destined to be imprinted by all the things, it results the responsibility of the human being for his own body. The human being is accountable not only for his soul, but also for his body. If the human being’s body hadn’t been both object and partaker to the human being’s quality as subject, the human being wouldn’t have been accountable for himself. But the human being lives also the participation of his body to his responsibility for his own soul, in the body’s quality as participant to the human being’s quality as subject. This is because a body without this quality, it couldn’t have been able to willingly accept to live a responsibility for the soul. And this responsibility of the human being for both his components, it is a responsibility united through both components, with his fellow human, in front of God. All the responsibility forms are upheld by the human being’s responsibility in front of God Who has given the human being both his body and his soul, as objects in the human being’s care, but also in their quality as completing the human being’s dignity as responsible subject for himself, for all the people and for all the things. The human beings’ responsibility for his own body it shows that the human being doesn’t give his body by his own, but the human being is given his body as gift, and in his care, by the supreme Subject. The Church Fathers said that the body is given to the human being as a “servant”, which the human being must drive “tied”. This shows that the body is inferior to the soul and, as such, the body depends in a greater measure on the human being’s soul than his soul depends on his body.” (Stăniloae 1995: 94-95)

“The body must accept its state as “servant”, as “bonded”, and as driven by spirit. The human being’s care for his body it isn’t only a negative one, of restraining his body, but it is also a positive one. And the positive care doesn’t consist only of providing for the body, for in this sense the body too, it has a good care for itself, but it means also restraining the body’s exaggerated pretensions for exclusively taking care of the body, in dominating the body’s movements in order to make them decent and beautiful. So, in the negative care, there is a positive element. The same positive and negative care consists of using the body as means for helping others, by making the body industrious and by accustoming the body into the dexterities of an occupation, and that requires too, a restraining of the body from a disorderly life. Any toil, or labor, it has in itself something negative and something positive. Even the intellectual work and the prayer, they require too, both a positive work and a restraining. The human being must carefully maintain all the body’s powers as a real and as an increasingly transparent bridge, between soul and the material universe, in order to know the material universe and in order to work within the material universe for the common benefit. On the other hand, the human being must restrain his body and he must make his body increasingly as an environment for manifestation of the spirit's powers upon the material universe, in order to make the material universe increasingly transparent to God, and in order to make the material universe as means of brotherhood amongst people, by helping the fellow humans in using the material universe, as it is necessary to all people. The man is given his body in order to benefit of it, but the body can lead too, the human being, towards perdition, when the man no longer keeps his body restrained and when he no longer educates his body positively. In such a case, the body can bring a weakening to the soul, or even an opinion about soul's inexistence, and, consequently, a total disregarding of the soul. And by this, the body can promote the disbelief in God. So, by restraining the body, the body can serve the human being as a strengthening means too, to the spirit, for elevating the spirit to the connection with God. By that, even the body is elevated on the level of a means of easy communication and of transparently showing what it is good in the ones who communicate. This means that the body, together with the material universe, they can unveil their corresponding rationalities, as being upheld by God. Right through the body's restraining, the soul is made not only strong in kindness, in the love for people, but it becomes also seer of the deep rationalities of the body and the material universe, bathed in the Creator's light. Just through restraining, it is unveiled the spiritual beauty of the body, in the body's quality as organ and as dwelling place of the spirit." (Stăniloae 1995: 95)

"The human being, by weakening his responsibility for his body, he weakens his responsibility for his spiritual self. So, he weakens also his awareness about his responsibility in front of God, a responsibility for himself and for others. The human being loses thus his quality as thinking being, and he becomes almost an object carried away by passions, or by inferior impulses, both in his body and in his soul. The body is no longer a servant of the human being, but it serves to the external things. Namely, the body (that has a spiritual penetration too, E. l. t.'s n.) becomes almost exclusively a body. This brings a loneliness, in the same time with the darkening of the self-awareness, accompanied by the disappearance of any meaning of the existence. That is a state accompanied or followed by a difficult to heal sadness or despair, or at least an animalic carelessness; so, that is a getting out from the human normalness and it is too, a nervous breakdown, either in unconscious and blind cruelty, sometimes justified by a rationality lacking any horizon." (Stăniloae 1995: 96)

"The fact that the man has given the body in his care, but not only in order to provide it with the things making possible the human being's life in the material universe, but in order to grow his body as a bridge towards God and as a transparent and communicant means of the friendship and of the love for others, that fact means that the body has been given an eternal importance. That's why the human being shouldn't fear death, even if he knows that his body is going to die. This is for the human being knows also that death is inevitable, but, in the same time, he knows that he exists for eternity, in his unique wholeness, and he will enjoy a body after resurrection." (Stăniloae 1995: 97)

"We have in the human being's attitude regarding his body, the possibility of two alternatives: the human being can make of his body a means of helping others, of brotherly communicating with them, a transparent means of his clean love and of manifesting, through deeds, the God's love, which the human being can be filled up with, at his turn, either a pretext for strife, for division, for egotism, as wall of darkness and repulsion, a means for temptations, a means of irradiating the enmity, a means of reciprocal hitting and oppressing amongst people. The last one is a false care for body, namely a worry upheld by the deceiving conviction that the body is the most precious reality, or that the body is the sole reality and there is no other reality beyond body. This happen when the human being forgets about the fact that he is given his body by a superior forum, as means of brotherly communication with others, a means of reciprocal help amongst people, a means for preparing the human being for an existence superior to this one in the present body, an existence in the light that irradiates from the Creator and Upholder of all things." (Stăniloae 1995: 97)

"The human being's strength is a real strength only when making the human being capable of going, in accomplishing his responsibility, up to self-sacrifice through his body, strengthened by the assurance that the One Who has made him accountable and in front of Whom he is hold accountable by, That One has an unlimited power of exigency, and He can provide the human being in exchange for his self-sacrifice with the body, as consummate accomplishment of the human being's responsibility in front of Him, the eternal existence on a consummate plan. The human being is able to go, in fulfilling his responsibility, up to self-sacrificing his life within the material body, for he receives the necessary strength from the One Who has seeded within him, in the same time with the responsibility, also the power needed for fulfilling the responsibility, even at the cost of the live within body. In this is shown a great value granted to the body: that one of ensuring the human being's eternity, if the man accepts to sacrifice his body. And the human being proves, by doing that, the greatest faith in God." (Stăniloae 1995: 98)

"At the consummation of the penetration of the body by the soul, and through the soul towards Godhead, and to the full accomplishing of the body's purpose as environment of spreading the God's light within the material universe, of for the material universe's transfiguration, the human body has reached in Christ. In Christ it has been shown the supreme honor which the human body has been elevated at, the human body being made by the Son of God as His organ destined to transfigure the cosmos, and as partaker to the quality as Subject or as Hypostasis of the Son of God. Christ has shown through this too, what a supreme role the human nature and its bearer are called at, in union with the Son of God, as made Hypostasis of the human nature." (Stăniloae 1995: 99-100)

"The body can become transparent to Godhead and the Godhead can be seen through the saints' bodies; through body is being actualized and it can be seen the holiness of the human beings who get attached to Christ. The holiness and its gentleness couldn't have been manifested and known if there hadn't been a body." (Stăniloae 1995: 100)

"The human being is inseparable from the mineral, vegetal, and animal universe, because of his body. The human being provides for his body out to the material and biological universe, namely the human being transforms the material matter, in his body. But the human being wonders too, when seeing the material order, and the human being transcends the material universe towards the transcendent Creator, for the human being realizes his own insufficiencies, and the fact that he isn't from himself, and the human being deduces, out of the material universe's greatness, the same thing. The human being lives the material universe, in his soul, by touching the material matter and by feeling it. Thus, the material matter becomes content of the human being's life of the soul." (Stăniloae 1995: 119)

"The human being's soul comprises the whole universe. Even if a person or another, they do not know except a part of the universe, in what they know, it is virtually given the entire universe. By gradually progressing in knowing and living the universe, the human being doesn't change his own status as subject who gathers the universe within his conscience. On the other hand, if there hadn't been the universe of the objects, the human being wouldn't have been able to live his quality as knower and worker in it. Unlike God Who has in His trinity the whole power of living, on Himself, as Subject, so that it wasn't necessary to Him to create the universe on this purpose, by the fact that the human being is both soul and body, he needs in his living as subject, to have some objects as his own, object indissolubly tied to himself. The material universe doesn't remain only as external to the man. The material universe is, in a certain sense and to some extent, as internal to the human being. A part of the universe's matter it becomes human being's body, and the matter's images enter the human being's soul with their meanings. More than that, the human being cannot be a subject without having the material matter participating, by what the matter gives to the eyes, to the voice, to the hearing, and by making the human being, by that, capable of functioning in his quality as subject. The entire universe is to the human being, or to the human being's soul, as a body, for the soul's powers are extended in universe, or for the universe constitutes an organ and an increasingly richer and increasingly wider content of the human being's soul. But, unlike the body in a strict sense, the universe is a body common to all people. But each human persons uses the universe according to his specificity as person. In this is shown the fact that the human being doesn't lose his uniqueness as person, namely he isn't confounded to others, but neither is him separated from others in using the material universe." (Stăniloae 1995: 119)

"The human being must maintain a balance with the material universe, so that him to use for his body only a much as he really needs, and a balance in the communion with others in using the material universe. This communion doesn't imply any difficulty when it comes about using the material universe, in common, in order to enrich the people's spirit." (Stăniloae 1995: 119)

"The Orthodox asceticism it is of a great use in maintaining the balance in using the material universe. The Orthodox asceticism affirms, paradoxically, on one hand, the need for material universe as means for satisfying the body's needs, and on the other hand, the need for rejecting the material universe, of for detaching oneself from it. Both those are necessary to the human being in order to maintain his body but also in order to develop his communion with others. The human being needs his eyes, which he also sees the world with, both as factor of maintaining his body and as constitute element of his soul, in order him to grow up spiritually, and the human being's soul mustn't occupy himself only with the universe's images, but also with the meanings which show the universe as a wonderful creation of God Who transcends the universe. The human being's spiritual growth it cannot be done through a total separation from the material universe, or through an extreme weakening of the body, but by using the universe and the body to the extent of the strict necessity, and in the same time with exceeding the material universe towards the One Who is above it. The body must be spiritualized through this reduction of its need for material universe, to only what is necessary to preserve the body, and in the same time the body mustn't be despised. This means a relativizing of the biological glitter to the material universe, namely a victory upon material matter in using it. The universe must be used, but with temperance; the universe must be regarded as a wonder, for its order and for the beauties from within universe, but it mustn't be considered as the ultimate reality:

“All the things are allowed to me, but I won’t let myself to become addicted to something” (I Cor. 7: 12). Or: “Either the ones who cry, let them be as if not crying, and the ones who rejoice, let them be as if not rejoicing; and the ones who buy, let them be as if not gaining; and the ones who use this world, let them be as if not fully using it. This is because the mode of this world passes” (I Cor. 7: 30-31). The human being must search a harmony while using the universe, and a good understanding with one another, without becoming passionate of possessing and exaggeratedly using the things; but neither the human beings must totally break with the material universe, because that makes impossible their life within body and the connection amongst human beings. By being aware of the connection with the world, the human beings mustn’t give the universe an absolute importance, because that leads to fighting for owning it. The foods the human being needs, they aren’t too many, and they quickly expire, and the objects get outdated too. The human being goes beyond, in eternity, alone and carrying nothing material.” (Stăniloae 1995: 119-120)

“The human spirit is so intimately connected with his body that in his own self, the human spirit lives also his own body. So, the human being lives as penetrated by Absolute, as composed, spiritual-bodily person. But through his body and through his deeds conditioned by body, the spirit lives the union with the Absolute, extended also upon the exterior universe.” (Stăniloae 1995: 144)

“Without a body, the human being isn’t really a human being. God wanted to make Himself and the human being’s spirit as transparent through the material matter. That’s why God created the human being as having a body. Only through body, the human being’s spirit is wholly communicated. The understanding by the human being of the endless nuances of his endlessly various existence, God’s special joy for each human being, the all kind of kindness manifested in all kind of acts, all of them potentiated by God, and working within the human being, they take aspects of untold beauties, being shown through the human being’s eyes, through the voice’s sweetness, through the whole gentleness of the face. But this means a transparency of the body brought to a degree that makes impossible to deny the spirit’s reality.” (Stăniloae 1995: 197)

“The human being’s separation from God Who is the source of the spiritual life, it has weakened, on one hand, the irradiation force of the spirit through the body, and on the other hand, it has made the body mostly opaque, and the face hideous, by the fact that the human being has been occupying himself mostly, if not exclusively, with his egotistical pleasures. The passionate movements from within the human being, they have been the cause of the gradual decomposition of the body, decomposition that ends in death. The human being has almost lost his conscience about having a spirit dominating the passionate movements and thirsty for the Person-Absolute. The spirit has lost the power upon the body, which, agitated by greediness, by voluptuousness, and by the consumption efforts, it receives an ugly face, an insincere face, a gradually decomposing face. But such a human being still will resurrect with that ugliness that has become his own. Since the times immemorial, the people have become, to their conscience and preoccupation, only spiritually non-transparent bodies (Gen. 6: 3).” (Stăniloae 1995: 197)

“In order to restore the body as environment transparent for the Person-Absolute, the Son of God embodied Himself, namely the supreme spiritual Existence has brought Himself as sacrifice and He resurrected as man, in order to determine all the human beings who, unite themselves with Him through faith, to regain, through the power of their spirit re-strengthened within them by the presence of Christ, the bodies in the state of supreme and eternal transparency. But the ones who do not make such efforts, they will resurrect with their bodies dominated by addictions and with their faces made ugly by addictions.” (Stăniloae 1995: 197)

“The people, by getting out from the connection with the hypostatical Word, and by and large by getting out from the connection with the God in Trinity as source of life, they died. Their souls died, and that brought them the death of their body too. This is because only a soul that is full of the life which he receives from the communication with the God-Person, with the God of the Trinitarian communion, only that soul can give the body’s matter too, the power to oppose the process of corruption; only such a life can give the soul that works within body, the power to maintain the body’s matter defended against the corruption process.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 26)

“The Word of God showed us, in the greatest closeness and efficiency, the immortality as fullness of life, through His resurrection with the body. For, if the man has been created through God-the Word, not as a rationality without body, but as rationality within a body and in the world’s context, in Him is the possibility of coming to the people through His body, in order to resurrect their bodies, or in order to verily bring them to immortality in their integral being, composed of body and soul. If God-the Word hadn’t come by bearing a body, even the righteous of the Old Testament, they would have remained in a non-full immortality, for they wouldn’t have resurrected with their bodies. And the man’s life isn’t full without the man having a body. With this could be reconciled the fact that, on one hand, the righteous of the Old Testament went into Abraham’s bosom, with the fact that, on the other hand, Christ has brought them out from "hell" and he has moved them into Paradise, through His descent to hell, an act represented by the Orthodox icon when depicting the resurrection of Christ. This could mean that the ones from Abraham's bosom, being in a certain life, they have been moved in the closeness of Christ, and they resurrect to even more life in order no longer to live only by hope but, with some anticipation, even to live the integral life they had while they live in their bodies, of course, now that life totally purified." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 30-31)

"In the fact that the man knows the universe and that the man exceeds its knowledge, in his quality as unity between spirit and body, by keeping the universe in his soul and by placing on universe a spiritual seal through his body, it is shown the fact that the body participates to the man's quality as person. Thus, the body is to the man both as given object and as participant to the man's quality as person. The man knows his body, and he knows, through his body, the world, but to this knowledge about the body as state and as environment of knowing the world, the body participates as subject. And the body even participates to knowing God. This is for the mind which ascends above body and above world, to God, it is a mind existing into a body and it is adjusted in its activity, by the body." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 44)

"Though the body participates to the man's subjectivity, the body is given to the man, on one hand, to take care of it, but not only to take care of body for manifesting through it the spiritual life, but also in order the man to make his body an ever-able tool on that purpose. The man must make increasingly more, of his body, his spirit's tool. The man must prepare his body by this, in order to be after resurrection a fully obeying and fully transparent to the spirit, and through the spirit to God. The spirit cannot and he mustn't want to exclude the body from the unity as person with him, but neither he must make of the care for biological existence his body's sole preoccupation. The body receives a commensurability with the whole universe, and with the infinite content of God, only for it becomes an instrument of the spirit, mastered by the thirst of comprising the whole universe and of comprising God, without being confounded to them. The more we occupy ourselves with our body as exclusive reality, the more our body become opaque, and less transparent means and less comprising all the things, including God, and it becomes less human body and more animal body." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 44)

"Only when the body is penetrated by the spirit thirsty for communication with another and with God, only then I live in conscience, in the same time with the mystery of my own self, united with God, the mystery too, partially cognoscible, of my body and of the world. I know that through spirit not only my body is made participant to my quality as subject, but the world too, it is united with my body and it is transformed in the body that participates to my quality as subject. Without the world participated to my quality as subject, I wouldn't know the world. To the knowledge and to feeling anything I know and I feel, it participates too, what I know and what I feel. To my work upon the world, it participates too, the world made by my spirit, the world participating to my subjectivity. It doesn't hide here the power of transforming the bread in the body of the Lord, through the human spirit and through his godhead, present in His body that touched the bread? It doesn't hide here, the mystery of the spiritualization of the body and of the world? Saint Gregory of Nyssa affirmed that the human being, by uniting within himself the spiritual and the biological (animalic), it has the mission to spiritualize the body." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 44)

"The human being isn't only an automatic, absurd, and meaningless machine, but the human being is a unitary and unique mystery, full of meanings and of endless feelings, bearing an own seal and, by that, through spirit, even the body is uniquely connected to the absolute Spirit. The human being, as body, he can be regarded as an object and submitted to a treatment like that applied to objects, but the fact that the things happening to him are consciously felt, and the fact that he participates too, to his acts, it show that the human being isn't only material matter, but the body is united, in an untold manner, with the free, conscious, and thoughtful soul, and the body is crossed through by the soul, and therefore the body remains above the simple state of an object, as long as it still is a living body, namely as long as it is a so-called organized body. This is because only through the separation from the soul, by being the body's organization disintegrated, it no longer is a body." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 87)

"They speak about the young material matter and about the old material matter of the body. But not the material matter, in itself, is young or old. Not the material matter, in itself, goes towards death. But the soul weakens his vital and sensorial functions within body." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 87)

Charismas

“When a gift or another had increased considerably, it has become a charisma. This means a much-accentuated spiritualization of a man, an accentuated overwhelming of the nature’s laws by the human spirit filled up with the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2006: 137)

“By and large, all the Church’s members who strengthen their faith by virtues, they reach to posse some special gifts, through which they make themselves useful to other and to the Church, and they unite tighter to one another, strengthening thus the Church’s unity. And some of them, by advancing more in virtues and by this reaching diverse degrees of holiness, they reach also to posse charismas by which they serve even more the others and the Church’s unity. Through them is made transparent in a more accentuated mode the infinity of the godlike life and light. Out of them irradiates a power that often overcomes the nature’s powers.” (Stăniloae 2006: 137-138)

“Not only that the Ghost shares the diverse gifts within the Church, but he is present in each gift too, entirely, as worker through that gift and as connection factor with the other gifts. Each gift attracts the other gifts, for in them there is the same Ghost, the One Who keeps that gift the tendency towards the union with the other gifts. That’s why each person who has a gift he feels that his gift is a part of the other gifts, due to the Ghost Who is in all of the gifts.” (Stăniloae 2006: 134-135)

“A more remarkable feature of a member of the Church it is called “gift” not only for that feature is given by the Holy Ghost, but also for that feature is destined to serve others, to be gives as a gift to others. Otherwise, what would the man do with that feature? - He would use it egotistically against others. But on this way that feature couldn’t be fully put in value, neither the one who has is couldn’t develop himself. Through the “gift” of one man, the Ghost addresses Himself to others. The “gifts” no longer has only a vertical address, but it also has a horizontal, unifier one. By the “gift” the Ghost unites a man to another, He unites several people amongst them, for He is everybody’s Ghost, he is the communion’s Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2006:135)

“One doesn’t commit any mistake by attributing the gifts to the Holy Ghost Himself. Although, the gift isn’t only a “work” of the Holy Ghost, but it is the effect of this work too, in the man’s nature, an effect that cannot exist without any feature, namely without the man’s collaboration. That’s why Saint Apostle Paul speaks in a mixed manner here about gifts and there about works of the Ghost, so that it is impossible to discern between “work”, “co-working” and “effect”. In the “gift” itself, as effect, there is dynamism. But one can neither discern between worker and work. Consequently, the effect too it is a product of the godlike working Hypostasis and of the human together-working hypostasis. Although, something of the produced effect remains sometimes even after the man's work ceased, and therefore the Ghost's work ceased too. It remains as something that has been imprinted within the nature, or like the surpassing of the state which one cannot turn back to. This gives some explanation to the man's not-coming back to the ancestral sin, after falling off the grace, or after the work of the Holy Ghost and the man's work cease." (Stăniloae 2006: 137)

"If God wants to save the man, to raise him at the state of communion with Him, and for this goal He made Himself man, He won't manifest Himself in His reports with the people but through the restriction of the direct power, by manifesting the power through love. And, by doing so, God showed His true superiority. All His features, through which He exceeds the relative, the human, the conditioned, He didn't manifest them directly, because in that case He would not let to the man place for free respiration, but the man would be reduced to the state of an object; He manifested His features through love. But if the people had seen the profoundness of the godlike love, they would have seen how from it are flowing the effluvia of all His godlike features and activities. If somebody objects by saying: how comes that the people did not feel these effluvia, and they even didn't see them with spiritual eyes, we will answer him: there are not felt the effluvia of the power of God present everywhere. The cause stays into the spiritual insensibility of the man. The ones who are imparted with the gift of the knowledge of Jesus Christ through faith, they see also His active godhead." (Stăniloae 1993)

"But, in the last analysis, the power of the word and the firmness of the prophetic subject, they come not out of the own will to report with responsibility towards the fellow humans, not even out of the own will to continuously report what God is saying, though also this will, it is an important factor, but from the certitude which he has about God. There doesn't exist any certitude of the human, and therefore firmness of his subject, without the certitude about God, which the man hasn't taken by himself. The firmness of the subject – and this is the heart itself of the subject – it is a gift, which comes from above, together with the certitude about God." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The exterior word is not else but the fragmentary expression of the permanent interior word, which is the being of the human subject, like intentionality towards communion. The human subject is word created in the image of the godlike Word Who is also a subject or intentionality towards communion into the bosom of the Trinitarian Godhead. This created word, debilitated and perverted by sin, it has a lack of influx of godlike power for regaining the consistency and the firmness. And the simple experience of the certitude about God, like a gift from above, it is sufficient to produce a straightening of the human subject and word.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“In the second place, these mediators in the Old Testament they were not sanctified in the sense of obtaining a personal moral purity, and their mediations and the sacrifices they brought, do not necessarily achieved for them the God’s forgiveness and the reconciliation with God. The institution of priesthood, before Jesus Christ, it was only a means to maintain into the people the conscience of the sin and of waiting for an effective mediator between the people and God, like the sacrifices which they brought before Him, by being testimonies of their sin, they have not the power to accomplish the reconciliation with God, because of not being real sacrifices, but an avoidance of the sacrifices, a replacement for surrogates of sacrifices. Though, for the Old Testament priesthood was established by God, and the priests were chosen by Him, it doesn’t remain, in its existence and work, a simple imagination of the connection with God. This would be the case when the priesthood and the sacrifices from before Christ would be established by the longing and by the fantasy of the people. Because God is the one Who established the priest and the sacrifice of the Old Testament, but not like real means of conciliation, but only like pre- fantasies of it, the waiting for Messiah expressed through those ones, it is founded on the real promise of God, and the ones who regarded it with seriousness and who practiced the duties related to this institution, they proved confidence in the promise of God, having to receive, on the arrival of the true Savior, the reward of their faith, like the Epistle towards Jews tells us (chapter 11). The priesthood and the sacrifices of the Old Testament were pre-imaginings of the reality which was to come, but pre-imaginings established by God, like an earnest of His benevolence, like a mean to prepare the people – by the waiting which maintained into their hearth these symbols – for the receiving of the true Mediator. The people, having these symbols established from above, they knew that God has not forsaken them, but He has a plan with them and He prepares them for salvation. They were the objective signs of the benevolence of God and His promises towards people. The priest of the Old Testament had upon him the benevolence of God, and the sacrifices which he brought, they also had it. God was looking with interest to his existence and to the sacrifice that he was bringing in the name of the people. This benevolence was not going up to descend the forgiveness over the ones who were bringing, through the priest, their sacrifices. They, though, were personally receiving the promise of the future salvation and this as was a big thing, being known that God never breaks a promise. If the report of the full communion with God, accomplished by Jesus Christ, it resembles to the wedding, the Old Testament will express the liaison of an engagement. The soul of the ones from under the old law was in the state of the fiancée, who received the promise of the marriage. He received something from God, but this something was not a present reality, but the certitude of the future gifts. The priest from before Jesus Christ was the objective general sign, but also the mediator of this distant liaison of engagement, of this promise given by God to the man, whose sacrifice the priest was bringing on a case-by-case basis.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The death is the ultimate test through which are separated the people who believe from the people who don’t. The death endured with faith, it is thus an homage, the fullest homage brought to God. This character is had, in the most perfect degree, by the death like a sacrifice. The own death like sacrifice, it means renouncing to the life from here, to the life based on the natural and visible hopes, for the sake of God. We make of the life from here a gift to God, because God asks for it, for He wants us to show in this renouncement, how much faith in Him we are capable of. God does not ask us for the life from here in order to add it to His life, He doesn’t ask us for give our live to Him in the literal meaning of the words, but through this, He asks for the supreme act of our faith in Him²².” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Though, not into a kenosis in the Protestant meaning, according to which there wouldn’t have been even possible to know the godhead and His glory. Like Jesus was known by the ones who didn’t voluntarily blind themselves, likewise it can be the Church known, with the holiness, with the love, and with all its supra-natural gifts.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The Theosis, by and large, it means a wakening up and an amplifying of the spiritual powers which stay numbed in our nature because of the sin, under the seal of an evil witchcraft. We cannot know which degree the forces of the human nature can grow up to. The huge intellectual variations and the spiritual variation from man to man, they show us that the human nature isn’t petrified in rigid limits, but it has a great elasticity. We cannot know how far can be raised up the human nature’s upper limit. On the other hand, this growth is not only a development from inside out, but it also is an adding of power, from outside, namely from God. Properly-said, the powers of the actualized nature and the divine grace which comes from there, they do not stay beside to one another like two separate entities, but they are synthesized into a single big spiritual force. The divine grace is rather the waking up and the amplifier of the nature’s powers. We have here a case analogue to that one which we notice when our powers are growing up when a fellow human creature is regarding us with love and with trust. We do not know what is from us and what is from him. But both of them are necessary²³.” (Stăniloae 1993)

²² Paul Althaus, “Biet letzten Dinge”, Gütersloh, 1933, p. 63.

“Until we haven’t cleaned ourselves of passions, the gifts of the Holy Ghost, which we have received at Baptism through the Mystery of the Chrismation, though they covertly work in each virtue, they won’t fully show themselves. But since have been removed the passions which have been covering them, the gifts of the Holy Ghost burst up in our conscience, from the heart’s hidden place, in the whole their brightness. Actually, these gifts, unlike the Baptism’s grace which leads the work of mortification of the former man and of general growth of the new man, they are meant to restore and to intensify the soul’s powers of knowledge and of manly persevering in God, after the soul has known Him. They are first of all gifts of mind’s illumination and, just because of that they are gifts for strengthening the mind in its orientation towards God. That’s why these gifts fully show their efficiency only when within us there have been sufficiently developed our intellectual powers which collaborate with the gifts of the Holy Ghost. By being the fruits of a Mystery sharing us the gifts of the Holy Ghost, they are meant to open the ghost from within us and to make rich the life “in Ghost”, but this cannot be accomplished before our purification of passions.” (Stăniloae 1992: 157)

23 The analogy between the growth of the power of the man, through the love which connects him with another man, and between the deification, it is very okay, since the last one is due to our report of love with God. That’s why, a lot of the traits of love can serve us like steps for the raising up to the understanding of the godlike gifts. Ludwig Binswanger finds that the man who exists like love he feels his existence like having its reason into a gift and being surrounded by gift, by divine grace, unlike the Heidegger’s worry-man, who feels himself guarded by void at the both ends of his existence. The question regarding: what the man feels himself gifted with, in the state of love, Binswanger answered it: with the fullness of the existence (Daseinsfülle), which is an increase of the love through itself, into me-you relation (Grundformen und Erkenntnis menschlichen Daseins, Zürich, 1942, p. 154). “This fullness we consider it like an overflowing of the being (Überschwang des Daseins). In opposition to the swelling and to the overflow of the evil of life (of the vital energy), the overflowing of the being in love, it must be understood like a supra-spatialization (Überräumichung) and making eternal of it (supra-historicity) [Verewigung (Übergeschlichkeit)]”. While to the Heidegger’s careful-man any launch toward the future moment it implies an enrichment, but, in the same time it also implies a renouncement to other possibilities, and thereby a plus and a minus, the man, like love, he is continuously into a pure growth, he grows up with all the possibilities, with all his virtualities. (Diese Transzendenz zeigt mehr den Doppelcharakter des Gründens der Sorge, nämlich «überschwingend-entziehend zumal» zu sein, sondern sie ist rein überschwingend... Infolgedessen werden dem Dasein als Liebe durch den Entwurf «keine bestimmten anderen Möglichkeiten» entzogen“. C. Op. P. 155). In this way we can understand more easily what it means putting into value all the man’s possibilities, through the deifying love. But, despite the whole abundance state, of the constantly increasing overflowing, produced by love, the nature does not come off from its finite characters, though it lives into infinity and it conveys the infinity, says Binswanger, making us to understand what it is possible like, the same thing, in the case of the deification: (“Sichüberschwingend «fliegt» das Dasein nicht hinaus... Aber im Gegensatz zum entziehenden Überstieg der Sorge bildet sich der reine Überschwang der Liebe das endliche Sein als unendliches ein”, p. 156).

“Only after the finishing of the work of purification, lead especially by the powers of the Baptism and of the Repentance, in the foreground appears the work of the gifts of the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 1992: 157)

“The soul doesn’t remain only with the gifts he has received at baptism and Repentance, but the beginning of activation of the gifts of the Holy Ghost means also an activation of His unmediated influence. Where the grace of the gift is, there is the Ghost too – that’s why are used alternatively the expressions: the grace and the Ghost. Through the Mystery of the Holy Chrism, the Holy Ghost has created a dwelling place in the hidden center of our being. The Ghost has remained always in contact with us since then.” (Stăniloae 1992: 158)

“The Baptism’s grace sets in work the gifts of the Holy Ghost, in the work of penetrating the thick layer of passions, for at the end to gush up, through the operated opening, their light, namely the light of the Holy Ghost on the deep realm of our being. But this light becomes increasingly transparent even before gushing up visibly at the end of the total cleaning of passions. Through each virtue, which is achieved after each passionate layer from within us, it becomes more transparent. But firstly, we feel the power that works within us to this cleaning. Namely, the Holy Ghost shows, in the beginning, more His power, and then he shows more his light, until the full gushing up of the illumination in our conscience. Thus, we must understand that, all of the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost: the ghost of the fear, the ghost of the strength, the ghost of the advice, the ghost of the science, the ghost of the knowledge, the ghost of the understanding, and the ghost of the wisdom, the first two indicate almost exclusively the doing power: of the fear, by abstaining from evil deeds; of the strength, by urging us towards committing the good things. From this initial phase, for the time being, it is absent the clear knowledge. This comes later, being represented by other five gifts of the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 1992: 158)

“Saint Maximos the Confessor interpreted the gifts of the Holy Ghost like this: after ceasing to commit sins by fear and after working the virtues by strength, we achieve by the gifts of the advice the habit of the discernment, which helps us to fulfill with the best judgment the godlike commandments and to discern the best fitted deeds to each circumstance. So, if at the beginning we rather work because of the fear of God, fulfilling the commandments for the simple fact that God has given them, later we will start to understanding by our own judgment that what God commands us it is a good thing, and what He stops us from doing, it is a bad thing. In the same time, we start understanding that it is more appropriate to fulfill the commandments in each circumstance.” (Stăniloae 1992: 158)

“From the first glitter of light – (namely from fulfilling the commandments by fear, E. l. t.’s n.) – we progress to an increased light by the gift of the science, which teaches us what to accomplish the good like, as it has been unveiled to us in commandments, in order us to achieve the virtues. This is because of being possible that somebody to realize the good comprised in commandments and still not to know what to do that good like, in the most satisfactory mode and that one might work recklessly. The gift of the science it is therefore that one that teaches us what to commit a good thing like, with right judgment.” (Stăniloae 1992: 159)

“Next in line is the gift of the knowledge which, unlike the gift of the advice, it no longer discerns only in a general manner the good from within a commandment, or the evil from another commandment, but it unveils the rationality or the deeper motivation itself of each commandment and of each virtue. Now we do not only know by and large that it is better to be humble than arrogant, but now I realize that through humbleness I reach to see the greatness of God, whilst the arrogance blinds me off, not allowing me to see anything else except me.” (Stăniloae 1992: 159)

“From the gift of the knowledge we are elevated to the gift of the understanding, which transforms the rather theoretical understanding of the virtues’ rationalities in an affectionate identification of myself to these rationalities, and that “produces a fusion of our natural powers to the modes and to the rationalities of the commandments”, or “it transforms our natural powers in the know rationalities of the virtues.” (Stăniloae 1992: 159)

“From the gift of the understanding we progress to the last gift, which is the gift of the wisdom. This gift “it elevates us to the Cause of the spiritual rationalities from within commandments and to be united with the Cause. By this, by knowing – as much as it is possible to the people –, on an unknown way, the simple rationalities of the things being in God, we pull out as from a gushing spring of our heart the truth from all things sharing it in diverse modes to the other people too”. In other words, this gift makes us partakers to the simple and exact contemplation of the truth from within all things. “Starting from here we will unveil the many and various rationalities of the truth out of the wise contemplation of the sensitive things and of the intelligible beings” (Saint Maximos the Confessor, Quaest. Ad Thalassas, q. 54). In everything we do or understand, we have now an ensemble vision, a vision upon the connection between the deeds or of the things, with the universal order.” (Stăniloae 1992: 159)

“When we have been given the wisdom, we have achieved all the virtues, namely we have achieved the state of dispassion. This state is the plain gushing up of the solar light, after it has been anticipated by increasingly intense rays. With this gushing up it starts the illumination itself. In all the individual virtues which preceded the state of dispassion, it has been shown a ray of the wisdom, in each ray being shown to us a part of the wisdom. Each ray has been a gift out of the enlightening gifts of the Holy Ghost. Now the wisdom appears to be whole, in the same time concentrated and simple. The wisdom is always united with the plenitude of the enlightening gifts of the Ghost. The wise man sees at once, in a wide and comprising mode, the truths from within all things, namely he all of them being in an interdependency, each of them having its own purpose and, in the same time, depending on their ultimate cause: God.” (Stăniloae 1992: 159-160)

“The wisdom is the gift of seeing God simultaneous to all things or through all things, as the effective: Maker, Upholder, and Leader – of all things. The wisdom helps us to see on a glance the whole our past life, its purpose, the line we must walk on, the solidary meaning of all the deeds and of all the events from the human life, of the things from nature, for all of them are explained by the Unique Power and Cause staying at the basis of all things and showing His work at once in all things.” (Stăniloae 1992: 160)

“On the basis of the simultaneous looking and understanding given us by wisdom, we then can detach the meaning of each thing and the norm of each deed we must do. If at the beginning, we have been gradually elevated from the partially known to the universally known, now, from the peak of the general picture we lower our eyes now on a detail and then on another detail from the total landscape, immediately ascertaining the place, immediately understanding the purpose, and immediately establishing its norm in the landscape.” (Stăniloae 1992: 160)

“On a place Saint Maximos the Confessor discerned between discernment and knowledge. The first one is born out of the virtuous activity, while the second one is born out of faith; the first one is of a practical order, while the second one is of contemplative order. Through the first one we discern the good from the bad, while through the second one we know the rationalities of the seen and of the unseen realities, having their foundation in God. We could identify the first one to the gifts of: advice, science, knowledge, and understanding, while the second one to the gifts of wisdom, for in other places Saint Maximos the Confessor didn’t consider the faith as developing in knowledge, on a different line than that one of the virtues. But we could reckon that the practical discernment and the contemplative knowledge are two converging peaks which, ending in love, they give birth on a superior level to the mysterious knowledge about God, differing from wisdom, or from knowing God out of the world's things." (Stăniloae 1992: 160-161)

"Palamas said that Paul, who forgot about himself, when he was elevated to the third sky, he stays together with the cases which the charismas are given in: prophecy, healing, speaking in languages etc. and these charismas are manifested both through soul and body. God sometimes elevates to ecstasy the ones who truly pray, but some other times He lets them within themselves, by mysteriously working Him through their souls and body." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 49)

"In addition to this one must observe that nobody turns the gifts he has received from God, back to Him, without having added to them his work. The grapes, the bread, the wine, the oil, given to Gods, they aren't only the gift from God, but also the human work imprinted in them. Of course, the man works also through the powers God has given him. Although, the man could use these powers not for a work through which to turn back the received gifts bearing his human seal, namely valorized by him. By doing so, the man multiplies the received talents, according to the word of the Savior. And God wants the man to get tired for imprinting a valuing seal of his, on the received gifts, by what makes them human gifts too." (Stăniloae 2003: 357)

"When somebody doesn't understand that he must turn back to God the gift he has received from Him, often the gift is taken away from that man without his will, in order him to realize that the Giver is more than it is the gift. Upon the world and upon our life it is thus placed the cross. When we no longer see God through the willing cross, by surpassing the world and our life in the love for God, then He makes Himself transparent to us through the unwilling cross." (Stăniloae 2003: 357-358)

"God has given us the things, as gifts, not only for us to habituate ourselves in the strength of surpassing them towards God, but also in order to surpass the things for our fellow humans, by giving them the things we have received. Our love, manifested by using the things as gifts, we must direct it not only towards God but also towards our fellow humans in order to gain their love – the communion with them." (Stăniloae 2003: 359)

Christ Jesus

“God employs supra-natural extraordinary acts especially in the beginning of new periods in the history of the salvation plan. (...) But the truly new and ultimate period it is inaugurated by the supra-natural extraordinary acts of Jesus Christ, through which it is being formed everywhere the people of God, which advances towards achieving by the man of everything that is given to the human into Christ, in order to participate to God through direct and maximum union with God.”

“Jesus Who was the most righteous, and He suffered the biggest injustice from the part of the world – the biggest injustice related to the fact that He was the most righteous – but he has been elevated in the heavenly glory for His righteousness, He upholds in the most effective way the struggle for the true justice during history.” (Stăniloae 2003: 4)

“Our consummate justice before God it has been accomplished in Christ. But, also the consummate reward for this justice, from the part of God, it has taken place in Christ too. For everything Christ suffered from the world, for He remained righteous before God, he has been given the eternal glory, above all and above everything.” (Stăniloae 2003: 4)

“In Christ, the fullest justice of God has crowned the fullest justice of the man, and there it has been accomplished a correspondence between them. Here appears the importance of the human will within Christ.” (Stăniloae 2003: 4)

“As man, Christ fulfills the justice as a representative of ours, of everybody; and as God he rewards this justice with justice. He does both of these for He wants us to be imparted not only with His justice as God, or with the justice of God granted Him out of mercy - better said out of the mercy of God granted without justice, passively received by us -, but also with His justice as man, through our effort, helped, of course, by the grace of Christ, or by His Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2003: 4)

“God accomplished the full justice in Christ not only by the fact that he fills up Christ, like man, with the whole glory and brightness of the divine Persons, but also for He fills us up with this happiness in Christ, for we are victorious in Christ.” (Stăniloae 2003: 5)

“The full holiness, the full priesthood of the man, it has been accomplished in Christ. This is because Christ has totally given Himself to God, through His life of obedience without compromise and through His sacrifice. But just by this he has given Himself in an equal manner to us too. He has placed Himself as man in the same transparency and faithfulness towards God and towards us, in which he is as God, but in a transparency totally accessible to us. In Christ has descended amongst us the inter-Trinitarian faithfulness in a divine Person, in order to become characteristic to the assumed humanity too, as faithfulness towards God and towards us, and to communicate this power to us too, so that we to achieve it too, in both directions. To this, the divine hypostasis of the eternal consummate faithfulness it has become also Hypostasis of the humanity, or the human Hypostasis too of this faithfulness.” (Stăniloae 2003: 284)

“Christ conveys us this power of the faithfulness through the Holy Ghost, Who, from trinity, he also has passed in Christ as man. In Christ’s sacrifice there is the power of our sacrifice; in His priesthood, there is our priesthood. Just in His embodiment it is accomplished an extreme surrender of the human.” (Stăniloae 2003: 284)

“Being the supreme holiness in human form, Christ is also the man for people in supreme and exemplary degree. If the saint is a man for people, for he is firstly a man for God, Christ is the man for people in the supreme degree, not for sparing us from the duty of the sanctification, but for us too to achieve the holiness or the active faithfulness towards God and towards our fellow humans.” (Stăniloae 2003: 284-285)

“(…) we cannot become saints except into Christ, for He takes us in Himself in His state of sacrifice brought to God, and for He instills us the same act and the same state of sacrifice, or of self-transcending, or of total faithfulness towards God, in which Himself is.” (Stăniloae 2003: 285)

“Through Christ, the holiness as supreme reciprocal transference of the Persons of the Holy Trinity it is being communicated to us as consummate sensitiveness of the relation between the human person and God and, through this, amongst the human persons too.” (Stăniloae 2003: 285)

“The fullest loving going out towards the creatures, God has made it through the embodiment of His Son Who has assumed the human nature. But in the same time, the Son has filled the human nature up with His divine love towards the Father. The Holy Ghost unites us, through love, with God, by making on Himself the bearer of the love from God to us and from us to God and amongst us, and the embodied Son is alike too. The son of God moves us from within us through the love he has it from the Father, by bringing us the love of the Father, and the love between Him and the Father, and in the same time seeding within us His love for the Father and for all the people.” (Stăniloae 2003: 292)

“The privileged position of the human being into cosmos it is shown especially by the fact that the Son of God has made man on Himself, and not angel, and with His man nature He becomes the Master of the angels on the heavenly throne. He made man on Himself for only through His human nature He could gather in Himself the whole creation, including the material creation. If He had made an angel on Himself, He couldn't have done this. But He gathers also the angels in Himself, though, for He is in the same time the all-comprising Spirit." (2003: 449)

"In Christ, the resurrected body becomes so transparent to godhead, than even the inferior people see this godhead, and therefore they no longer need so much the explaining from the superior angels; and, somehow, the inferior one are even in a priority, for they know the godhead through the humanity Christ has it common with them. The angels rather know the depths of the godhead; the people know rather the mystery of the godhead made obvious through Resurrection." (2003: 455)

"While satan has compromised the body and its human sensitiveness and the sensitive surface of the world, Christ has restored the value of the body and of the sensitive world. Christ has made soul bearer of godhead and by doing this Christ restored the purity of the body and of its sensitiveness and the role the world has to be a transparent of God. Christ has shown that the evil isn't fatally tied to the body and to the world. Christ has restored in the same time the power of the human will of keeping the body not-mastered - through sensitiveness - by the world's surface. The body and its sense have become in Christ what they must be: an organ of clean perceiving the sensitive world; and the world, it has become a place transparent to the presence of God." (2003: 484-485)

"On the other hand, a real progress of ours, and of our relations with our fellow humans, it cannot but bring us the fight against passions, helped by the grace of Christ Who opposes Himself to any falling of the human nature under the slavery of the passions." (2003: 485)

"The originality of Jesus it consists in living the life and enduring the death in a unitary and consummate mode, for God and for people. But in this double direction it I shown also the unity between His life from before death and Resurrection and between His efficiency from after Resurrection. The whole existence of Jesus from before His death, in death, and after Resurrection, it stays under the sign of this full communication of God towards us, but also of our love towards God, for under the rain of His love as God, shown towards us, and under the power of His love towards God as man, to germinate and to be developed within us the love towards God, as sign of the state of salvation begun within us through the love of God." (Stăniloae 2006: 12-13)

"Through the man God unites the world with Himself. Through the human nature Christ gathers the world, fully, in Himself. As man united in a culminant degree with God, or like God acting through the man, Christ heals sick people, commands to the sea and to the wind, resurrects dead people and resurrect Himself to the eternal life, showing thus the final state of the world. This is another meaning in which He has been given after Resurrection, “the whole power in heavens and on earth” (Mt. 28: 18). Because Christ is the accomplishing of the real man even before His Resurrection, he brings the man, through Resurrection, to the end destined to him.” (Stăniloae 2006: 15)

“Saint Apostle Paul identified the Embodied Christ to the Son of God into Whom all the things were created and placed (Col. 1: 16-20). In Jesus Christ all the things will be gathered again, for in Him all the things were placed since the beginning. The fact of the full anew gathering of all things in Christ it has an anticipation in the fact that all the things were created and placed in Him.” (Stăniloae 2006: 15)

“The ecumenical synods caught in a concise formula the evangelical and living countenance of the divine-human Person of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 16)

“The First Ecumenical Synod from Nicaea and the Second one from Constantinople, taking the confession of faith from Baptism, of the Church from Jerusalem, they established its definitive text referring to Jesus Christ, in the form of the Nicaea-Constantinopolitan Symbol, which confesses about Christ that he is on one hand the Son of God, the Only Begotten One, of the same being with the Father, born before the ages, on the other hand, that He embodied Himself from the Holy Ghost and out of Virgin Mary and he made Himself a man.” (Stăniloae 2006: 16)

“The Fourth Ecumenical Synod develops this confession about Christ, by declaring that Jesus Christ is “One and the Same, real God and real man, made of rational soul and of body, of the same being with the Father according to godhead and of the same being with us according to His quality as human being; in everything like us, except for the sin; born out of the Father, before the ages, according to the godhead, and in the last days, born out of Virgin Mary, the Birth Giver of God, according to His quality as human being; known in two natures in an unmixed way, unchanged, undivided, not-separated, the difference of the nature being by no means abolished due to the union, but rather being preserved the feature of each nature and together-flowing into a person and into a hypostasis.” (Stăniloae 2006: 16-17)

“In essence, one confesses that the Son of God, the One from before the ages, He has embodied Himself and He has made man on Himself, out of Virgin Mary, and by embodiment it has been accomplished the hypostatical union, or the union in a hypostasis of the godlike and of the human natures, namely a Person in two natures, the Person of Jesus Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 17)

“The humanity of Christ is completely open to the Father and to the Holy Ghost. The humanity of Christ participates to the consummate communion of the Son with the Father and with the Ghost. The humanity of Christ cannot manifest an “enmity” towards God, for its Hypostasis is Himself the Son of God. But Christ cannot close, on Himself, either towards His fellow humans, for the divine Hypostasis He subsists in, in a real manner, it hasn’t either “enmity” towards the people, nor a will to affirm Himself against the people, neither He fears a narrowing from them. God love His creatures, by excellence. One of the hypostatical union’s implications is that the human nature, by not subsisting in own human hypostasis, there is no question too, concerning His affirmation in a competition with the other human hypostases. Through the divine Hypostasis the human nature is comprised in, His human nature is open to all His fellows into humanity.” (Stăniloae 2006: 39)

“We know Christ as having the mastery over all things, but we know Him also like the Lamb stabbed for us. He is our Master, but a Master Who moves us by the fact that he has made, on Himself, and He remains, the stabbed Lamb, but without ceasing to be our Master. “Of the One Who sits on the throne, to be the blessing and the honor and the glory and the power, forever and ever” (Apoc. 5: 13). He is the lord, for He is the Lamb, Who removes the world’s sins; He is the Lamb, Who removes the world’s sins for He is the almighty Lord, but He is almighty in His love too. He forces us in conscience, He gains us in the deepest and the most total willing worshipping, for He is our most total Servant, the most exemplary, and with the fullest efficacy. “He who wants to be greater amongst you, let him be your servant.” He is the greatest and that’s why he is the fullest Servant, the model Servant (Mt. 20: 27-28)

“These three qualities Christ has, they are both ministrations and dignities of His. And they are not-separated too. He teaches by serving, He sacrifices, on Himself, overcoming the consequences of the sin, and He masters like a stabbed Lamb (Apoc. 5 - the whole chapter). These three qualities cannot be really separated, for in each of them there are also implied the others two. Although, in each of the three kinds of activities, it is being more highlighted one or another of the three ministrations, the two others being less involved in that specific activity.” (Stăniloae 2006: 48-49)

“The three forms of ministration are combined with the three directions of the savior work of Christ. The hierarchal ministration is being directed towards His own body, and towards God and people: the exemplary deeds and His life’s model, they are directed towards people as concretized teaching, and towards God, and Christ's own human nature. Even the teaching Christ gives, though it is mainly directed towards people, it is also the fulfillment of an obedience brought to the Father and a putting in relief of the will of the Father and of His glory, being a praising of God, a serving of Him. Finally, through the power Christ is being exercising upon nature, upon death, and upon people, He is extolling, in the same time, the power of the God in Trinity, a power that is Christ's too, but it shows also the power Christ has given to his body too." (Stăniloae 2006: 49)

"In the whole His work Christ manifests the threefold relation He has with His human nature, with the Father and with the people, and through the whole His work He manifests His threefold ministration as Teacher-Prophet, as Hierarch, and as Emperor." (Stăniloae 2006: 49)

"Like the Son of God Who has embodied on Himself, in order to elevate us to the dialogue or to the direct communion with Himself, Christ is unable not to be and not to manifest, on Himself, as man too, in relation of obedience with the Father, and not to fill His human nature up with His Godhead, and not to actively achieve and promote His relation with the people. These directions of Christ's savior work aren't else but the natural irradiations – and therefore benevolent – of His Person, a Person united in the highest degree through the godlike nature but also through the deified human nature, with the Father, and through the deified human nature with the people. And only by His work, headed on these three directions, Christ is able to wholly fulfill His savior work." (Stăniloae 2006: 49)

"Only through the three activities and qualities – of Teacher, of Hierarch, and of Emperor – Christ could save and consummate the people; and only through all three of them together, exercised purely and eminently, in a manner the average people aren't capable of. This is for the people must be enlightened in order to walk also by their will the road that brings them to God; they must overcome the enmity between them and God by renouncing to their pride and to the egotistic pleasures, namely by actively living of a state of sacrificing which they couldn't have except through the direct connection with a Person Who has been able to bring forth a pure sacrifice, capable in its intensity of crumbling down the consequences of the sin; finally, the people must be upheld by a power that is above the simple human power, on the way of sacrifice made know to them by the all-true and all-luminous teaching." (Stăniloae 2006: 49)

"The three directions of the savior work and the three forms of ministration for exercising the savior work, they naturally come out of the Person of the Son of God Who embodied, on Himself, and Who has assumed the role of world's Savior." (Stăniloae 2006: 49)

“For any order the three directions of the savior work of Christ and the three ministrations of Christ to be presented in there can be brought arguments but none of them are decisive. But there is a temporal and real order of the savior acts of Christ, even if all of them belong, in a more or less accentuated degree, to all of the three directions of His savior work and to all the three forms of ministration dedicated to salvation.” (Stăniloae 2006: 49)

“Through all the things and the circumstances, the godlike Word speaks to us, asking for our answer. He speaks to us concomitantly, by addressing Himself to us, in an intimate manner and mysteriously in our conscience. But the godlike Word speaks to us in Jesus Christ embodied like man, through His direct words as God in human form, accentuating within us the responsibility, by the man model He has brought before us. His words touch concomitantly our conscience, in a much more intense form, and His words light to our conscience the words He addresses to us through things and through always new situations. In a speaking too, addressed to the conscience, He makes actual in front of the conscience, and to us personally, the words He uttered yore. The Word comes to us through all the things and through conscience, but the clearest He comes to us through the words of the Scripture, which He addresses us continuously in His quality of godlike embodied Word. He has impropriated the human words in order to address them to us in the clearest mode. Himself, the hypostatical Word, in order to continuously actualize within us the obligation of answering, He makes continuously resounding, in our conscience, in the same time with His calling as God also His calling as accomplished man, therefore like the man we must be. And, for He has been such a man in the relation with His fellow humans, He asks us to accomplish, on ourselves, as human being, in the relation of every moment with our fellow humans. But this, He gives a special intensity to the appeals our fellow human make to our responsibility towards them. Thus, Christ speaks to us through the words of our fellow humans too, who call us to help them, and who call us to a life of responsible seriousness. By all of these, Christ ties us directly to Himself, and He communicates us His power and love, but He asks us for our love too. By all of these, He helps us growing up spiritually, in His image.” (Stăniloae 2006: 53)

“Christ speaks to us not only like God, but also like accomplished man; He communicates to us not only the Word of God towards us, but also His answer as man made towards God; especially this answer of His towards God, is communicated to us by Christ, for He prays for us and He teaches us too how to pray. By this, He strengthens too our answering word towards God. Properly-said, the whole teaching He gives us, it has the purpose of making us answering the calling from God. Thus, by His teaching, He isn't useful only to us, but He glorifies God too. Or, He is useful to us for He makes us to glorify God. The direction towards God is implied too in the teaching He addresses us. He glorified God, for He gave the people the words the Father gave Him (Jn. 17: 8, 14) and for He made known to the people the name of the Father and He made the people too keeping His words (Jn. 17: 6).” (Stăniloae 2006: 54)

“Whilst in the ministration as Teacher-Prophet, Jesus Christ is directly aiming towards us, but this ministration involves in it the will to tie us to the Father for by fulfilling this teaching we do the will of the Father, and therefore this ministration comprises in itself also a direction aiming to God, the ministration of Hierarch He brings, on Himself, as sacrifice through, it is directly aiming towards the Father. Although, the ministration of Hierarch involves in itself a direction aiming towards the people too, for this ministration wants to frame in itself the people too, and therefore it comprises a direction aiming towards the people too. And for on this purpose Christ brings as sacrifice the human nature He has assumed, this ministration has a direction and an effect aiming towards this human nature. These three directions are so involved one in another, then it is impossible to be separated; and even more than that, it is impossible even to be cogitated one without the others. In the Holy Scripture and in the thinking of the Holy Fathers, all these three directions are affirmed, concerning the hierarchal ministration of Christ. In the Epistle towards Jews, it is said: “rightly, any hierarch, being taken from amongst people, he is appointed for people, towards the things which are of God, in order to bring “gifts and sacrifice for sins” (Hebr. 5: 1).” (Stăniloae 2006: 55)

“Christ power manifested before Resurrection not only as a power felt within the souls of the ones who came close to Him, and in the commandments, He gave referring to the foundation of the Church and to the life the ones who believe in Him must live, but also as a power upon nature by deeds of healing some sick people and by resurrecting some dead people. When Christ “rebuked” the wind and the sea, and these ones calmed down, the amazed people exclaimed: “Who is this, that even the wind and the sea obey Him?” (Mt. 8: 27). The Holy Fathers explained this obedience, as also the fright the natural elements were engulfed by, at the Lord’s death, by their reference to the creator Master and to his words, or the echoes produced by His words embodied in things. They follow their course as long as the creator and upholder Word maintains these “words” or “rationalities” of His referring to them, as grounds of the natural development of their materialized echoes. But when the upholder Word, Who has become a man too, and Who stay in a special relation with the materialized image of their divine rationalities too – and of His - He was in sufferance, they felt that too and they were frightened. Then the Word of God spoke to the people and thus, He made know on this way too, the dependence of the rational fabric of the things on Him like supreme rationality as Person, become their human rationality as persons too.” (Stăniloae 2006: 65)

“Anyway, the power exercised upon the soul s it wasn’t only a power of His godlike glory, but it was also a power of love reconciling with His kenosis. He was exercising this power through the truth He was preaching, and through the sacrifice He manifested His love too, which heralded to the people the Kingdom of God as kingdom of love. That’s why Christ was gaining the hearts through their joy of engaging themselves on the love’s road, under the leadership and the power provided by Him. By admitting in front of Pilate that He is emperor, Jesus declares that His Kingdom is not from this world, namely that it wasn’t like the kingdoms from this world. And by being even more specific, He said: “I was born to this and I have come in the world, to confess the truth. Anyone who proceeds out of truth, he listens to My voice” (Jn. 18: 37).” (Stăniloae 2006: 65)

“It is to be mentioned also the fact that if the disciples hadn’t recognized a corporality in the One Who was showing, on Himself, to them, namely His corporality from before His death, they wouldn’t have had the conviction and they couldn’t have spoken about the “Resurrection” of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 66)

“Some Protestant theologians speaking about the “transformation” of the Lord’s body, they avoid to speak about this “transformation” is a “spiritualization” of the body. About this “spiritualization” spoke Saint Apostle Paul in II Cor. 5: 16 and 3: 18. This spiritualization is an effect of the most intensive work of the Holy Ghost within Christ’s body, which gives the body a transparency, and it makes it irradiating light or glory. This irradiation is, in the same time, a mode of the most intense communion in which the person who overwhelmingly imposed, on himself, through the body, making the body transparent. In the songs on the Thomas’s Sunday, of the Orthodox Church, they say that, the rib of Christ that Thomas touched, it was fire and only the condescendence of Christ protected Thomas not to be burnt. This fire can be considered also as a intense warmth of the godlike love, which was then unimpeded communicated through the resurrected body. And this work of the Ghost, it is in the same time a sanctification, which doesn’t take place were there wasn’t an effort of purification from the pleasures which thicken the body, where there wasn’t a renunciation to egotism; but into Christ, this purification was brought to accepting the death. “The body of the resurrected one is a spiritual body” (soma pneumatikon), says Saint Paul, a body which penetrates and changes the modality of its separated existence. Therefore, such a body cannot be noticed in the conditions of this existence.” (Stăniloae 2006: 67)

“According to the Epistle towards Jews, Jesus Christ presents Himself with His sacrifice in front of the Father and then he takes a seat on the right hand of the Father, but Christ’s sacrifice has an eternal power to clean up on the ones who believe (Hebr. 1: 4; 9: 17-24; 12: 12). The Apocalypse expresses this paradox of the permanent validity of Christ’s sacrifice and of Christ’s glory, through the stabbed Lamb Who reigns (Apoc. 5: 12).” (Stăniloae 2006: 76)

“In one regard, Christ entered at the Father, by His death, and this sacrifice showed the beginning of its power through resurrection. The Father receives it with its scent of good fragrance, and the sacrifice becomes permanent in its essence, since it is received, and its essence is shown in the resurrection of Christ, in which it is shown also the savior power Christ was filled with, for Christ is ever since, as man, in full communion with the Father. But, for us the people, and for the salvation’s oikonomia, Christ remains after resurrection with His body, still not totally spiritualized, and so on a plan closer to us, from which he could make Himself visible to us, whenever He wanted. This was required by the need for His disciples to be convinced about His resurrection and to receive their sending to preaching in order to found the Church.” (Stăniloae: 2006: 76)

“According to the New Testament, Christ elevates His humanity to the fullness of the power He works upon us with, through the four successive moments: the descent to hell, the Resurrection with the body, the Ascent to heavens, and the sitting on the right hand of the Father. The Ascent to heavens and the sitting of the right hand of the Father, they represent the full spiritualization and deification of Christ’s human body, the full filling up of His human body with the godlike infinity, the full elevating of His human body to the state of transparent and unimpeded environment of the infinite love of God in its work directed towards us. Doubtlessly, this doesn’t mean also the merging of the Christ’s body with the godlike infinity.” (Stăniloae 2006: 76)

“The interval between Resurrection and Ascent had, besides the mentioned roles, also that one of assuring the disciples through sensitive acts (Christ ate with them) that He resurrected, and to tell them by words, that He will be with them to the end of the time – namely about His communion with them and with His Church.” (Stăniloae 2006: 76)

“The Ascent doesn’t take Christ out of the communion with the ones who will believe in Him, but, a contrary, it brings this communion to the fullness of a reciprocal interiority with those people, due to the culminant spiritualization His body reached through Ascent.” (Stăniloae 2006: 76)

“Since the phase from between resurrection and ascent, the body of Christ entered and exited through the locked doors and “He was always together with His disciples”, not coming, but “rather showing Himself to them when He wanted” (Saint Gregory Palamas, Word no. 22, at the Ascent of the Lord, G.P., 151, col. 296 C.). Through Ascent, Christ has passed His body on the plan of such a consummate spiritualization - without ceasing to have His body – so that He no longer showed Himself visibly, but he dwells invisibly within the ones who believe in Him. The fact that before Ascent He is with His disciples everywhere, and that after Ascent He dwells within everyone who believes in Him, with His godlike infinity intimately placed in Him, it doesn’t mean a spatial ubiquity of His body. The state of spiritualization is something else than the spatial ubiquity. It is a presence of spiritual depth and height, which can become sensitive in diverse degree of intensity, according to the degree of spiritual noticing power, or of faith, of the one who opens himself to Christ and by this he “see” Christ and he feels Christ in himself.” (Stăniloae 2006: 77).

“His presence is felt by the ones who believe in Christ beyond any visible bodily mediation. Even more, the ones who feel the presence of Christ, the do not feel it only in themselves, but also in other people, and sometimes even all around, or everywhere, not like a huge body, spatially extended, but as a invisible body of Christ’s Person, so that He had it during His life on earth, in the usual human proportions, though fully transparent. Others, who haven’t progressed yet to this degree of feeling the Christ’s presence as Person, they feel the effects of His presence; they feel this presence as a power that urges them and helps them towards clean and good thought and deeds, as producing within them a state of peace, of joy, a feeling of their connection with the infinity of Christ’s love as Person, a love that irradiates from beyond them. This state of culminant spiritualization of Christ’s body it doesn’t consist only in the possibility of dwelling and of being making itself felt as body worn by the Person of Christ, full of power that is helping towards good in all the ones who believe, but in the supreme intimacy too with the Father. Jesus is now, with His body too, where the godhead is, on the godlike throne, on the level of the supreme authority, for the fact that in His body too, in a consummate manner, He is full of the infinity of godlike the life and love. The Son of God no longer lives a kenosis, a depletion of glory in His humanity, but His humanity is full of the godlike glory. The godhead has totally overwhelmed His body, or better said, the godhead is transparent and irradiates unimpeded through Christ’s human body, without abolishing it. God is man, the man is God, without ceasing to be both man and God; the man is God without ceasing to be a man, God is man without ceasing to be God. In Christ the man is God, Who upholds the universe and Who leads the universe towards the deification he is in. (...) The sitting “on the right hand of the Father”, of the embodied Son, it shows us that the Father Give Christ just the first place in leading the world towards deification, in the work of bringing the world to the union with God, to its filling up with the godlike infinity, in a relation of imperishable love with God. The expression “on the right hand of the glory” or “on the right hand of God” from the Epistle towards Jews (Hebr. 1L: 3; 10: 12) it is explained in the mentioned meaning by Saint Apostle Paul. (...) The ultimate target of Christ’s work is to defeat the universal death, namely to elevate the creation from the state of extreme weakness the separation from the life’s spring produces it – God being the source of the life –; Christ’s target means the strengthening of our spirit out of the godlike Ghost Who irradiates out of Christ, insomuch that to overcome the supremacy of the automatism of a callous nature which leads to death. And this is being done by elevating the people to the consummate communion with God as Person, and infinitely in His spiritual power.” (Stăniloae 2006: 77)

“If in the culminant spiritualization of the body of the Lord, it is involved not only the state of consummate godhead and of full intimacy of the Son with the Father, but also His capacity to dwell within us with the whole loving power and with the whole infinite life of the godhead, the sitting on the right hand of the Father it reconciles with His habitation within us. It is a common habitation of the Son and of the Father within us, for Christ has become, like man too, fully transparent and open to the Father.” (Stăniloae 2006: 78)

“The full habitation takes place within the hearts of the ones who love God, after they have cleaned themselves of the passions’ egotism, by accomplishing His commandments, so that they have opened themselves and they have become transparent to the Holy Ghost from within Christ, and to the infinite spiritual horizon Christ is in. Only thus the ones who become “heaven” of God, or who overcome the separation between the callous human subject - and which has almost become an object - and the divine subject, only they elevate the whole existence to this unity into Ghost. “If somebody loves Me, he will keep My Word and My Father will love him and We will come to him and We will make dwelling place in him.” (Jn. 4: 23). On this dwelling and on its conditioning through our love, it depends, so exclusively, our elevation, that without them we can participate to the Resurrection of the Lord but we cannot participate to His Ascent too, namely we cannot participate to the eternal union with Him. The one who won’t be partakers to Ascent, they won’t have the Lord within them, but they will only know about Him.” (Stăniloae 2006: 78)

“Christ’s Ascent with the body to heavens and His sitting on the right hand of the Father, it means Christ’s elevation, as man, on the supreme level of efficacy upon the ones who believe. In this it stays the supreme power and glory Christ has ascended to, through His ascent to heaven.” (Stăniloae 2006: 78)

“Without any doubt, the Holy Ghost makes more efficient the presence of Christ within us, through His more felt work the Ghost comes to the fore, to our feeling, but the Ghost takes the foreground in order to make the presence of Christ even more felt to us. When the sunlight crossing through the clouds, it comes to the fore, it doesn’t come only for itself, but in order to make clearer the visible things. In addition to this, Christ stays further at the basis of the more felt work of the Ghost. The Ghost comes within us through Christ’s transparency. Through this transparency the active infinity of Christ’s love has entered in communication with us. “He will take out of Mine” (Jn. 16: 14), said Christ; the Ghost will take not out of a Christ Who has remained far and passive, not from an impersonal repository gathered by Christ, but out of Christ Who continues to be active, together-active with the Holy Ghost, bringing the godlike powers through the transparent body of Christ, for these powers are no longer impeded to be communicated to us through a not-fully transparent effort, as the effort from before Resurrection.” (Stăniloae 2006: 84)

“The human nature assumed by Christ it isn’t that one of a human hypostasis, which can be closed and individualistically used, but it is the human nature of God-the Word, the Hypostasis out of which derive, and towards which tend to come back the rationalities of the whole creation. (...) As such, also the Ghost’s Hypostasis united with Christ in the Christ’s human nature too, He can be extended within the whole humanity. The Christ’s human nature has become the more capable to comprise the whole creation after Resurrection and Ascent, as in this spiritualized state Christ’s human nature has been opened to the godlike infinity which wants to overflow with its love upon all of us, and within all of us, and to gather us in a unity with God and amongst us. The one who opens himself to the godlike infinity in Christ, by participating to this infinity, he cannot avoid tending to unite on himself with all the others in this love he is being filled up with.” (Stăniloae 2006: 86)

“Through the embodiment of the Son of God as man, it has been constituted the hypostasis, which has become the fundamental Hypostasis of the entire mankind, of the entire creation brought to the state of “new creation”, which is being continuously renewed out of the infinite and not-withered life of the embodied Word.” (Stăniloae 2006: 89)

“But the Holy Fathers didn’t consider Christ as Head of the Church separately through Embodiment, or through Crucifixion, or through Resurrection, but through all of these connected to one another. Through Embodiment Christ had laid down only the first foundation of the Church, by taking upon Himself the “first fruit” of our humanity. The body he has assumed, it becomes the full foundation of the Church, for it is passed through death and through resurrection. Only thus His body is the source from where flows within us the power of dying to the sin and of resurrecting; only thus, His body become fully spiritualized and transparent to the infinite godlike life, it becomes the environment we too are receiving this life through. Considering each of these deeds through which Christ becomes the Head, and the foundation, and the source of life of the Church, each time the Holy Father concretely declare Christ as the Church's Head, they understood Christ as the One Who has passed with His body through all these moments and Who has elevated His body to this state of full spiritualization and transparency to the godlike life." (Stăniloae 2006: 89)

"In order to be Head of the Church, Christ must have something in common with the people who constitute His body. But in the same time, Christ must have the special position as head, namely He must have something special different from all the ones who constitute His body. This special something is His godhead. Christ is by this, Head that sees incomparably further than any man can see by his human mind, and therefore Christ can communicate to His Church incomparably greater a light and a life, than the head of the man can communicate to his human body. Christ, in quality of Head, He is open to the infinite light and life, and he communicated these one to His Church. Through His quality as God, but also through the quality of His resurrected body, Christ is the Head, by excellence, of the entire creation, being elevated above all human and created things, not having above Himself any other head. But Christ is especially the head of the humanity gathered within Him, for He has made, on Himself, man too, and for He has resurrected." (Stăniloae 2006: 89)

"In order to be able to make, on Himself, as Head of the mankind, by becoming man and by putting, on Himself, in organic connection with the mankind, aiming to communicate to the mankind, without difficulty, the infinite godlike life, the Son of God must have something in Himself which makes Him appropriate to this. But the mankind also must have something in itself which to make the humanity able for the Son of God to become man and by this to become the mankind's Head, a Head that communicated to the mankind the infinite godlike light and life." (Stăniloae 2006: 89-90)

"The Word of God must have something in Himself that makes His appropriate for the opening, in Himself, the infinite horizons of the godlike life, and the human must have something in itself in order to be able to know in the Word of God these horizons and to be able to be imparted with them. The Son of God must be able to communicate the infinite godlike light and life in human forms, namely to make our humanity as His own, without abolishing it in Himself and without our humanity to remain locked up towards the infinite godlike light and life. This adequacy of God-the Word to the mankind and of the mankind to God-the Word, it stood firstly at the basis of the union of two natures in the Person of God-the Words.” (Stăniloae 2006: 90)

“By assuming the humanity as His image, the godlike Logos makes the humanity increasingly fuller similar to Himself, and then, by becoming the Head of the Church, this humanity of His is being imprinted in each Church’s limb as model of Him, by making the quality of image of each limb to become increasingly more as Him. But He does this on the measure each limb strives to become increasingly more like the embodied Word.” (Stăniloae 2006: 90)

“Christ is the Pantocrator of the Church in a sense that is special comparatively to that one that He is the Pantocrator of the creation. Christ maintains the Church in Himself like a unitary body, as a unity, but not like an impersonal unity, for he stays in an unmediated dialogue with each Church’s limb, and by this He keeps every limb in connection with all the other limbs. Thus, by staying in a dialogue with the entire Church understood as symphonic partner in this dialogue, Christ dwells, thus, in a living mode, in this house of Him, but in this house is placed as person each believer as an intelligible stone, and on this way Christ continuously is being harmonizing the building and he keeps it alive.” (Stăniloae 2006: 91)

“Assembled under Christ-the Head, the human heads or persons do not lose this quality of theirs for their human nature as much as it composes their persons, for out of mankind’s Head from the divine-human Person – Who is Christ – they receive the light and the power of being fully accomplished heads or persons, who participate to the light of the supreme Head, and who assume the leading of their own beings, according to the received light. They are called to by in this mode, equal heads to Christ by grace, or together-Christ, enjoying full freedom in the relation of love with Him, without breaking the unity amongst them and by finding, in the same time, in Christ, the harmony of a fully accomplished body of Him. This is for all the things recognize Him as the unique source of the light from above them, which they can be elevated in.” (Stăniloae 2006: 91)

“The glory the Church is full of, it coincides to the full achieving of the quality as sons of God, by the Church’s members, a quality that means the most intimate communion with the Father. This quality consists not only in seeing, but also in being imparted with the glory of Son has, as the Embodied Word of God, as man. This is for Christ by being in organic connection with His body His glory is being spread upon His whole body. But the state as sons it is obtained through a transcending above the natural and limited life, in the light of the infinite life of God, in the intimacy of the filial relation with Him. And in this state, one advances continuously, and one advances even during the time of one's earthly life towards resurrection and incorruptibility." (Stăniloae 2006: 92)

"The Embodiment alone, it doesn't make Christ the full Head of the saved mankind and on the basis of the embodiment alone, Christ doesn't bring the mankind to it full glory yet. This is because of the humanity He has assumed through embodiment still doesn't have all the features through which He can be a real Heads and through which He can dwell within us, filling us up with His light and with His power of leading us towards the incorruptible and eternal life in God and of bringing us in it." (Stăniloae 2006: 92)

"Through embodiment, the Word of God has done only the act of repositioning Himself in the position of head of mankind, for salvation. It is necessary the assumed human nature to contribute too, to the walking on a road and to fulfilling some acts through which the embodied Word to make His human nature capable of performing this role of His, as Head, as man in report with the mankind. Our salvation will be done only if we freely walk, under the leadership of Head-Christ, a road similar to the one our first fruit has walked in Him in order to reach the state of the full deification. Only thus the nature He assumed was able to rejoice the whole transcending above itself in God, a transcending the godlike Hypostasis – in Whom it has been assumed – could offered to it, and only if we do us likewise, out of the power concentrated in Christ's humanity, we will be able to be elevated, in a real mode, towards the participation to what the Head-Christ can provide us: the infinity of the godlike life and the freedom in it." (Stăniloae 2006: 92)

"The human nature in Christ had to overcome through an obedience that was consummate and loving of His godlike will, a will that is one with the will of the Father, or through conforming to the Father's will and enduring the death on cross, the enslaving affects which entered the human nature by sin as equally numerous weaknesses, and the death as ultimate consequence of theirs, being thus opened, to the unimpeded sight, the infinite horizon of the Godhead, and being opened the participation to that horizon and to the life from within it, which is a state obtained through Resurrection." (Stăniloae 2006: 92)

"Christ keeps His humanity fully open to the infinity of God, through its state of sacrifice, and He will communicate to us too, within Church, this state, if we open ourselves at our turn, to the horizons His humanity has been elevated in. Saint Cyril of Alexandria insisted upon this fact, saying that only if we appropriate to ourselves the Christ's state of sacrifice, we will be able to enter at the Father too." (Stăniloae 2006: 92)

“Actually, only the Resurrection and the Ascent make the embodied and crucified Word to extend Himself, through His Holy Ghost, with His body, within the ones who believe and who open themselves, to Him, for he has become from virtual Head, the actual Head of the Church.” (Stăniloae 2006: 94)

“The Church is being maintained and it is advancing on the plan of the life which is being nourished out of the holiness, out of the godhead, and out of the Resurrection of Christ. But this is, not only for the Church has within itself the divine embodied hypostasis – and therefore as hypostatized body into God –, sacrificed and resurrected once for everybody, irradiating out of it the power of sacrifice and the power of advancing towards resurrection; and also for our Lord Jesus Christ continues to be in the Church the Hierarchy Who offers Himself as sacrifice in continuation. Christ is the Teacher Who propagates the teaching about Himself and about the salvation in Himself, and our leader towards salvation. Christ, after exercising His threefold ministration before He has brought His Church to existence, now he is exercising this ministration in His Church. He is not the Head of the Church only because he is the divine Hypostasis of the humanity and only because He maintains Himself within people with His sacrificed, resurrected, and elevated body, but also because He continues to exercise and to uphold within Church His three savior ministrations within Church. To His quality of Head it belongs also the fact that he leads us, he lightens us, and He offers Himself, in continuation, as sacrifice, in order to lead us throughout all of these, through knowledge and through the life of sacrifice, towards resurrection and towards the eternal life in Him.” (Stăniloae 2006: 96-97)

“Christ, as divine Hypostasis bearing our sacrificed and resurrected humanity, He doesn’t remain passive within Church, but He is exercising His work as Teacher, as Hierarchy, and as Emperor. In this threefold ministration, He doesn’t have the Church as an object, but He addressed Himself to the Church as to a free partner, who is called to freedom and to imperishable love. In quality of Christ’s partner, on one hand, the Church receives His teaching, sacrifice, and leadership, and on the other hand, the Church answers them freely and positively, as to a call, by teaching, by sacrificing Itself, and by leading, or by participating to Christ’s ministrations of Teacher, Hierarchy, and Emperor. Through the continuation of His threefold ministration within Church, Christ maintains with the Church and with each limb of the Church, a progressive dialogue, within which neither Him nor the Church, neither the Church’s limbs are in a passive state. This is the meaning of the imperial priesthood of the believers who are called to herald the good things of Christ and to avoid the bodily lusts (I Pt. 1: 6-11; I Jn. 2: 20)

“Christ’s body, at its turn composed of heads, it is filled up with the light that comes from the supreme Head, and it spreads this light, for it passes this light to Christ’s limbs and to other people, who are elevated by participating Christ’s sacrifice and teaching, to a sacrificial life of all the limbs, towards God and towards each other. The Church obeys Christ’s leadership and it impropriates His leadership, and the Church leads, in the same time, Its limbs – the human persons -, and those ones lead one another and they teach one another and they urge one another towards sacrifice. As Christ is active in these ministrations, so it is active the Church too, in imparting them. Christ could remain passive, only when His teaching, sacrifice, and leadership would have been possible to be detached from His Person, as it happens in some measure where Christ is given a deputy, or where each member of the Church reckons that he can learn and he can lead on himself, in a mode divergent to others, without having Christ as unique teacher and leader of them. If Christ is the embodied Son of God, He will be through Himself the light, the teaching, the sacrifice, and the leadership. And to these three ministrations participate the ones in whom He dwells, in a unitary manner; in their unity of faith, of understanding, of participating to sacrifice, it is shown that Christ Himself remains undivided in everybody, active as Teacher, as Hierarch, and as Emperor.” (Stăniloae 2006: 97)

“In Christ’s exercising of His ministration of Teacher, it is being continuously highlighted the prophetic quality of this ministration too. This is for Christ’s ministration of teaching, it leads us, by the Church’s preaching, to ever closer levels to the model man who is Christ, and ever closer to the relations of justice, of brotherhood, and of human delicacy, which will reign in the Kingdom of Heavens, where the human will be in his fully accomplished form.” (Stăniloae 2006: 97-98)

“Likewise, Christ guides all of us, towards a fuller relation with Himself and towards the union with Him in the Kingdom of Heavens, but He gives us also o power of guiding one another in that direction. In other words, He defeats together with us the inferior and demonic impulses which tend to keep us far from Him through all sorts of hardships placed in the way of our striving to get closer to Him, or in the way of our striving to fulfill His will. He is Emperor, but we are called too, to be imparted with His imperial power, by overcoming these impulses and obstacles, in order to reach to reign together with Him, no longer being hindered by the chains of the nature, of the sin and of death. “If we persevere in patience, (which is power too, o. n.), we will be emperors together with Him” (II Tim. 2: 12; see also: I Thess. 2: 12; Hebr. 12: 28; Jas. 2: 5).” (Stăniloae 2006: 98)

“Through His ministration as Hierarch, Christ ceaselessly shows to the Father His sacrificed body, but in the same time with this, he also shows us as willing sacrifices of good fragrance, out of the power of His sacrificed body we are imparted with. By this, He doesn't bring the sacrifice only for Himself, or only for His body as Person, but also for His mysterious body too within which His body as Person is." (Stăniloae 2006: 98)

"Christ is attracting us, continuously, to this state of continuous sacrifice and of being the one who commits the sacrifice. He doesn't sacrifice us as on some objects, but He attracts us to self-sacrificing as subjects, to self-giving, and to a remaining in this state, by imparting us with His state of sacrifice, in which, Him too isn't passive, but He is giver. So, by being imparted with His sacrifice, we aren't imparted only with the sacrifice but also with the one who commits the sacrifice. But this, we ourselves become not only sacrifices, but also the ones who commit the sacrifices, namely priests of our sacrifice, in this restricted meaning. Only thus our sacrifice is in scent of good fragrance, for our person is like His, in state of sacrifice, of voluntary self-giving, of actively maintaining in state of "passive" surrender to God and to the fellow humans, of exclusively living according to their will. We witness Christ's sacrifice not only within Church." (Stăniloae 2006: 98)

"On one hand, Christ brings us as sacrifices in His quality of Hierarch, with His own sacrifice, and on the other hand, we give ourselves as sacrifice to Him, in order Him to bring us to God and the Father. By surrendering Himself to the Father, and thus by being filled up, as man, with the infinite love of the Father, and towards the Father, Christ attracts us too in this state of surrender, but we will bring ourselves too, by this, if we aren't only passive in it. We do not bring ourselves as sacrifice to the Father, except into Christ, but we must offer ourselves, though, to the Father, out of the power of Christ's sacrifice, namely to bring ourselves too, together with Him; we must surpass by this, the limits of our egotism for, by surrendering ourselves to the infinite Father, to participate to His love as partners with Christ. Out of the Christ's sacrifice it irradiates like a magnetic power which is attracting us too, towards our sacrifice. Thus, our self-sacrificing is full of Christ's self-sacrificing. Our sacrifice consists in a clean living, in prayer, and in other gifts for our deprived fellow humans and for maintaining the Church's work for salvation. Our sacrifice consists in renouncing to ourselves, in order to enter the loving relation with the infinite God." (Stăniloae 2006: 98)

"Christ is the continuous Hierarch, for He is continuously mediating for our entering to God-the Father, through His state of surrender to the Father; and this is also for Christ is continuously mediating for our entering in the loving relation with the Father, by receiving us in the living relation with the Father and by making us to forget about ourselves, or to forget about our limitation through egotism, in order to enter the relation of the infinite love as partners of the Father, together with Christ." (Stăniloae 2006: 98-99)

“But this entering of ours to the Father, it is an act of us too, namely it is our surrender, out of the Christ’s power of surrender. We liberate ourselves, from ourselves and from our passions, by the full power of our central Subject.” (Stăniloae 2006: 99)

“Christ remains forever available, on the basis of the decision we have manifested at Baptism, of dying to the sin and of living with Christ, as long as we do not revoke that decision. But, like in any personal relation, the work, or the manifestation of love, it must be continuously done, from both sides. Only by continuously affirming, by deeds, our attention towards Christ, we reach to enjoy everything He has given us as potential and of what we haven’t known at the beginning.” (Stăniloae 2006: 116)

“Neither Christ must be seen as One Who accomplishes only a unity of nature amongst people and Him within Church. Christ, though He is the godlike Hypostasis of our nature, and therefore he is a Hypostasis with a human conscience open in the supreme degree to others, he though fulfills the function of a human person, distinct from others. According to His example and out of His power, no matter how much the human persons would open themselves to one another, they still remain distinct to each other, and they remain with the conscience of not-confounded persons, as the Trinitarian Persons are too. So, by bringing the human person to the unity with Himself, on the basis of their unity of nature with Him, Christ doesn’t confound them.” (Stăniloae 2006: 135-136)

“Saint Mark the Ascetic and Diadochus of Photice said that through the Baptism, in the beginning Christ dwells in the hidden of our being, without us having the conscience experiencing of this fact. The experience of this fact starts producing and it later grows up in the increasing in faith and in good deeds, which we offer to Christ, and for which we receive power from Christ Who is in this hidden.” (Stăniloae 2006: 146-147)

“The place where Christ is like Hierarch, it is in the most inner, the most hidden and the cleanest chamber of the heart, for only that one can be the most easily sensitized and opened to God. Only the deep of the human virtual can be opened to the deep of the godlike endless.” (Stăniloae 2006: 147)

“The work we do, on the basis of the power we receive, it is the fruit of a mysterious encountering between us and Christ. We actualize only what is given to us in a not fully actualized mode. But his actualization too, we do it with the help of Christ. And by this, we actualize not only the virtualities hidden in Christ, but also our virtualities with the help of Christ. Anyway, only in this contribution of ours, we experience that not only us are the producers of the result. We must work, and we must know that Christ also works within us. And we know this work of Christ, firstly, in our ghost, and then we know it also in the new spiritual feelings of our body. We know Christ as spiritualized, but still present in our body, and therefore present as body, spiritualizing our body too, sanctifying it too, in all its deeds, together with the soul's thoughts." (Stăniloae 2006: 147)

"Because of the man doing this, the Logos of God, the unitary bosom as Person, of all the world's rationalities, he has proceeded to a new, tighter, and safer union of all things within Himself. On this purpose, the Logos uses the human nature too, for the human nature's capacity of being a means of unification of all the creatures amongst them, and between them and God. In order to accomplish this union tighter, the Word of God has made Himself man, so that the people have been give a center of union amongst them, a center that cannot be separate from God anymore and that doesn't tend to separate Himself from the other people and to divide the creation." (Stăniloae 1997: 7)

"(In Christ, o. n.) It is thus being accomplished a new Mystery, that of an even tighter union between Creator and creature. It is the Mystery of Christ. The paradox founded by creation, of the union of the uncreated with the created, it appears now even more accentuated, or accentuated to the supreme mode. God Himself is man too, God is creature too, the unfathomable deep and the all-doer Subject, he makes Himself human rationality too: human rationality that has the conscience of it limitation in noticeable body, and the infinite makes Himself finite too, the last one being filled up with the first one. By this, the infinite horizon of the supreme reality's knowledge it becomes fully transparent to the man." (Stăniloae 1997: 7)

"The Word of God has assumed our nature as a human nature personalized in Him, for through it he to unite Himself in a tighter manner with the all the human subjects, bearer of the same nature, and with the whole creation these subjects are connected to, by their nature." (Stăniloae 1997: 7)

"The Word of God has actualized, thus, all the man's potentialities of being the connection ring between God and creation. But by this, he has made the man the most adequate environment of exercising the unifier power of the Logos upon creation, the man being the image of Him. His divine feature crossed through by love, they find in the man's virtues and in the man's capacity of love towards God and towards his fellow humans, the most efficient form for unifying the people with God and the people amongst themselves. Through the human spirit, the Word of God can exercise not only His spiritualization action, but also the action of deifying the body's feelings. By the fact he hasn't united Himself with a human hypostasis, but He has made Himself the hypostasis Himself of the human nature, with His godlike openness towards the whole created reality and with His supreme capacity of human communion, He has made out of the assumed humanity the means of unification and deification of the whole mankind and creation in God.” (Stăniloae 1997: 7)

“The godlike Word, through His embodiment, He has brought the Holy Ghost again and in a full degree, in the communication with the creation. By hypostatically framing Himself into creation through embodiment, or by becoming Himself the creation’s Hypostasis, the Logos bring the Holy Ghost as well in His humanity and, through His humanity, into creation. From now on, the man that opens himself through faith to Christ, he can be born again through the prevailing work of the Ghost. For this, the Ghost had to participate again and in a culminant mode to the birth of the Son of God as man, of the renewed man, like the Ghost didn’t participate even to Adam’s creation.” (Stăniloae 1997: 24)

“The human nature has been liberated thus, from the chains of the natural laws’ rigidity, and from the chains of the inexorability of the eternal death, as also from the slavery of the demonic powers which contribute to this chaining of the freedom of the human spirit, chaining that ends in his death and in the body’s death. Restoring the free image of the divine Logos within man, it has been fully done by assuming, by the Logos Himself as Hypostasis, of this image of His together with the co-working of the Holy Ghost. The Ghost extends Himself too, within the believing people, by Baptism, and restoring the image of the Logos within them too.” (Stăniloae 1997: 24-25)

“Christ is the bridge between earth and heavens and we can frame ourselves even from here in the interior of this bridge, being us moved on it, in the same time with its movement, advancing us firmly and steadfastly in this interior, He not forsaking us and not forsaking the bridge. Thus, there is a community between our life on earth and the heavenly life. If we keep ourselves steadfastly on the authentic aspiration of the heavenly life, we will reach the supreme stability of this life, which is in God, or in heavens.” (Stăniloae 1997: 200)

“Only a Christ present amongst Christians and only on the measure He is present, he helps the Christians to continuously overcome the formal, exterior aspect the human relations, relations structured by increasingly advanced reforms, in a satisfactory spiritual warmth and depth, which help the Christians to contribute to achieve structures of increasing justice and brotherhood amongst people.” (Stăniloae 1997: 249)

“All the teachings communicated by the Revelation and all the gifts imparted by Christ have endless spiritual depths and stages. Christ as man, or as consummate union of the human with God-the Word, He has an endless depth of meanings and of loving, deifying, and helping powers, which call us and which lead us always forwards and always upwards in our understanding and living, in discovering new and always higher horizons, which we to make know to the world as modes of superior relations.” (Stăniloae 1997: 249)

“It was noticed that Jesus Christ did not play a public role from a position of a society leader. Such a role, by taking you out from the direct communion with your fellow humans and by forcing you to put between you and them the generalizing and indifferent law to their states and necessities which are different and intimate to each of them, it is not appropriate for bringing to light the other’s subject into the me-to report, for the spiritual birth of the people. Despite all of this, Jesus Christ addressed Himself not only to one person at a time, but also to the crowd, and also even to whom weren’t present and not only in the words of me-you restricted report, but also in severe formulations of general nature, insisting on a change of mores and social reports. But the raise to a general language and to a preoccupation that widens all over the society, is neither to the prophets or to Jesus Christ and must not be at any human being who wants to be a link in propagating of the Revelation, a raising into the sphere of the abstract, where the concrete face of the human being fades to become a number into the crowd to which is applied the harsh and indifferent law. Not with the laws per se, detached from the living and intimate report between people occupies the human being who propagates the faith, but he has continuously in view these reports. His general speaking is not but a widening of the speech towards his concrete fellow human, not aiming something else then to see everywhere such a report established amongst people. The intimate reports, which give birth to the souls, are the ones concerning the man in the position of propagating the faith, and not the juridical expression of these reports, which remains sometimes an empty shape.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“In history we can fulfill the law, even the superior law of the love, of searching for the soul of the fellow human, without this itself to save us²⁴. Only Christ saves, but the fulfillment of the law is not worthless and it prepares the soul for receiving Him. And this is when the law and the history are not judged like a closed system, like a final one, but they are reckoned as ones open into the waiting for the One Who gives them their true meaning. And when the faith has dwelt into the human being, this one must be raised to a moral height in the frame of his historical rule, otherwise it is a sign that God does not work in him and that He does not save him.” (Stăniloae 1993)

²⁴ See Dosoftei’s Confession: “If the man can make the good by nature, it was told covered by God, telling us that also the pagans love whom loves them. From here follows also that it is impossible that any good that man do can be a sin... The good it is impossible to be bad. The deed fulfilled only with the natural power and which doesn’t make the man but psychic, not also spiritual, doesn’t contribute to the saving, lacking the faith, but neither to the condemnation”. Kimmel, I. 447.

“And through the ascent to heaven, Jesus Christ does not cease to be close to us, and to exercise a direct efficiency upon us. Being God, fact which the ascension to heaven gives us a last assurance about, He is present everywhere, so also close to us. Thus, us too, even we are living long time after His time on earth, we are near to Him, and His face, which is revealed by the narrations of the apostles and of all our ancestors as a reality, we know that is alive and it maintains with us the communion which He has searched for it by making Himself man. Our gaze passes continuously from the memory of Jesus from History to His actual presence from Heavens. Only because He was present in history like a real man, we can see Him in heavens with our faith, and only because He is in heavens, into the divine glory, His face in history confirms the abyssal traits of Godhead.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“God has made possible the live report with Him, which consist into our transcendence towards Him and into His intimate communication with us, only whereas He made Himself a man. The fundamental structure of the man consists, according to the philosopher Martin Heidegger, in “transcendence” understood like an act, like a continuous work of us, through which we are passing from us to the world, and, through this, from us from this moment, to us from the future moment, by raising us up from a state of living into the general clichés, to the conscience of our intimacy²⁵. The conscience of the transcending, it receives another intensity when it is performed in God’s direction and in a living and reciprocal report with Him. And God is experienced like a concrete and close reality, towards which we stay with all our being in tension, in Jesus Christ, in Whom God descended in the plan accessible to us.”

25 “Vom Wesen des Grundes” in Jahrbuch für Philosophie und Phänomenologische Forschung, Husserl-Festschrift, Halle, 1929: „Transzendenz bedeutet Überstieg. Transzendent (transzendierend) ist, was den Überstieg vollzieht, im Überstiegen verweilt... Zum Überstiegen gehört dann solches, was unzutreffend meist das «Transzendenz» genannt ist... Die Transzendenz... meint solches, was den menschlichen Dasein gehört, und zwar nicht als eine unter anderen mögliche, zuweilen in Vollzug gesetzte Verhaltung geschehender Grundverfassung dieses Seienden... Im Überstieg kommt das Dasein allererst auf solches Seiendes zu, das es ist, aus es als es «selbst». Die Transzendenz konstituiert die Selbstheit... Wir nennen das, woraufhin das Dasein als transzendiert, die Welt und bestimmen jetzt die Transzendenz als In-der-Welt-sein“, pg. 80-82.

“It means that only when we encounter the absolute into a concrete person, then we experience the transcendence. And because we die, that historical person must show his absolute character also through that, for he reveals himself to us like a master over the region beyond death, by defeating death like somebody who stays on the throne of the supreme sovereignty. In this case death no longer appears to us like a natural end in nothingness, but rather like a gate which we cross ahead through, to an even more obvious encounter with the person of Jesus Christ, our transcendence. Death is not transcendence through itself, but by the fact that beyond it, there waits for us the judge Jesus Christ. If Jesus Christ hadn’t resurrected Himself, and He hadn’t ascended to heavens, He wouldn’t have been transcended into the life from here and we wouldn’t have waited for Him to be either into the life from beyond. When we know Jesus as being alive, our life from here feels in Him the true border, the true and the scrutinizer judge, and death it is no longer an indifferent end to us, but the moment of inevitable confrontation with the judge who is waiting for us.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The fulfillment of the man into a life of true seriousness and self-knowledge, of full living in what it is his own, it comes only from the faith in Jesus Christ, the only One in report with Whom the real transcendence is experienced. “The Christian preaching nevertheless it affirms that the transcendence, of which impossibility to be contained and of which non-objectivity (Unerlässlichkeit und Nichtgegenständlichkeit) the philosophers are defending it with so much passion, it is given into the Person of Jesus Christ, namely in the Scripture’s word. In this contingent person, in this concrete word, one can find the transcendence”²⁶. Jaspers considered that the transcendence cannot be comprised into a person and therefore the communion is not possible with it. One cannot find the transcendence into a person because the person is something that refers to something else: a person or a thing. Like a Person, God would need people for the communion with them. The transcendence would be restricted to a concrete entity. It is justified the answer of E. Burger, that the rationality of Christ it is just that in His transcendence it has been made accessible to us, to be experienced into a concrete unity.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Toward the passion of the existentialist philosophy, to surprise through those meeting, like through cipher, the infinity, E. Burger sustains that this philosophy does not succeed something else but to stay on the edge of the transcendence, and not to arrive to a communion with it. That’s why, through it one cannot acquired a real existence, but he remains to the simple possibility. Only in relations with the concrete person of Jesus Christ, one can pass from the edge of the transcendence to the communion with the transcendence, from the tragic unrest into the possibility of the existence, to the reality of the existence, and from a hunch of the divine reality to experiencing it, and, through this, to the state of salvation²⁷.” (Stăniloae 1993)

²⁶ EWALD BURGER, W. c.p. 222.

“Some of the Russian theologians, like S. Bulgakov and N. Berdiaev go in this direction until to affirm some kind of eternal humanity of the Son of God, or some kind of existential human theandric-ism. Bulgakov, for instance, he argued that the self or the subject of the man is not a created one; only its nature – consisting of rational soul and of body – it is created. But the human nature also is an exact copy of divine nature, it is the divine being put into state of becoming, it is created Sophia that corresponds to uncreated Sophia. The human self, by being uncreated, he is by divine essence, that between it and the divine Logos is not any qualitative difference, and between his nature and the nature of the Logos there is a perfect correspondence. The divine Logos, by taking in Jesus Christ the place of the subject, of the human self, there hasn’t taken place an event too new and too inadequate to the human nature, but one quite normal. A human self of divine essence has been replaced for the supreme self of divine essence. The bearer of uncreated Sophia has taken under his leadership the created Sophia too, which is otherwise carried on also by selves of divine essence.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“From all these, it results that, the Son of God has embodied Himself on the basis of a conformity between Him and the person of the man. The intentionality towards communion in which He is in report with the Father, He turns it also towards people, observing the value proportion in a case and another. But, especially in the orientation of His benevolent love towards people, His intentionality towards communion it exclusively has the will to give, and not to receive, not of being a sign of the insufficiency, but of the supreme love. People have been able to, and they can easily feel that, from Jesus Christ, it is searching for them another intention of communion than the one from their fellow humans, one without any insufficiency, a supreme love, which has a maximum efficiency to reveal itself, and to be noticed.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The words which were sent by the Son of God through prophets, they not only were the so-called Word, His Person itself, but words detached from

²⁷ W. c. p. 226.

Him. The prophets didn't have the words, of course, from themselves, though the words weren't identical to the Person of God. Their testimony was making us to believe that the Son of God is interested in our fate, but He wasn't sharing us with a full communion." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The man becomes, through Jesus Christ, a son of God and a fellow human of Jesus Christ-God. It is the highest dignity and state the which the man is elevated to. And, what else it means this but the elevation at the highest intimate me-you communion with God? And who stays in communion with God, that one is eternal, for, to whom God loves so much than He welcomes him in communion with Himself, He cannot let him perish, like we wouldn't have let to perish the ones loved by us, if it had been given to our power." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Like Jesus through His death He has transposed Himself, as man, outside the created existence, which was weakened by sin, in order to receive it in a renewed form like through a new creation, from God's hands, the same must be repeated by us, through the spirit's repentance intensity: this death, by getting out from the world's field, and from the actual shape of creation, in order to reach at Jesus Christ (He: 13: 13), so that, with the experience that we are on the edge of the nonentity, to the experience the receiving the new existence from the power and for the mercy of God. Properly-said, not in the field of the world in which we are, we are preserve our life - as it seems to us -, but by getting out of it, by losing what it seems to us as being life. Life in the actual shape of the creation it is a disfigurement of life, it is a life which implacable progresses towards death. Only by exiting from this state of illness, and by placing us on the edge of the existence, in front of God, we will regain our life. But the one who has made the decisive step in this direction, by accepting to lose this life in order to resurrected in the new one and, by this, to attract all of us with a supreme force towards the "grave" of the new life: it is Jesus Christ²⁸." (Stăniloae 1993)

"All these things show us that the Son of God does not came only into man, like a content of the man, but He made Himself what directly welcomes us in every fellow human, a human subject of communion, what speaks to us from man, a person, an intentionality for communion, and having all the real support of the man into his concrete countenance, into Jesus Christ, ²⁸ "To us, who through stupidity altered the existence, He accepted to make Himself resembling to us, so what had fallen outside of existence, He to re-bring it to existence". Saint Gregory of Nyssa, De vita Mosis, P. G. 44, 381 B., W. c. p. 113.

Who was telling Me, and to Whom the people around Him were calling Him as You, and Who wasn't a human subject differing from the godlike one, but He was the godlike subject descended and objectified in state and in function as human subject. God made Himself to us You, on the level of our self, a You Whom to dare to behave with like with every man. This you from within our fellow human it is all that can be closer to us, the only reality which we can enter a loving communion with. From the furthest, God has made Himself the closest One to us. Only by making Himself a human you to us, He directly has spoken to us, so that we have entered the direct relation with His Person. Only on this way the human person of Jesus was the godlike Person of the Son. In the same time, only by being the one and the same person both God and man, Jesus has brought his life like a substitutive sacrifice for people, but that sacrifice was no longer only that of a man and having only a relative effect." (Stăniloae 1993)

"In Jesus Christ, through supernatural intervention it was realized a rounding of the human nature not in itself, but in the vastest unity of a whole which existed before, of the divine hypostasis of the Logos. It was not rounded more human nature than it would be sufficient for a common man, but this rounding wasn't done like an independent whole, but it took its place into the entirety of godlike hypostasis." (Stăniloae 1993)

"There hadn't been about a spontaneity characteristic to the human nature into the frame of the vaster unity of the whole which he entered and which had His spontaneity. In such a case He would have affirmed Himself like a different hypostasis. Neither had there been about keeping the human nature under pressure, into a passivity state, a state of object and instrument, because than Jesus Christ would have not been fully human. The needs of the human nature like subject in Jesus were no longer satisfied on its own account, like starting from a spatial center of it, but they were satisfied by the whole, as starting from a divine-human center. The spontaneity virtues which emerge from human nature were not no longer activated by the human nature in isolation, but they are now of the divine-human whole who manifests them through His virtues of subject and of active spontaneity." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Through the human nature, Jesus Christ hasn't shown Himself only like man, but also like God. The identity of the hypostasis of the two natures it doesn't consist only in that of one and the same subject shows Himself like God through the godlike nature and like man through the human nature, but in the same time the unique hypostasis shows Himself both like God and like man through each of His natures. This is the meaning of features communication, based on which the human features and activities are attributed to the Hypostasis considered as God, and or vice versa. And this is based, actually, on the absence of the separation of the natures into the unity of the same Hypostasis. The hypostasis shown through the human nature's elements, He is shown together with His godlike characteristics (so, with the nature), and vice versa. This means however that the human nature is adequately transparent to God, it is in the image of the Godhead²⁹. The divine nature's center makes itself also a center to the human nature, without annulling this one, and without hiding Himself. The human nature can have a common center with the divine nature. Without a movement from the middle of His divine nature, without any descent from His godlike character, a center of godlike nature becomes also a center of the human nature, by receiving all the attributes of it, by manifesting Himself through all its elements, and thereby showing Himself like man and in the same time, just through them, like God." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The human word, like an expression of the human being center, like a confession, by excellence, of the human hypostasis, it is in the same time, to Jesus Christ, the godlike Word, like a showing of the divine Hypostasis." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Of course, it is not about sonority, which is only an exterior clothing, but it is about the ultimate intentionality, which is in every word of Him, in the same time divine and human. From a common center starts the word of Jesus Christ, being both godlike and human. From this common center start all the godlike manifestations, and are set in movement all the ones of the human nature, the godlike ones through human instruments and the human ones through as uploaded with the godlike element. "He was suffering in a godlike manner, said Saint Maximos the Confessor, for He was suffering willingly, because He wasn't a simple man and He as man was doing wonders, for He was doing them through body, because He wasn't God unveiled" (Migne, G.P. 91, 105 B)." (Stăniloae 1993)

"This connection with God, in which the entire mankind is placed through Jesus Christ, it does not have only a "physical" character, an organic one, but it is a reality produced and sustained through the spiritual force of the God-Man. The intentionality towards communion it is love. The subject consists in the manifestation of love, but the nature itself tends towards this manifestation of love.” (Stăniloae 1993)

²⁹ Sophrony, the patriarch of Jerusalem, said: "Is, Qui hominem ab initio plasmavit ipsumque ad propriam suam imaginem condidit, non alia ratione hominem salvandum propriamque imaginem redimendam esse indicat quam si ipse natura fiat homo, propriamque imaginem proprium suum efficiat indumentum". ("he makes his own image his own vestment"). Or. II. in S.S. Deisparae Ann, P. G. 87, col. 3233 C – 3236 A. Ct. Georgius Cosma, De "Oeconomia" incarnationis secundum S. Sophronium Hierosolymitanum, Roma, 1940, p. 86.

“But the problem is not so simple. We do not meet concretely the human nature but only as hypostasized, in the form of a person. And the irreproachable passions from the human nature, considered abstractly, they are receiving a sinful highlighting into the hypostatic state. Will we attribute, therefore, to the hypostasis, the ingrate role of introducing the sinful character into the irreproachable passions? The hypostasis is not something else but the accomplished nature, concretely existing by itself, different from the nature which does not concretely exist, so it is simply thought. Whereas the nature’s concrete existence is tied in an ordinary way to the condition to be “through itself”, this fact indicates the sinful landscape of the irreproachable passions. If there is possible another existence than the one “through itself”, it will no longer be necessary the nature’s sinful passion to receive a sinful character. In Jesus Christ we have such a concrete existence of the human nature, through somebody else than through Himself, through God—the Word³⁰.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“This own discretionary will, together with the option it caused, like a manifestation of the hypostasis, Saint Maximos the Confessor didn’t admit it to Jesus Christ like man. In Him the decision was made by the divine hypostasis, and the own discretionary will of the man it wasn’t validated in Him, the human will, being totally subordinated to the godlike one.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“About Jesus Christ, Saint Maximos the Confessor wanted to highlight that, the natural purity of His human nature it was maintained through the fact that it had a divine hypostasis.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Thereby, in Jesus Christ it is accomplished a wonderful synthesis between these two so much contrary things in our experience: the fear of death and the will to harness it and which submissively waits for the decision of the 30 Into the ones born in Jesus Christ, who are orienting themselves with all their concrete existence, according to the God’s will, the condition of the existence “by itself” of the nature it is overwhelmed by the living through another, namely through God. Thus, also to Him it can take place an existence without sin, though not absolute also like impossibility, but relative and voluntarily, for they too are living through God, of course not like the man Jesus through the way of being, but through will.

Logos, receiving this power just from the hypostatic union with Him. Therefore, Saint Maximos the Confessor could say that at Jesus “the natural things did not anticipate the will”. Though His passions are not passed through His hypostatically specified will, but they have only the general character of some passions of the nature, they are more fully mastered by will, both because the nature itself is also will and it moves only through what is truly fit to itself, namely towards good, but also because the decisions, into Jesus Christ, they are of the divine hypostasis who has other power harness all the movements of the human nature which He has assumed.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“From this one it is also clarified the sense of the temptations which the Savior was subjected to. They were not only a frame-up for our eyes, but they expressed the real suffering of the Lord under the pressure of these weaknesses and the straining of His will, not to let Himself overwhelmed by that suffering. It is said that Jesus was unable to sin. This does not exclude the straining of His will, but it implies it. He cannot sin, because He had a will capable to dominate the suffering and because His will cannot admit to be overwhelmed by suffering. Specifically, in His experience, Jesus lived a straining of the will in order to dominate the suffering. The incapacity to sin must not be associated, in our imagination, to an inertia of the nature, but to a spiritual feature of it. He was unable to sin, not because through His humanity Jesus was inert, but because He represented the supreme peak of a spiritualization and of a straining of will subordinated to God.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“It has been asked the question: could be Jesus an example to us, if He was unable to sin? We have to fight with the sin in sufferings and we can easily slip from suffering into sin. But the matter is put in this way: Jesus can be an example to us not because we can sin, and He was unable to, but because we can, also, not to sin. Our capacity to not sin and His impossibility to sin are internally experienced into the same straining of the will. We must fight the sufferings, being mastered by the thought that there exists for us the possibility not to fall into temptation and, if we will fall, we are guilty. If we fight in this way, we won't fall. And Jesus fights with the sufferings not with the carelessness of the one who knows that He cannot be touched by temptation, but with the conscience that this immunity He owes precisely to His tension of will, it even coincides to it: He cannot fall into temptation for His will is unable not to fight strained, but victoriously, the suffering. Besides this, Jesus is an example not to the people who fight only through their own power, but to the ones who receive the godlike help. The divine grace of the Holy Ghost gives them a power beyond their human powers, like Jesus had too a power beyond the human powers³¹.” (Stăniloae 1993) “Especially heavy was the fight of the Savior against the fear of death in the Gethsemane Garden. The fear of death belongs, in a natural way, to our body. Into this one, nothing is sinful. But if, in the same time, the fear of death hadn’t been kept under control by His will, that feat would have become an occasion for falling into temptation, of struggle in order to avoid death by all means. In Gethsemane, the human will of Jesus it gained the full victory over the fear of death, without becoming impassive to the torment of this thought. Until that night, the fear of death and His will they didn’t seriously clashed, but that it was being manifested vaguely and generally, without being caught with both arms, by will, and dominated. In Gethsemane, under the immediate threat of death, the fear broke out with a supreme intensity, but also with the will which must face the fear with the same power. Thereby, in that night, Jesus was married in spirit with the death: He has accepted the death with His will.

This victory of the will over the fear of death, of the human nature, it meant the supreme spiritualization of the nature, the transfiguration and the liberation from its inertia and helplessness. The fear of death, without meaning a state of contradiction towards God, is yet one of contrast, with a different meaning³². For the full tuning of the human nature’s will, with the will of God, it must take place inside it, this victory of the will over the fear of death, especially because to Jesus the death on the Cross it was a mission.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Thereby is illuminated the reason of the assumption, by Christ, of the irreproachable passions of the human nature. By assuming them and by bearing them, the Savior gave back to our nature’s will, the supremacy over them with the help of God, and He melted down, at their flame, the force of the sin. If the human nature hadn’t passed through the suffering produced by the suffering element, it wouldn’t have had the occasion to achieve an undeniable victory over the sin. It is easy not to sin until the supreme

31 Not to mention the example which Jesus gives us through the fact that He accepted the most amazing descent from the heavenly glory, to the dust of our created existence, absolute voluntarily, which we can not to do, not even nearly, because any our descent it is made from a very relative height and, in general, the human sufferings and the death we do not receive them voluntarily, but they are our necessary destiny.

32 Saint Maximos the Confessor, w. c. , G. P. 91, 212 C. D. S. Bulgakov says: “Christ was tempted by real. In other words, He experienced, really, the hardship of His path, which He sensed it. This hardship it was, first of all, natural. An uninterrupted victory over the disobedient and helplessness body... He has taken into His human nature the non-enlightenment and the autonomous state of this world, which had been, through the free victory, brought to the worship of God”, w. c. p. 327.

sufferance do not urges you to avoid the sufferance. But the sin remains possible in case of a suffering which you do not passed through. The human nature of Jesus placed itself in the most precarious situations, and in the most favorable situations to the victory of the sin. But He won, even in these situations. Into His sufferance, God burnt down the sin of our nature “like the fire burns the wax or like the sun the moisture of the earth”³³.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“We have shown before, that beside the irreproachable suffering element which He assumed existentially, Jesus has taken over Him also the passions of the dishonesty, namely the sin, but through relation, like we make ourselves partakers to the deeds and sufferings of others, but without ourselves doing or upholding them. Like the mother suffers by the shame and by the pain of the real deeds of her son (maybe even more than him), like she would have done those deeds, by substituting him in a certain way, in the same way, Jesus has substituted Himself to all people, in their sinful quality, and His suffering has not been only because of the irreproachable human weaknesses which He has taken, but also because of the pain that He has sensed for the sins of everybody. Thereby, He has assumed the suffering element of our nature not just in order to resist the most precarious situation of the temptation, by defeating the sin, but also to have an instrument through which to suffer all the shame and pain for the human sin, assumed in a relation–communion way, by Him. Like the head suffers because of the pain of the body and the loving and merciful doctor because of the pains of his patient, also in this regard He melted them like the fire melts the wax³⁴.

He represented us in the fight against the sin through suffering, not only because He won through His individual nature, and this victory He communicates to us too, but also because He has substituted all of us through love, through solidarity. The whole sin of the mankind, the whole guilty mankind, He gathered them in His suffering for them. He established an internal, living connection, with the whole humankind and in His acts and sufferings there was not only Him, but chained to Him, there was the whole mankind. The fight from Gethsemane against the fear of death, and the victory over it, they were the fight and the victory of the entire mankind. No person has ever represented on a stage, in such a real manner, the entire the mankind, like Jesus in Gethsemane.” (Stăniloae 1993)

³³ Maximos the Confessor, G. P. 90, 316 B; 91, 1044 A.

³⁴ Maximos the Confessor, Op. Theol. Et. Pol., G. P. 91, 237.

“Whether the nature of any man can reach astonishing heights through deification, like it is shown in the examples of Saints, the human nature of Jesus Christ has reached, through the deification which He has imparted Himself with - the human nature being worn by the divine hypostasis -, the last possible height of amplifying its powers, which we cannot even imagine it where it is. Because the subject in Him is the godlike Word and, because His godlike nature and work are inseparably clasped with the human nature and its work, through all the thoughts, features, and directions of work of the human nature, there it was manifesting the consummate purity and the divine love. The human nature was not annulled, but it was giving the shape, the channel, and its effort, into purification and love. But the divine nature was giving through the common subject its help and work, which was prolonging and increasing until beyond any limit, the results of the efforts of purification and the power of love manifested through the human nature³⁵.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Although there is a difference between the deification of His human nature, while He was wearing it on earth, and the deification from the resurrection, especially, since the ascension. The Holy Scripture perseveres in speaking about a special glory which Jesus has entered after the ascension. Of 35 Saint John Damascene exposes on this way the deification of the body, which doesn't change the natural features: “The body of God, however, it has been enriched with the godlike activities due to the most pristine union with the Word, namely after hypostasis, without its natural features to suffer any loss. For It doesn't work the godlike things in the virtue of its energy, but in the virtue of the Word united with it, the Word showing His own energy through it. The red-hot iron burns, not because of possessing the energy for burning in the virtues of a natural principle, but for it possesses this energy because of the union with the fire”. W. c., Book III, Chapter XVII, p. 208. (The quote fits also the ones that were told at the “communication of the features”). But, because the human nature, when the godlike energies are manifesting through it, it doesn't cease to be active, it can be said, in a certain way, that the bearer subject feels the energies of both natures, the divine energies prolonging the human energies. The organs and the energies of the human nature are becoming more and more able for the role of a channel and of an opportunity of manifestation of the divine energies, proportionally to their consummation. Saint Maximos the Confessor could speak therefore about a limitless possibility of the human nature to irradiate the divine energies. It is true that he affirmed that the human nature is passive into the deification state and this passivity is characteristic to the future life, unlike the activity from this life. But the passivity won't have a meaning of inertia if it is possible an endless progress of the human nature in this state, in order to be the environment for increasingly richer irradiation of the divine energies: “How long we are here, we are active until we reach the end of the centuries, when our power and work for activating, they will come to an end. But, into the following centuries, by enduring that transformation towards the deification by grace, we won't activate, but we will be passive. And for this reason, we will never reach the end of the deification. Because this will be a supra-natural suffering, not being there any word to define that endless deification of the ones who will endure it”. G. P. 90, 320 D. The deification is a continuous increasing of love from the love itself, increasing together the showing of the divine love and the capacity to receive it, so the man's capacity to love too. If the endless progress of the man will constitute an ever-increased capacity of the human nature to be the channel of the divine energies, maybe the supreme deification of the humanity of Jesus Christ it means a perfect capacity of it to convey all the infinity of the divine powers. But this, only after ascension.

course, this consists also in a falling off of the fish scales from over the human eyes, which saw after the resurrection and after the ascension, in the humbleness of Jesus Christ shown in embodiment and sacrifice, the depth of the godlike love; they have seen that the human image that Jesus Christ has taken, it is not but the manifestation of the unimaginable love of the Son of God and, by seeing this, the people connected themselves, with their souls, to Him, in a special way, like to the closest one to them.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The Christianity gives the person of Jesus Christ an overwhelming importance in the frame of its dogmatics, like no other religion gives to its founder. The Christian dogma is not a system of ideas, or whatever doctrine assembled by the mind of a man, but, into its center, there reigns the living person of Jesus Christ. That’s why, the Christian dogmatics is all that can be more alive. In front of any philosophical system the dogma is incomparably more alive.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Any philosophical system comprises a series of reflections, more or less arid, deprived of the life-giving power of the personal relationship. What can offer us a system of ideas which leaves the man by his own, for his salvation? Absolutely nothing! That system does not bring any help from outside man, to the man’s own self, in order to potentiate his powers, and to encourage the efforts he makes for his own salvation and, especially, in order to give him a surety about the salvation’s possibility. The system of ideas doesn’t place the man in connection with an exterior reality, like the Christianity does. The most categorical external reality and the only one capable of giving me a help by itself, not through what I am capable to bring out, only through my own powers, from it, thereby, which is capable to give me something more than I can give it myself, it is the reality of a person different from my own self. And if this different person whom I am placed in an intimate contact with, He is Jesus Christ, the Son of God, like a Christian, I find myself in contact with the supreme reality and with the supreme help.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The Christian has the experience that Jesus Christ is all that can be more real, more alive and more able to help him. He knows that without to stay into a permanent connection with Jesus Christ he could by no means to be saved.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Jesus Christ did not come, in fact, into world, only to offer us some method which we search alone our salvation through. He stays forever and ever with us, like the unique source out of which it comes our salvation. The salvation means relationship, intimate communion with Jesus Christ, not an individualistic conformation to a certain doctrine. The salvation is not a gnosis or an ethics. It is not accomplished by knowing or by doing something, but by living with Jesus Christ. Out of this living with Christ, there result both: to know and to do. This is because Jesus Christ is not a simple man, like other founders of diverse religions, but He is God Himself, who has come in the maximum closeness to us, with His love.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“This inseparability is maintained in the case of Jesus Christ, for He is God, and God is alive. This means, on one hand, that any man in whom it has been born the mystery state of the faith, he cannot escape - when reading the words of Jesus from the Gospel, or when remembering His deeds and sufferings - the dominating impression, the certitude that Christ, by continuing to exist, He is present in an unseen way, like Subject of those words and deeds. It hasn’t been seen yet a believer truly reading the Bible, who hasn’t been dominated by the surety that there is not only him with a book during those moments, but, slowly, the words started seeming like being no longer fixed by the book, but they were spoken by Jesus Christ Who placed Himself instead of the book. Even less, the believer can think at a deed of Jesus, while making abstraction of His person. When he thinks at the crucifixion of Jesus, he sees Him crucified. And not like one who was, how we are thinking at the other people who have done some deeds, but like as we are thinking at the One Who exists right now and Who wears the traces of the crucifixion. With the thought of the believer in God, it is connected, in an overwhelming way, the feeling, and the certainty of Christ’s presence. One can think at any other disappeared person like at a simple memory, without being dominated by the sentiment of that one’s presence. But the believer cannot think at Jesus Christ without having this feeling. The ontological argument of Anselm of Canterbury was built on the logical belonging of the existence of God to the idea of God like the most perfect being. But to the believer it is of incontestable existential evidence that he cannot think at God without being dominated by the certitude of His presence, so, at any word or any deed of Him, without “seeing” Him like subject, belonging to the present, not only to the past.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“In an especially way, the work of Jesus Christ, both in thought and in doing, it is a work with a mystical continuation; it has not remained only in the memory of the people. The deeds of Jesus Christ are arms stretched upon us. If Jesus is present when His words are spoken, which somehow Himself is whispering, the deed of His crucifixion will continue, in a mysteriously way. He sacrifices Himself on the altar each time when the Holy Liturgy is celebrated. A man who did a deed in which out of love he has put everything, in which he committed all his being, he permanently remains tied to his deed. Whenever he thinks about it, he feels the same tremble, he transposes in the same situation. He has the same state within him and the same overflowing of love like in the moment when he did that deed.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“One can talk about the result of Christ’s work only in the sense that it was necessary to speak to the people the words of life and to do some deeds in order to save them, but this result which the people are impart with, it is indissoluble tied to His Person. He is Himself like one who did a certain work, He is Himself like one who placed Himself into a certain attitude towards people, by the fact that He spoke to them and He sacrificed Himself for them, so that He is Himself like One Who unveiled Himself and crystallized Himself towards people, through His words and deeds, in the look and in the attitude of maximum love. The embodiment was the premise; the embodiment was the first huge act of the divine love turned towards man. Through embodiment it has laid down the base of the development of the entire unveiling of His astonishing love, which went until the last end, the one of death. The unveiling of love is for the one in favor of whom it is done, the same with the establishment of love. To him, simply, the love didn’t exist before. Therefore, the unveiling of the divine love it is the creator condition for the man’s salvation. But the turn of the love of the Son towards man, and the development of its showing until His suffering and death, it is in the same time a reestablishment of the man in communion report with the Father, a satisfying of the communion law between man and God - according to which God has created the man -, a homage paid to the Father from the man’s part and, thereby, an overflowing upon the man of the whole happiness which can be received by him in the situation of being partner in the communion with God. Jesus Christ, in the attitude in which He has unveiled Himself in the manifestation of His whole divine love towards man and of His entire human homage towards the Father, He is the subject who unlocked the hardened hearth of people through the love that He showed to them, but He is also the man over Whom it is overflowing the whole benevolence of the Father towards people and in connection with Whom we are impart with the love of the Father.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“There is made, rightly, a difference between the deeds of somebody and the result of them. The result is regarded like staying outside of the person who founded it through his deeds. At Jesus, in no case, one could talk about a result in this sense. It cannot be conceived the result of His work, for instance, like one unlocking of the heavens for the people, the people following to enter the heaven without Him being needed any longer, or like a storage of divine grace from which the people impart themselves after He stepped aside. Jesus remains, all the time, the door of the salvation, the path, and the life.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Thus, the result of the work of Jesus Christ, through which we are saved, it is not but His personal state from the end of the fullest manifestation of the divine love towards people, and of the human homage towards the Father, towards God. We are saved through the connection with Jesus Christ Who has spoken to us and He repeats His godlike words through the man`s mouth, and Who showed through His death His endless godlike love, manifesting through this the entire homage of the man towards the Father-God and having, therefore, upon Him, like the first one from us and for us, the love of the Father.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The savior work of Jesus Christ, though indissoluble tied to His Person, both in the effectuation and on the result of it which we are imparted with, it can be contemplated in itself, being given the fact it was necessary for the salvation of the people, and thus having a fundamental significance.

The Savior work of repairing and straightening our nature has been oriented on three directions.

One direction was that of reestablishing the connection with God, the connection which was broken through sin, so that Jesus has reconciled God with the man. This has been done through the ministration of the priesthood. The priest is the one who stays between the man and God and who accomplishes the reconciliation through prayer and sacrifice.

Another work of Jesus Christ was to illuminate the mind of the man while He lived on earth, and to continue this work through His entrusted ones, also after the Ascent to heavens.

Christ has also worked on the direction of strengthening and upholding the man in order the man to walk the right path. The man is weak, he cannot lead himself. Jesus came to support the man`s will through His personal leading and through a leading mediated by His representatives. This is the work of a leader, of an emperor.

Behold the three kinds of works in order to reestablish of the mankind into its primordial state and in order to save the mankind. These three kinds of works are three sermons, they are three callings.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“One who serves the another, he is a servant, but also a man who deserves the whole honor. His service is both a ministry and a dignity. Therefore, we are not wrong by calling these three ministrations as dignities too. Some people use the words: hierarchical service, but kingly dignity. One may call the high priesthood of Jesus as dignity too; likewise, the leading work can be called ministration, for Jesus doesn’t master in order to humiliate, or in order to satisfy His desire for mastery, but He masters in order to save, He masters like the gentle lamb, like the lamb who sacrifices Himself.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The prophetic calling of Jesus Christ it is something else than the quality of a teacher which the Son had before His embodiment, though it explains itself through that. Likewise, the kingly dignity on the plan of salvation it is something else than the kingly dignity in the creational order simply. And the hierarchal servitude is the heart of the mission which He has taken through embodiment, by having the divine indication into the eternal plan of God or, even in the decision from before the eternity to create spiritual beings with whom to maintain a report of communion, which it means, when looking at the things from a certain point of view, a humiliation of God, to which humiliation the quality of hierarch of the Son it gives it an accentuated expression.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Like teacher, in His pre-human existence, the Son of God teaches the people from far, by not entering a personal relation with the people, but by communicating, in a mysterious way, only to some of them, His divine will, or by offering through nature, through the circumstances which He brings them into, or through the prophets, the possibility of knowing God. Like prophet, though, Himself takes the real form of a human teacher, by speaking with a mouth, and through words, like the humans do. By making Himself a prophet, the Son of God, on one hand, He has humiliated Himself, but, on the other hand, He has accomplished the communion and He has been teaching the people in the clearest and most perfect way. The prophet is the interpreter of His being and will, or, better said, He has expressed those without intermediaries, but through the human kind of expression. God has been speaking even after the embodiment of the Logos through the unspecified but impressive suggestions, of the nature and of the experiences. But, besides this natural Revelation - an insufficient one - He talks to us also with the human mouth through His Gospel. The man intuits the will of God by regarding himself also through the illnesses and troubles that he experiences and, regarding the contemporaries, also through the voice of history. But, by hearing the word of God through the Gospel, the man fully understands what God wants with him or with the contemporary world. The natural revelation is a propaedeutic³⁶ to the revelation done through prophets and, ultimately, to the one done through the words themselves spoken with the mouth of the Son of God, called man, namely prophet.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“We have told that the kingly dignity is one from the highest three dignities from world. As noble are the dignities of teacher and of priest, as high it is also the dignity of king, in his quality of a leader of soul. On His function it depends to lead the people to the best and to the right targets of the life. Only the one who desires the good, for the ones whom he leads, he is a true leader. People do not possess enough resources of will, in order to step alone towards the target of their life. Though, they will be able reach the targets if there are leaders, who, through their authority, they make the people willingly obey their leadership. The teacher has the mission to illuminate the people. But not all the teachers inspire authority, though they are in the first place indicated to share convictions and certitudes. The priest is a mediator. He has also authority over the souls, but it is not his exclusive mission to lead the people. Only the king is the true leader. For the salvation of the souls Jesus possesses also this dignity.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Christ gathers within Himself all of the three dignities on a supreme degree. Into Him it finds also this leadership service its supreme accomplishment. He leads us towards the ultimate targets of the life, because He has authority over the souls, like doesn’t have any worldly leader.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“There has not existed a leader in the world who to maintain, over centuries, the same authority upon the souls, like Christ does. The people died for Jesus, they die, and they are going to die, century after century. The most people are and they will be able to obey Jesus with the whole their being. It is not obedience for some interest that is achievable in this world, neither is a shallow obedience, but it is a total submission of the most intimate fibers of the human being.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“This quality of a king it expresses His calling like Lord. The Christian addresses to Him: “The Lord and the Master of my life”. In the primary centuries of Christianity, the nomination of Lord given to Jesus has meant absolute Sovereign, to whom the man obeys like a slave, an absolute Master upon the depths of the being, a Master upon the life and death of the people. Like that the believers experienced Jesus, especially after His Ascension, and so the primary Christian communities called Him. Until today we have been understanding under the name of Lord, attributed to Jesus, a totally different meaning than that of a worldly king. Jesus Christ is not a Lord who inspires you fear, but He is a Lord of Whose authority is a joy to you, a Lord Who you obey with the fullest conviction. The believers feel Jesus Christ like a Lord in Whom they can support themselves with the whole confidence, like a Lord Who does not depend, at His turn, on somebody else. They feel that at Him there is the ultimate source of power, the ultimate wall where they find shelter. It is a happiness generating experience for the one who has it.” (Stăniloae 1993)

³⁶ From French word “propédeutique”, which means a preliminary education which comprises the basic elements of a science.

“How happy is the child when he feels the power, the authority of his father! If he feels that his father hesitates, he will cease to be happy. The true leader is experienced by the one who has the power inside him, not a physic power, but a spiritual one, like the one who knows what he wants and who is capable to lead us to the target known to Him. We, the people, we realize that we have not the full certitude inside us. But, in Jesus Christ we feel a definitive surety. We feel the earthly leaders as they possess a limited authority. Jesus Christ is being experienced, nevertheless, like One Who has power and, so, He has absolute authority, and Who grants us an unlimited support. The one who believes in Jesus Christ, he has a limitless trust, which cannot be interrupted by any doubt. This means that Jesus Christ is truly a King; He is the Lord of the Lords, and He is the absolute Master over the whole your being. This experience is not a sign of inferiority, but it gives confidence to the one who had it, an unshaken surety in life, and that man also receives a power resembling to the power of Jesus Christ, which imposes to the fellow humans and it makes them to believe in Him. With how much pleasure and joy the Christian tells the words: “The Lord and the Master of my life”. It is here a devotion which absorbs his entire hearth. Then he feels himself truly powerful.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The dignity of leader in Jesus Christ it is closely tied to the dignity of teacher and of priest, but that does not mean that they cannot be distinguished. All the more, these dignities are distinguished to the people. There doesn’t exist any man on earth who to comprise all these three dignities. Although, a leader who is not able to be a teacher too, he is a blind leader. Also, a teacher who is not, at his turn, able to lead with authority the ones whom he teaches, towards the desired targets, he is not fully a teacher. Leader is also the priest who sacrifices himself, who puts his life for the salvation of the souls of his parish. But only Jesus Christ has accomplished the true leader. Out of His example take substance the new forms of the relations between the leaders and their adherents. Here is seen again the righteousness of the Christianity, which remains continuously a source of inspiration to the people. Jesus Christ is a leader in the spiritual meaning of the word. He hasn't come to be served, but to serve. The leaders of the peoples master the people, while Jesus Christ has come, as Himself tells us: "to give His life for people". Jesus Christ does not master by force, by sword, or through any other element of constraint, but He conquers the will of the people exclusively by spiritual means. The truth and the love, these are the means which He masters the souls through, these are the force, and these are His sword." (Stăniloae 1993)

"In this way, whether the godhead, being the ultimate source of light, of purity, and of power, shows Jesus like having in His being the three dignities, by the fact that He meets in His hypostasis the humanity, being the most proper mediator between God and people and the only Savior, through the full manifestation of the divine love, He appears also in the new quality of a bearer of the prophetic power, and of the hierarchal and of the kingly ones. Jesus Christ is - based on His theandric nature - the Prophet, the Hierarch and the King, by excellence. The three dignities are not something else but the expression of His savior Being." (Stăniloae 1993)

"If the teacher's job is the noblest thing on earth, for being related to the light and by having like purpose the raising of the spiritual man, in love and communion, then it is from God. The teacher continues God in His work of shaping of the man created by God. At God is the source of teaching and He alone has from Himself the capacity to make Himself the consummate Teacher of the people, by establishing between Him and them, in a perfect form, the Teacher-disciple report. It is characteristic to the teacher to have love towards his disciple, before the disciple having any love towards his teacher, God like Teacher meets this ministration in a supreme degree, by not making His love depending on anybody's love, like is the case of the people." (Stăniloae 1993)

"We could tell that the function of a teacher is general amongst people. Every man was or is teacher to one or of more of his fellow humans, and no one is a teacher to everybody, but he is a disciple too. So, everyone experiences the responsibility of rising up some fellow humans, but also the relativity of his capacity and of his authority like teacher. Through both it is sustained the chaining of the people and, all over the place, the job of a relative teacher, with its double aspect of responsibility and dependence, it is one of the general laws through which it is accomplished the intimacy amongst people, an existential element of the man's structure, indicating towards a divine origin and asking for a fulfillment through a consummate Teacher, Who, by being a man, He is, in the same time, God. This accomplishing has taken place in Jesus Christ. Christ, by being the absolute Teacher of the people, He didn't experience the dependence on other people in this regard, but, just for that, He has assumed, in the supreme degree, the responsibility towards people, and the supreme responsibility has tied Him, more than on anyone else, to the people." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Though, Jesus has placed Himself into a state of dependence, not towards people, but towards God, but because of the people. This is for, Jesus is not simply, a teacher, but He is a prophet. And the prophet is more than a teacher, for he is the conveyer of a godlike teaching, as God's envoy. He does not take the teaching from the human mind, from His mind or from the mind of others, neither from the scientific experiment, but He receives it directly from God, having, consequently, a different character from all that can be known through reasoning or human experience. This teaching is superior by the fact that it refers to the being and to the will of God, and it contributes to the salvation of the man. But, on these features, which distinguish the teaching of the prophet from all the human teachings, we will insist further on." (Stăniloae 1993)

"About Jesus, the Holy Scripture tells us that He is a supreme prophet. We must find at Him, thereby, both the humbleness of the prophet, and the features which give Him the supreme place among the prophets.

In fact, Jesus, like a prophet, like a human interpreter of God's will, though He is the Son of God Himself, He still is an "envoi" of the Father and, so, He fulfills this assignment in an uninterrupted connection with the Father. He places Himself in the humble situation towards the Father, and He explicitly asks for a prior approval from the Father, in order to unveil the divine mysteries and to assure the people about the saving love of the Father, confident in His consent.

On this way, the prayer of Jesus towards the Father, it is not only the manifestation of His hierarchal ministration, but it is also the manifestation of the prophetic ministration. The prayer is an intersection of these two dignities of His. If through His hierarchal ministration He presents Himself to the people in the name of God, and through the prophetic calling He presents Himself to the people like a God's envoy, basically, in both cases is also about a man, about the man Whom God really consented with, to mediate the reconciliation, and the closeness between God and people." (Stăniloae 1993)

“Jesus is not a teacher Who not to draw upon to anybody, besides Him, the attention of the people. Through this He diminishes Himself in front of the people, He presents Himself in the name of God, by making Himself a teacher and, in humbleness, and in the need of every man to lean himself on God, and not on himself, in the problems which his eternal destiny depends on.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“But, the character of a mediator, between God and people, of Jesus Christ, like a prophet, it consists, especially, of the fact that He translates through the means of His human being the mysteries of the divine will.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“If the Son of God had shown Himself to us in a unveiled way, He wouldn't have been a prophet. But He descended Himself on the human level. He has made our fellow human, in order to bring to our understanding, the possibility to understand the godlike mysteries. The prophet is the human translator of the godlike mysteries, he is the mediator of them towards people, by putting them into the human vessels. Jesus fulfilled the service of a prophet, appropriating himself, through humbleness, the human means to communicate them. He presented Himself to the people in a humble human form; He did for them the ministration of a prophet. When the philosopher lets somebody else to interpret his ideas in the ordinary people language, that interpreter is some kind of philosopher's prophet. But, when himself comes among the ordinary people, adopting their vocabulary, he makes himself his own prophet. For a man, the function of being a prophet of God is a rising, while for the Son of God is a descending, it is a kenotic function. The Son of God, by descending Himself to speak to the people in the language that they can understand, He came in the maximum closeness to them. While somebody sends a word to somebody else, through an intermediary, this means that he wants to keep a distance. When h comes to speak to him directly, this means that he no longer keeps the distance. The communication through word, out of love, it is the supreme approach in the order of the human life.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The Son of God, through the prophetic mission, made Himself His interpreter on an inferior plan; He descended on an inferior ontological stage. He transposed the godlike things into our modest forms. He made Himself His own “forerunner”, like Maximos the Confessor said. He descended like a pedagogue at the man's understanding, to raise him at the godlike things³⁷." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Himself, like a unique subject of the two natures, He is in this way aware of being not only God, but also a mediator of God, because He does not unveil the godhead as such, but He manifests the godhead through the powers of the human nature. The one who speaks to the people is God, but God in a role of a prophet, of an interpreter of His godhead and of the entire Holy Trinity. He is God and prophet in the same time, revealer and coverer of the godhead, God who is working alone to His unveiling, but, though, through mediation, being to Himself the only translator and mediator. Through all He says and shows to the people, He drives their attention at what is beyond word, beyond the seen reality. The godhead is beyond. His Word is only mediation. His ministration of a teacher of the godlike things it is one of mediation, of a prophetic character, and not that of an uncovered showing. He has continuously the conscience of this mission and of this work. The expression and the human showing are not, through themselves, the godhead; everything that is human, otherwise, it has not any right of an ultimate instance into the service of the teaching of the godlike things, but it indicates towards what is from above. Jesus, like a teacher-prophet, He does not want to stop the people's attention to Himself, to the showing and to His human word, but He sends it above, to what cannot be seen and expressed, to God, that means also to Him, regarded like more than seen and heard, more than "Jesus according to the body" (II Corinthians. 5, 16)." (Stăniloae 1993)

"It is seen from the said things both what Jesus has in common with the prophets, and also what it shows Him like the supreme prophet. He is a interpreter, a mediator, an envoy of God to teach the people; He does not presents Himself like an unveiled God, but He hints to godhead like to a reality beyond word and beyond His look after the body. It is a descending on the level of the man. But, in the same time, this prophet is God Himself.

³⁷ "The teacher, bearer of God (Saint Gregory of Nazianzus), called Him His forerunner, like the One Who unveiled Himself, according to the things received from the Old New Testament and from the New Testament, by walking Himself in front of Himself, through riddles, expressions, and types, and, through them, leading at the truth from beyond". Maximos the Confessor, Migne, G. P. 91, 1253 D. See also Hans Urs von Balthasar, w. c. p. 196. "He accepted to be created without any change in our species, due to His immeasurable love for people and to become a type and a symbol of Himself and to show us Himself out of a symbolic Self. Thereby, through Himself like a shown one, He led towards Himself like the One totally hidden with all the creation, and through the shown godlike works of the body, he gave to the people, with love, indices about the not shown and hidden reality from beyond all things, of which neither of the existences can in any way understand it and express it". G. P. 91, 1256 D; U. von Balthasar, W. C.

He sends the attention above the word and above His human appearance, but not beyond Himself like a subject (not only a human one, but also a divine one) and not on a way strange from His word and appearance. At their basis, at the source of them, there is Him. He sends to Father but still through Himself³⁸.

Whereas He is a prophet, whereas, therefore, He does not show God unveiled but through interpretation, He must be believed like the prophets are. Precisely like those ones, He neither does demonstrate through reasoning and intuitions, but He affirms His certitudes. And the mysterious power of these certitudes, make to be born identical certitudes in the souls of the listeners too, without being there any need for demonstrations. This is for the certitude itself, it has and it gives something from what is called experience, or seeing, it is something even superior to the “experience”, to the rational, or to the scientific “seeing“. Jesus, of course, He has only “seeing” not also faith in the precise sense, like the other prophets did. But, because He cannot give the listeners His “seeing”, like it is in itself, but He interprets it shrouded in His certitude, His listeners cannot learn His “seeing” except through faith. There is a difference between the faith that the listeners granted to the prophets and that one granted to Jesus like a Prophet-God. The difference consists not only in the fact that the certitude which irradiates from Jesus it has a different intensity and the godlike “seeing” which He interprets to them it has an amplitude, a clarity, and a depth incomparably larger, but, especially, in the fact that the prophet does not pretend the faith “in His person”, but only “in His communication” (actually, these differences have a common base).” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Jesus, nevertheless, He pretends the faith not only in the word, but also in His Person. He calls the listeners through word, or actually, above the word, but still towards Himself like God, for God is in Himself and not outside Him. He is an envoy of the Father, He wants to show the Father to the world, but the Father is into Himself. The word spoken by Him does not serve like an indication towards a reality different from Him. The word does not show a target outside Him, it does not interpret a foreign reality, but on Himself. The one who speaks and the one about it is spoken, there are not two of them, but there is about one and the same. At the prophet, the word is of the man, and God is the reality foreign to the man.” (Stăniloae 1993)

³⁸ Bible of King George, Gospel of John, 14, 8-9: “Philip saith unto him, Lord, shew us the Father, and it sufficeth us. Jesus saith unto him, Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? he that hath seen me hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, Shew us the Father?” (E. I. t.’n.)

“At Jesus, like a Prophet-God, between word and God, there is no more a duality; the word is of God, not of man (or the words is of a man who is in the same time God) and in the word there is God, and not the man; that’s why it must not be searched for into a direction foreign from the subject Who has spoken the word, but the word is himself the One Who has spoken it. The word is no longer empty of God, like a simple arrow towards God, but it has God like its support. The word, in this case, has no longer the same value which it has when it is detached from the one who speaks it. In this case, the word is the same with the subject who speaks it. When is it spoken, the word of Jesus comprise in itself the godlike reality. The Word and God are one and the same. The listeners of the prophets believed in their word like in an indication towards God. The listeners of Jesus believe in His word like manifesting God Himself. The word ties them to the Speaker, and not send them towards Him. The word of the prophet cannot liberate you from the conscience that something humanly takes place between you and God. The word of Jesus places you in an unmediated manner in front of God. There is an indissoluble union between word and reality, between word and God. While, commonly, the word is of the man, leading - like to something foreign - towards God, in Jesus the word of the man, without ceasing to be of the man, it is also of God, for the man Who speaks, in this case, He is in the same time God. The dialectic of God’s revelation through Jesus Christ like a supreme Prophet it presents like this: here God unveils Himself directly, and He is no behind of a human subject. God Himself is the One Who speaks to the people. This is the mysterious experience which can be, gained by faith, in front of Jesus. The word, though, it is human. The mystery consists in the fact that, though the word does not comprise the unveiled showing of God, and therefore it appeals to faith, it produces though the certitude and the experience that the one who speaks it is God. What is seen and heard it is a human environment and instrument, but this instrument produces, like certitude, like an experience, the faith that is handled by the godlike subject. God “unveils” Himself, in other words, in Jesus Christ like a subject but not like a seen reality. The believer is sure about the presence of God like a subject; he knows Him like a subject, he experiences Him, even if the believers does not see the godhead.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“God unveils Himself like a subject in Jesus, through His word, to the one who feels himself overwhelmed by the torrent of mastering, of commanding authority, but also of love which emanates from Him, pouring down in his own hearth³⁹. (We observe again how the dignities of Jesus meet, are like a

³⁹ Whether where the man is no longer able to make the act to transcend from himself to the world, to others, he is overwhelmed by despair because of the lack of meaning of his existence and he ends in suicide, and the fullest transcendence is accomplished in the loving meeting with the other, in whom it is concentrated for the own self the fullness of the existence. (See L. Bingswanger, w. c. p. 596 and others), in Jesus, the believer has like a polyhedron; Jesus like prophet He is also king). For Jesus presented Himself like a man and He spoke through human words, God was not seen. But, because some people felt in front of this man like in front of God, He revealed Himself. Because the ones to whom the godlike subject unveiled Himself into the man Jesus, the words which they were experiencing the godlike authority of this subject through, those words were no longer human words, but they were godlike words. They cannot distinguish anymore between His words like human sounds, and His subject like God. His godlike authority was in His words. His godlike authority cannot be manifested but through His words. The human word of Jesus - by being the necessary means to God's showing among people and like a prophet, of His unveiling like a subject in the sinful state which people are in - it is the divine subject Himself in His manifestation among people. He was impropriated by God, being made image of His showing among people." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The word of Jesus, though human, was having in it something which exceeded the human. "(Mt.: 7: 28:) And it came to pass, when Jesus had ended these sayings, the people were astonished at his doctrine: (Mt.: 7: 29) For he taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes." says the Gospel. Through Him, the crowd was experiencing the infinity of love itself, of power and of authority of God, like, for instance, otherwise, we are experiencing some infinity in the relation of love with one of our fellow humans." (Stăniloae 1993)

"But, though, the human word of Jesus gives not only the certitude that He is God, but it is also a means through which the man dives into the godlike environment, into the infinity of the divine reality. The human word, by and large, it has the mystical character that cannot be circumscribed in an exact way to an intellectual meaning, but it brings with it also something from the being who speaks it, so that it is an emanation of that being, an overflowing of that being in front of the listener. The one who hears the word of a fellow human, he is capable to distinguish him from any other man and to shape and to spiritually feel his individuality. The revelation of the man through word it is not only a revelation of his thoughts, but also of his being⁴⁰." (Stăniloae 1993) supreme source of life, the supreme transcendence and, in relation with Him, the believer experiences the transcending which gives him an infinite increasing of the existence.

⁴⁰ The word, like any other manifestation of the man, it is what is called today in psychology a configuration (Gestalt), a symbol, which in a precise limited shape it comprises all the indescribable depth of a person, even the infinite of a love. The tragic thing is that a positive judgment can see only the precise outline, the material

“The word of Jesus has this virtue. Through His word, Jesus Christ causes into the listeners the experience of His godhead. And even today, His words are causing this experience. The words of Jesus from Gospels, even without the mysterious coefficient these words were given by the Person of Jesus in the moment of which He told them, they are of such a nature that, though being taken from the content of the human vocabulary and intelligible for man, they have within the virtuality of some unlimited meanings. They are understood by the simple man, because they are words from his intellectual range. But they are satisfying also the finest intellectual. And no one of them considers that they have exhausted the meanings of those words, but they feel that they have impropriated only a small part from them. Everyone makes the experience of the one who, after he descended by the sea, and even by being in contact with the sea, he cannot tell that he knows the sea entirely. The words of the Gospel, they also represent a hypostatic union of the mankind with the divinity, by being a manifestation of this union.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“It is, therefore, in the first place, something objective in the spiritual manifestation of Jesus Who knocks on the door of the heart, of our will, and surprises us. This is the first moment of the report of the man with Jesus. The second moment is the positive or the negative attitude to this objective something. Natural is the positive movement of our being, which is a prolongation of the moment of surprise, of recognition of the absolute novelty of the element which welcomes us from Jesus Christ. The negative attitude is a cutting off, a sluice of the first flux of our being, and a covering of the element of supra-humanity which surprises us in Jesus Christ, and this is, thereby, an unnatural inclination but which is according to our numbness into sin, to the opacity towards everything tries to break our egotistic horizon and our autonomist commodity, which do not want to accept a master and even more an absolute master like God is.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Summarizing the things we said about Jesus like a prophet in report with other prophets, in common with them He has the followings:

Jesus offers, like the priest does, knowledge of God through interpretation in the human language, through mediation, not through showing, this interpretation constituting thereby a humiliation of the Son of God on the levels of the people.

one, the rational one, out of such a symbol. But that judgment is blind in front of the reality. (Cf. L. Binswanger, w. c.).

That's why, He gives birth to the faith, to the certitude within the people who want to believe, and not the seeing which everybody must admit. But just through this, the receiving of the godlike things is a step to get out from the sin. Just the circumstance that the man, due to his sin, he is not able to "see" the godlike things, and so somebody must bring the godlike things close to him through faith, God uses it for elevating the man from sin.

But Jesus surpasses all the prophets, by being the supreme and the last prophet, for:

He mediates the connection and translates the will of God towards people, not like the will of a foreign subject, but like His own will.

The divine revelation which He accomplishes it is, therefore, not only the fullest possible, through its amplitude and clearness, but it is also of other character, because through Him the people make the experience of the "me-you" report with God. When a person speaks directly to us and not through a mediator, we experience his reality in a more intensive way. And, through the prophets, we acquire the certitude that God is subject, thereby just the same we learn also through Jesus. But through the prophets, we experience God like One Who has just spoken to a fellow human, but now He has left us, turning His back to us. In Jesus we have God permanently with His face towards us, speaking to all of us, and we have Him in a maximum closeness and not at a distance from us.

The prophet ties us to him through the certitude which he transmits us and we have it in common with him about God like a Master of everybody. In the last analyze we are watching, though, beyond the prophet, towards God Who is outside and above our human communion. Jesus ties us to Himself like to the ultimate center. He gives us not only the certitude about God, but for He places us in communion with Himself, He places us in communion with God.

In this way, the Revelation in Jesus is the same time salvation for, while the prophet is a man whom God puts to talk on His behalf, here He speaks Himself. The words constitute here the bridge of communion and, so, of power from Him towards people. The human words are no longer what separate God from people, but they are now what place God in connection with them.

The prophet, by showing God as the One Who tries to make His will known to the people and Who wants to take them, through faith, out from the sin's egotism, in the communion of the love and of the confidence, but the prophet not accomplishing himself this communion with God, the prophet is a beginning asking for continuation, a promise asking for its fulfillment. The prophet is the forerunner of the entering of God Himself into communion with the people, in the only possible way, through embodiment. If we admit the prophet, if we recognize that God sought for speaking to the people through a human mouth, because of not being there any other possibility, in a necessary way we will have to admit also His descending amongst people in a role of a prophet. If we admit, over all, a divine Revelation through man, we will have to admit the embodiment of God, like a fulfillment of the Revelation, of its meaning; if we deny the embodiment of God, we will implicitly deny any Revelation through the mediation of the human subject. But by this, we deny the most profound basis of the confidence of the man in another man, of the referring of a man to another one. The “me-to” report is no longer built on the fundamental fact that only through it is communicated the certitude of faith from one to another. Without the Revelation through man, without a prophet, the human community shatters and, in general, it disappears from the world the certitude of God’s existence like a sustaining power of the society. If we deny the necessity and the meaning of the prophet, it does not appear anymore as necessary, neither even possible, the embodiment. Here stays one of the most powerful arguments for the divinity of the Old Testament, which some people would want to remove.

Only the Revelation through man it sanctifies and it founds the reports among people. Only by the fact that God makes the man an instrument of His unveiling to another man, giving the highest covering to this circulatory currency which the face of the man is, He grants to every man a high value in the eyes of the fellow human. And this will of man’s capitalization in front of his fellow human it is not fully accomplished but through the showing of God Himself like a human “you”, bringing together into a unit, the human subject with the godlike subject, like a consummation of the idea of prophet.

We will stop now also on the character and on the content of the teaching which Jesus Christ has given like a prophet. Of course, that that is not given for being used with a self-standing body of a doctrine, but like a continuously actual manifestation of the Son of God become man. It is not less true, though, that we cannot be indifferent to what Jesus Christ has said and to what He says. The fact that God has deigned to enter the communion of the direct dialogue with the man, it has an overwhelming importance. But this communion can’t be considered like a frame which could be filled up with no matter what impartation of words. Between the fact of the direct and permanent dialogue between God and man, and the character and the content of the “teaching” communicated in his frame, there is a tight bond; we could say that the last is not but an explanation of the first one and of the basis and of the goals of it. We, though, couldn’t have derived the teaching from the simple communion, if this wouldn’t had, for example, the necessary time to explain itself.

That’s why, it is of higher importance the preoccupation with the learning, but always in report with the communion which expresses it, and highlights it, and follows it, by being a teaching which serves, on this way, to life, to the living report between the listener and the one who imparts it. In His teaching, Jesus tells Who He is, Who has sent Him among people and, through this, He unveils the mystery of the Holy Trinity, the love of the Trinity towards the fallen man, the goal which the Son of God embodies for, namely the salvation of the people, the way on which this salvation will be done, the word not doing anything else but to forerun and to translate the deed of love and His sacrifice. Furthermore, Christ's teaching comprises exhortations towards man not to reject the love from God, and appeals to enter the communion with Him through faith and love.

The whole His teaching can be considered, either like a supreme unveiling of God – in the limits allowed by the capacity of the earthly man –, or like a means towards the salvation of the man, for the unveiling has no any other goal but the salvation. The Revelation is the presenting of God in the work of salvation and the explanation of this work. The understanding of the teaching, like an understanding of the saving work of God, and, with this, of all the reasons of this work, which stay in His will and in His being, it has it in a sufficient degree only the one who is under the divine work itself, namely into the savior dialogue, in a factual report with God, Who reveals Himself to us by saving us, and Who saves us by revealing Himself to us. Who remains a simple spectator, by engaging only his reason in order to understand the teaching, he does not understand the essential, a lot of the issues seem absurd to him, and the ones who fit his reason, they still remain dead theories to him ⁴¹. Only who lets himself to be totally kidnapped into the living report with God, only him understands this. That's why the Gospel says: "For they considered not the miracle of the loaves: for their heart was hardened." (Mk. 6: 52). And, that's why, Jesus predicts that His disciples will fully understand His teaching only when the Holy Ghost will descend upon them (Jn. 14: 26). Jesus didn't come in order to give the mind a new doctrine, neither to respond all kind of questions of intellectual curiosity. He came in order to answer only one question, but this question is the greatest, the most fundamental one, the most tormenting one, for it is the question troubling not only the mind but the whole man, by permanently raising up from his depth, and not from the mental periphery. It is the question of the man: what can I do to be saved? And the answer of Jesus, which was not some theoretical answer, but it was a divine work, namely the showing of God, a work interpreted in teaching, it was not an urge to the learning of a doctrine, but to entering the report of love with God, to placing the man in a living relation with the savior work of Him. Jesus did not tell the young man who asked Him what to do for inheriting the eternal life: "Memorize well my doctrine", but: "Love God from all your heart, from all your soul, and from all your breath, and your neighbor like yourself". (Stăniloae 1993)

⁴¹ The poet Paul Valéry said once: "Si nous accusons nous jugeons, le fond n'est pas atteint" (Variété II, 135), and L. Binswanger (w. c. p. 111), from whom we are taking this word, continues: "Through this, he wants to say that there exists a new instance of which understanding is deeper than of the judgment or the condemnation. This instance can't be anything else but love, because only the love can touch the ground". "When the world judges upon the love and upon the one who loves, it judges falsely".

"The prophetic calling of Jesus it means the ministration of supreme unveiling of God, of His maximum closeness through the human word. The word's means of confirmation have the secondary role of confirmation but not of interpretation. The Prophet is a prophet, in the first place, through word. At Jesus, the objective elements which uphold the word, they are much more impressive than at other prophets, and that's because, He is the prophet most confirmed by the objective criteria. But mainly, they objective criteria are ordered, though, in the hierarchical ministration and in the kingly dignity. In each dignity, something else steps forward, in the foreground, in full light.

In the prophecy, the word has the main role.

Related to this, two aspects must be highlighted: a) the capacity of the human word to be an instrument for revealing, and b) the revealing force, entirely different of the prophetic word, which distinguishes it from the word of any other man and it shows it like having also in itself, not only in the adjacent criteria, a revealing power. And when we tell a revealing power, we tell, in the same time, a power producing of faith, because the full effectuation of the Revelation it is accomplished through the faith growing within man. Also, when we talk about the faith producing power, we talk about the soul shaping power, being known the relentless and the profound transformations which the faith produces within people.

The human word has indeed a great, a mysterious power. It diminishes or it makes massive realities disappearing, and it can create others. Sometimes, the worlds which it makes to disappear are real, and the ones which it creates are imaginary, but, for many times, the reality is the most proper meaning which the word creates. A good word, addressed in front of somebody, or through somebody else, it creates in him also real virtues which prolong his life or even save his life forever. The word brings people together or divides them, by decisively influencing the destiny of the social collectivity. If we have in our sight that, even the worlds which seem to be created by the world put in the service of the fantasy, are not created in a disinterested manner, only for their sake, but, into an ultimate analyze, to be offered to others like a conception, like a more just norm of behavior, we realize that the function of the word does not stay in freely and theoretically revealing of mysteries⁴², but the word expresses a pretention, an urge, a will to oblige, and it has a huge power to awake the obligation of the other, to determine him to go in a direction or in another. The word reveals in this way a subject, pretending and, almost regularly, accomplishing some determination of another subject. His revealing function is tightly braided with the ethic function, revealing an attitude and compelling to an attitude. Sometimes it unveils and it obliges to an attitude concerning a small question, some other times in one engaging the man fundamentally, towards the grounds of the existence themselves. Of this function does not make exception the word, which absolves the fellow human of a duty or of another, or of all of them. It is also this a urge, revealing a subject and an attitude and pretending or even accomplishing one similar into another subject. The worlds which are painted or which are banished away with a magical power of incantation, the arguments of an imposing stringent logics, they serve the goal of convincing the other, namely they reveal a subject who tries and, often, he succeeds to convince the other to impropriate a similar thinking and attitude. Only by fact that there intervenes the word (the thought) of the second subject, it makes that the determination produced by the word of the first one to be diminished or modified. There doesn't exist a man who, by speaking or by writing, more widely or more concisely, to follow the simple disinterest of revealing his thoughts and not a gaining of the fellow human to what he sees and how he sees, on the basis of a dynamic attitude towards the world. It's self-evident that nobody would have spoken if there nobody had listened to him; nobody will use the word like a simple brush for painting his world, if he doesn't care whether somebody sees it. But the listening which he expects and supposes, like prior impulse of his word, it is not a passive listening, but it is an answer, whether is even a quiet one. And the wish is the answer to be an approval, and not a simple theoretical approval, but one which to become a determining force of the life of that one. The word has not a monologist character, but a dialogic one, and it has not the meaning of painting a static world, but it is the seed of the dynamism thrown into the souls of the people and into the social reports, it is the spiritual dough of the relentless historical movement. Its revealing function cannot be separated from the power and from the mission of determining people, from the tendency to increase or to modify the reality through the spirit of others. If it is like so, the word will imply a great responsibility for every man to use it according to its positive role, truly creative and not dissolvent, in order to urge through it the another, to help him grow up, to see and to start following the right path. Even the simple word, the not argued affirmation and the not adorned in attractive descriptions, it has a huge power of determination upon the people. Through a word you can place a border stone for the rebirth and for the salvation of a man, or you can push him to destruction. Through a word it can be awakened a whole nation to life. You never know how many people depend on the words you have uttered and on what measure. Apostle James resembled the tongue, worthily, to the helm of the ships, which, even small, it carries after itself so many burdens, or to the break of the horse, or to a spark which sets the forests in fire (Jas. 3: 3-9).

⁴² This idea stays at the basis of the entire philosophy of Lucian Blaga, which is deprived by any ethical obligation.

The word is the greatest power from the world, not because it paints static realities, but because it determines the human wills, and it modifies the spiritual basis of the world. Through word it is shown the man subject, full of power over other people. The word builds and destroys in the spiritual order, so in the important one. If the human word has a power of creation, we could think in what a consummate sense is creator the godlike word.

The word is the greatest spiritual force of the highest created being. By word, every man disposes over the fellow humans, and he can make a good or an enormous bad. Every man, by having the word, and by being given the ethical function of the word, it is obvious the responsibility tied to this power. The word must be used only for building, not for dilapidation. Namely, only for awakening and for upholding within man the responsibility towards his fellow humans, of what constitutes his ethical being, a characteristic which is expressed even by the word. It is absurd to raise the word against itself or against its grounds.

In the creator force of the word, which the man has it at his disposition, it stays also the possibility to make a dangerous use of it. The man can create new realities through the word, but normal realities, the healthy ones, are only the ones according to the divine reality and will, namely the realities of love amongst people and of all the virtues which accompany unconditionally the love. Healthy realities are only the ones which the word creates by building the souls, by calling them to obligation and responsibility, namely, only the realities which the words create while remaining into the frame of the destiny and of his ethical function. The word can also create abnormal realities, adverse to the true realities and inconsistent with the divine will. Either we call these abnormal, liar realities, or we call like this the descriptions and the arguments through which they are produced, the word, here, it does not stay only in the service of the true, but also of the lie. The power of the lie to impose it comes from the power of the word to create any kind of realities. The word can create into man a state of enmity. The lie is real, but it is not the normal reality, that one according to the will of God, but it is an ill reality, a tormenting one, a reality suffering of some kind of gaps, a distorted reality, a false one, we could say.

The word of the man has decayed almost on all the line to this function of a servant of the lie, instead of serving the truth which it is tied through its sense with.

Only because the word has the function of revealing the own subject and of compelling the fellow human, we can understand why the word has been given to every man, for, through the word, each man is the teacher of another.

The word hasn't been given for the simple revealing of some words which would be unveiled to somebody or to some people, in a richer or in a less rich manner, especially, in report with others. If this had been the case, why these worlds would have been contradictory to one another? What would have there been so many contradictions amongst them for? Or, what all the people would have had the word for, while only some of them are able to reveal worlds of mysteries?

The word isn't given for a preponderant revealing function. The people have unveiled, actually, so few new things, which to be essentially new, since the very existence of the world. And, though, each man brings through the word a new revelation on the world, the most essential and the most determinant revelation in the circle of his fellow humans, being that of a new subject.

Each man has the word, for each one is justified and is called to revealing his subject and to awaken the responsibility of his fellow human to fulfill his duties, which always are duties of the communion and of the concrete place and moment. Only because the word has as ultimate mission the ethical one, even if all the people are teachers to one another, there doesn't take place a bewilderment of minds, but all of them can grow up like ethical personalities, by fulfilling all their concrete duties to one another. Only in this way we understand the possibility of interweaving the role of teacher with the role of apprentice in each one's destiny, of the sovereignty upon the fellow human through the own word and of dependence on them through their word. Each man is called to urge his fellow human to fulfill his duty, imposed the concrete moment and to listen to that one's urge for fulfilling his own duty.

Given the less revealing and the more ethical character of the word, we live, as long as we are on earth, by faith and by coerciveness. The word reveals in a fuller manner only the character of the subject who speaks to us, but neither this one totally direct and unveiled, but through an experience that doesn't excludes the faith. And the word reveals in a fuller manner only the subject, because the subject is the factor who calls us to responsibility and in report with whom we need to behave ourselves like beings living by faith and by responsibility.

But, instead of serving the truth and the further building of the created world, through faith and responsibility, bringing the world to likeness to the divine reality, all the people have become liars, because of rejecting their faith in something else than in themselves, and they have rejected the responsibility too, by following to the father of the pride and of the lie. If all the people served the truth, there it would be harmony but, because they serve the lie, there it is chaos. This is for the truth is one, it is unity in harmonic multiplicity, while the counterfeiting has countless possibilities.

The word has its power, however that power will be. But the word has the building power only when it serves to the true reality, only when it starts from the truth and it follows the truth. We could say that not into the word taken in itself it stays its building power, but into something which remains to be determined. But, because the function of the word it has an ethical character, starting from responsibility and wanting to wake up the obligation of the fellow human, following the communion and not the anarchy of the egotism, we can rather say that on the being of the word itself it depends to serve also to the building and to the truth, and that this mission is not different from the word. The word-lie is degeneration, it is distortion of the word, it is no longer a proper word. Otherwise, that something which distinguishes the proper word, the not degenerated word from the word-lie, from the destroyer of healthy reality word, it stays just in itself and this is not something else but the vibration of the responsibility, lie an attribute which gives firmness to the subject. The true word which is the word-truth and the subject like a form, a solid reality, by having this firmness from responsibility and, by being carried only by responsibility, they are a whole. The word-truth, is not anything else, but the inevitable respiration of the responsible subject. Where the word is degenerated, it is degenerated the whole subject himself, because of not nourishing himself anymore with the vital substance of the responsibility.

In fact, when is a word creating damages and when it has not a building power, no matter how nice sound and how ethical would it sound? This is when the listener does not feel in the word the vibration of a steadfast responsibility, of a sincere and serious care for himself, or when he does not feel the covering by a firm subject, wholly crystallized into the said word and, thereby, into the care of the one who is saying the word.

And, as damaging is the word in which is not vibrating the responsibility of the subject for his fellow human, but the careless will of the diabolic one to use the word like a tool on egotistic purposes or to drive him to his own destruction, as much damaging it is also the word-chatter in which is not felt any firmness of the subject and, so, it cannot exteriorize any serious calling, a not surpassing one, which to give birth to the personality of the fellow human.

The degeneration of the word, like a weakening of its power of creating true reality, like a perverting into lie and dissolvent miasma, it is the sign of the anticipate degeneration of the subject who speaks the word, of his decay to a state of inconsistent shadow. And firm is the man only when he lives into the obligation of the communion, when his fellow humans have the surety that they can believe in him in the whole future. The egotistic one, by having in his concern only his own interest, he does not engage with his future towards others. The egotism, the fickleness, and the lack of value of the word, they are found together. In this meaning, the devil is the most inconsistent creature. His word has no price at all.

No matter how the thing would stay, factually, the human word proves to be the greatest revealing power and, so, a creator of spiritual reality into the created world. Every man is, somehow, brought to the full reality or to the ruin through the word of the fellow human, which helps us to understand the affirmation of the Holy Scripture that the first man had to impart by the Word of the divine subject for not just be brought to the real realization, but even to be based like a possibility and like a beginning of a spiritual reality.

If the greatest revealing and formatting power on earth it is the human word, it is natural to God to use it in His revelation and in the man's restoration. Also, given the indissolubility between the word and the human soul, it is granted that the Son of God, by making Himself a human subject, He has made a speaking human subject, by healing the subject in the same time with the word, by reestablishing the firmness of the subject and the power and the truth of the word.

b) Being given the decadence of the word in the mouth of the people, usually, the power, in fact, of the human word and the means through which this power is gained, they are shown in all their evidence only to the prophets. The word of the prophet has gravity and a power of penetration and determination towards good, like no other word of the man has. It is a word which burns like the fire, which cuts like the sword, which gets you out of commodity and numbness by throwing you in fear and anxiety, into the decision to follow him or in relentless enmity against the one who speaks that word. Most of the prophets ended being killed. The word has its power in the firmness of the subject, in his standing up and fixity, besides of what it confesses. Their word is truth, like truth is also the prophetic subject and it serves to founding of true reality amongst people and in their reports. The word of the prophet is flame of responsibility towards the fellow humans.

The prophet is the one who has this experience through unmediated report with God. The word spoken by the prophet it is not a word directly spoken by God, but it had in it the divine influx, which reestablished the word in the whole its power. We could say that the subject of the prophet, like interior word and like exterior expression, he received a straightening from godlike word, the word creator of the human word.

The prophet reveals, through his powerful word, of responsibility and ethical penetration into listeners, like a most imposing and sure reality, his own subject. But, together with him and within him, the prophet shows God too, Who is present like power within the prophet. Here stays the miraculous force which the faith is transmitted with, from man to man, which is lightened the certitude from certitude with.

Given the degeneration of the human subjects and, thereby, the weakening of their word, it was necessary this intervention of the godlike word through prophets, in order to reestablish of the man.

But, through other intermediary subjects, it was not possible to effectuate a full revealing of the divine subject and a consummate reestablishing of the human subject and of the power of the man's word. The prophet didn't do else but he awakened and upheld the expectations of the full unveiling of God. The divine subject must speak Himself, directly, in order to reveal His existence. He must speak in human words, on one hand, in order to be accessible to people, and on the other hand, for making Himself a human subject and for using the human word, in order to reestablish the firmness and the prestige of the human and the power of the word. The prophet showed the model of the true human subject, and, through the power of his deeply rummaging the people's obligation speech, the prophet determined to be born in the people the subject like a firm and solid reality." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The true word has a tremendous power of subject revealing. The word of Jesus overwhelmingly reveals the presence of the divine-human Subject within Him. But, through absolute confidence which He creates His listeners, those ones gain the certitude about everything He communicates them. His word is somehow transparent to the divine-human Subject of Jesus. But, besides this, into another manner, His word has the power of making the listeners to believe everything He communicates them besides showing of His Subject, for this Subject is lucent in the absolute worthiness to be believed." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The human word of Jesus it is somehow lucent to the godlike Word, the manifestation of his calling to ethical responsibility and to realization like a subject. The godlike Word has dressed in human word; the divine subject has taken the means of manifestation of the man.

His word is covered by the full reality of His Subject, which is the supreme reality, and which pretends and raises the man, also, at his true reality. The word of the man, when it stays in connection with God, it comprises in itself a part of the truth, and it accomplishes the truth, in its limited world. In the human word of Jesus there is not reestablished only a part of the truth, but there is the Truth Himself, which is one with the godlike Word. The word of Jesus reestablishes all the humanity in the total truth, in full reality.

From the meaning of the word, highlighted in this exposure, it turns out that the truth in the created world it is not something given, which we have not something else to do but to contemplate it. The truth as full reality, a normal reality in the created spiritual word, it is to a large extent our mission, and we have to fulfill the truth through our word carried by faith and responsibility. The truth, like a reality given from ever, it is only at God, it is the inter-Trinitarian life of the godhead Persons. Our spiritual world is created by God only like grounds and possibilities. The bringing of the world to its full reality, to the whole truth, it is assigned by God to our responsibility. But, instead of continuing in this world the creation of the truth after the form of the eternal Truth, we rather entirely disfigured it in the contrary of the truth, into lie.

In Jesus Christ, the Truth or the divine Word has intervened into our world in order to reestablish it and to put it on the right track of accomplishing. But He assigned though, to our will, to our word, the need to collaborate to the consummation of the spiritual reality created.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Jesus Christ is the true hierarch, realizing, in fact, the reconciliation between man and God of whose promise and waiting was expressed through the priesthood of the Old Testament. Through the hierarch of the Old Testament, it was expressed and it was mediated the covenant of God, regarding the future fulfillments, at the future communion. Jesus Christ is the mediator of the actual union between God and man, of the done, unmediated covenant. The old covenant left the man by himself for then, under the reign of a law which he must fulfill in order to make himself worthy of the communion with God; the new covenant is the immediate descent of the God’s love upon the man. The covenant, by being a convention between God and the people it is always a connection too. The old covenant was expressing a relation from distance, like between the master and the servant, a relation directed through commandments; the new covenant is the most intimate liaison, it is the report of perfect love between God and man; the new covenant is the most intimate liaison, it is the report of perfect love between God and man.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“We have said that who does not admit the possibility of the prophet and his reality in the Old Testament, he cannot admit either Jesus Christ like a supreme prophet. Who does not admit that the priesthood is necessary and that the priesthood has its establishment from God, to that one it does not result like a necessity of the consummation of priesthood, through Jesus Christ.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Jesus Christ like supreme prophet and like a true hierarch, He is in accordance to the prophecy and priesthood of the Old Testament. It is like a new aspect under which the divinity from the Old Testament is shown to us and the divinity's indissoluble liaison with the New Testament. The priesthood, the sacrifice, and the covenant between God and people, they form a whole. The covenant, though it is established by the will of God, it must be inaugurated through blood brought from the part of the man by the priest who was chosen by God. "Neither the first covenant was celebrated without blood". Truly, Moses, after he told in front of all people, all the commandments of the law, by taking the blood of calves and goats, with water and red wool and hyssop, he sprinkled the book and the entire people, and he said: "(Heb. 9:20) This is the blood of the testament which God hath enjoined unto you". The new law, also, it asked for its blood, because, at the last supper, Jesus: "(Mt. 26: 27) And He took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it; (Mt. 26: 28) For this is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins". It is seen from here, that the liaison with God it cannot be established without sacrifice, because: "(Heb. 9: 22) (...) and without shedding of blood there is no remission". (Stăniloae 1993)

"The Epistle towards Hebrews, by considering that the two forms of sacrifice through which were established the two covenants, it declares that the new one, consequently also the Hierarchy Who mediated it, it is superior to the old one and to its priesthood, respectively, for the reason that the sacrifice of the new one is a man, respectively the God-man, while the sacrifices of old one, they were animals. Then, because here the liaison between the priest and the sacrifice is so close than the sacrifice is the sacrificer Himself. The Hierarchy brings himself like a sacrifice. The fact that the Holy Scripture attributes to the new covenant a superiority just because it is inaugurated through human blood and there is a full identity between the hierarchy and the sacrifice, it gives us the key of the high meaning which the sacrifice has in report with God. Partially, the same meaning is shown by the Old Testament too, but it is fully unveiled to us through the sacrifice of Jesus Christ." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Through Jesus Christ, being truly accomplished the idea of priesthood and of sacrifice, it was realized also the consummate connection of the communion between God and people." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Jesus, while still being in quality as prophet, He produces within man the faith, namely the height of a subject, and by this, especially, through the me-You communion which He establishes between people and Himself like God, through His words, He conveys not only the teaching, but also something from the saving godlike power.

Through this it is seen only that between the dignity as prophet of Jesus and the one as Hierarch, there wasn't a hiatus, but there was a passing from a less intensive area to one more intensive." (Stăniloae 1993)

"In the light of this mystery we understand better what we said before about the incapacity of a man, even being him totally pure, to perform a substitutive and expiatory sufferance. It was insufficient only a sufferance into history. Even Jesus, if He had suffered only into history, we wouldn't have understood how the power of His sufferance would have been communicated into any human soul from all times. He remembers this sufferance also in heavens, His sufferance becoming contemporary to each man who stays in the decisive moment of his eternal destiny. The sufferance from history has a big signification, but it doesn't explain everything. This sufferance had the role to place the sufferance of Jesus Christ into the ultimate intensity, having consequences with this intensity, later, in His being. He eternally bears the signs of the Cross, not only on His body but also in His soul. He knows, He feels, He spiritually repeats the sufferance from Golgotha, for each man on his decisive moment, because He feels not sorry about it, and He doesn't renounce to the will to save everybody (Heb. 7: 25)." (Stăniloae 1993)

"If a man, even being him totally pure, had suffered for his fellow humans, his sufferance wouldn't have had into history the intensity of the sufferance of Jesus Christ, and this deficiency would have been aggravated even more by the fact that it wouldn't have been capable to put the basis of an efficient sufferance either into heavens. Neither on earth, nor into heaven, a pure human being, would have been able of a sufferance capable to melt down the sin from the people and to expiate them in front of God." (Stăniloae 1993)

"It was needed a man who not to be a sinner, for his sacrifice to be clean. Such a man, though, if he had been born out of the natural enchaining of the generations, he would have had to arrive to the state of purity through a clean sacrifice, which he couldn't have been brought, because of being a sinner. And if he had been created by God in purity, his sacrifice wouldn't have redeemed but, maybe, the offense of a single man." (Stăniloae 1993)

"It was needed a man untouched by sin, of whose clean sacrifice to give God satisfaction for the unrighteousness of all the people, for He was disregarded by everybody. The solidarity and the community of nature between people make that every individual bears the sinfulness of the entire humanity.

Thereby, even for the salvation of a single man, it was needed a sufferance which to expiate the extent of the sin which burdened the humanity. The authority of God couldn't to be satisfied by a smaller sacrifice or sufferance, as much as this authority was disregarded by a man or by some people. The ransom was needed in order to be brought on behalf of the whole mankind, or it was brought for nobody. There was no any other possibility. To suffer the equivalent to the sin from a single man, to give satisfaction for the sin from a single man, it means to suffer and to give satisfaction for the sin of the entire mankind." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Jesus being a clean man, but, in the same time, more than all the people together and even more than the supra-human hypostasis bearer of the evil, He was able to bring an expiatory sacrifice for the reestablishment of the divine majesty. Because no man is able to expiate for his sin, the salvation cannot be obtained but through substitutive sacrifice of a clean man, capable of a sufferance equivalent to the sin of the entire humanity, which is, in the same time, supra-human in size. Jesus was fulfilling the condition of such a being. It remains, though, to be elucidated, more purposefully, the following question: How could He suffer on behalf of the other and especially, how it was possible to establish a more intimate connection between His sufferance and the universal-human sin? This is necessary because of, without such a connection, it is hard to understand the expiatory and substitutive character of His sufferance. How could Jesus, namely, to feel, to live like expiation, like a punishment, His sufferance? If His sufferance was the antidote, the reward for the general-human sin, it had to be produced such a connection between them. If there hadn't existed such a connection, neither the Father would have considered His sufferance like a satisfaction for the sin of the people. The answer to this question would help us understanding how His sufferance could replace our sufferance." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The Son of God, by the fact itself that He has made Himself man, and He has accepted the responsibility for the people's sins, He engaged Himself into a burdening solidarity. The fact that He has not become a man by the will of others, but by His own will, and by the fact that He has not inherited through a natural generation the background of the hereditary sin, this does not mean that He has not entered the human solidarity of the responsibility for sin. Into a certain regard He has taken a greater responsibility than the ones who are born like human individuals without to be questioned before, by the fact that He has not protected Himself against the communication with the sinful ones, but He has firmly accepted to be like one of them. The voluntary - and not an involuntary one - origin of His human existence is not a ground for a looser connection and solidarity with the mankind, but for the voluntarily, moral, and loving character of this solidarity⁴³.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“We can use, in order to understand this profound solidarity, some expression of Father Sergei Bulgakov, though their exaggerated and unnatural character let the impression that they would comprise even the ⁴³ He was not compelled to be solidary with the miserable destiny of humanity, but though He accepted this solidarity. Without being a sinner, He accepted to bear the human sins; He accepted to be made responsible for the human sins, He accepted to live in the society of the villains who offended God and over whom hovered His anger. The German philosopher Heidegger (Sein und Zeit) considers that an essential element of the man's structure is the conscience of his throwing into world without being questioned (Geborgenheit), of throwing into his human structure, on which depends the whole complex situation which we call world. Consequently, the man feels himself thrown also in the state of responsibility towards the fellow humans and for their sins. This fact diminishes somehow his responsibility. But Jesus has not His origin into the man like a “throwing” into this situation, but into a fully voluntary act. The responsibility for the solidarity with the human destiny it is not shadowed by any circumstance. On the other hand, the bigger is that responsibility for everything human is, the more sublime the act of its establishing is. In order to be possible to somebody an assuming of the responsibility for the people in the supreme degree, through a voluntary act, he must not be forced through the sin from inside his person to a solidarity with the people. The supreme responsibility for people cannot have it but somebody who voluntarily becomes a man and voluntarily stays in this state, namely he doesn't become infected by sin. Of course, the fact that Jesus didn't become a man through a “throwing” in this state, it didn't deprive Him of an existential element of the humanity. For a consummated Son like Him, the wish of the Father to embody it is more powerful than any other force which would have thrown Him into the state of a man. Nevertheless, He voluntarily fulfilled the will of the Father (Heb. 10: 5). His embodiment is an act both free and mandatory, and in this obligation, He feels the “throwing” more powerful than any man. But maybe it is more appropriate not to nominate with the rigid and mandatory term of responsibility, the report which results between Jesus and the people from the way in which He has become man, but with the term “love” or “communion”. Unlike the sentiment of “throwing”, which is caused by the worry, by the sentiment to see yourself here into a strange world, without being asked before, the love gives you the sentiment of having been always like now, the sentiment of a presence without a beginning and without an end. This presence doesn't give you the sentiment of a nothing at the beginning and of another nothing at the end, but it gives you the sentiment of a resting in the timeless fullness of the being, into the actual communion from ever. (“Das Schon des Schon – seins in der Welt der Sorge ist ein ganz anderes Schon als das Junige des Schon – immer – gewesen – seins in der Heimat der Liebe. Dort bedeutet es das «ohnmächtige» Schon – Geworfen – sein des Daseins in die «fremde» Nichtigkeit seines Gründers, das Schon – überfallen – sein von und Gefallen – sein – in seine «Schwere», hier das Vertraut sein mit dem Dasein als liebende Wirrheit“. L. Binswanger, w. c. p. 95, 96). The love doesn't ask, dissatisfied, what is has been reached like, to the relation between you and the people whom you love. The love is the affirmation of this relation; it is the affirmation of the loved ones. Jesus didn't feel Himself thrown into a foreign place, because, of one hand, coming on earth, He was both here at “home” in the bosom of the Father, and on the other hand, He came voluntarily into the relation of love with his brothers. The fact that He came on earth out of love and He has remained in love, it explains the power which He has worked at the salvation of the people with: this is nothing else but the love. At M. Heidegger the man-worry asks himself: “Hat je Dasein als es selbst frei darüber entscheiden und wird es je darüber entscheiden können, ob es ins Dasein kommen will oder nicht?“ L. Binswanger declares that for love such a question does not exist. “Hat Liebe je danach gefragt und wird sie ja danach fragen können, ob Dasein ins Dasein kommen will oder nicht? Ist Liebe nicht die «selbstverständliche» Bejahung dieser – von ihr selbst aber nicht gestellten – Frage ob-? Anders ausgedrückt: ist sie nicht die Selbstverständlichkeit der «Geborgenheit» des Daseins ins Sein, in ihrer eigenen Sprache: Gunst oder Gnade? Bedeutet Gunst oder Gabe doch gerade das fraglose Einsen und Einigen des Daseins mit seinen Sein, den Frieden des Daseins und seine Jenseitigkeit kein Problem für die Liebe... Das bildet dafür aber den alleinigen rechtmäßigen Zugang zur Einheit von Ich und Du, zur liebenden Wirrheit“ (p. 609-610).

idea of a real participation of the nature of Jesus Christ to the human sin, a thing which we completely reject. "Christ receives upon Him the sin of the World and He lives it like His, to the end... Into the depth of the embodiment, which, through the impropriation of the human nature, it is the identification of the Son to the whole mankind, and there it stays also the impropriation of the sin and of the sins, by receiving them like His. The humanity is tied not only through the cyclic solidarity into good, but also into sin; all the people are guilty not only for themselves, but for all them and into all of them and with all of them. Though this conscience escapes our sight into a concrete way, it could be comprised into the conscience of the New Adam..." This self-identification of Jesus to the mankind, which stays at the basis of the doctrine of the redemption, it forces us to literally understand - and not metaphorically - is word from the final Judgment: "(Mt. 25: 40) (...) Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me". (Stăniloae 1993)

"This identification, on the basis of which the human nature of Christ is tied with the nature of all the people, it extends the human life of Jesus into all the human history... What must be understood this general connection like: like being external, empirical, or like being internal, meta-empirical? The first kind is, obviously, excluded by the fact that Christ lived a human individual life, a determined one, and, in the same time, a life limited in space and time. Therefore, it is an internal connection and it is done through the fact that the human life of Jesus, in all the temporal acts and moments, had also a supra-temporal persistent meaning." (Stăniloae 1993)

"If the deep connection between people shows us the possibility of an assumption of the responsibility for the sins of the others, how comes that Jesus has taken upon Him all the responsibility for them, so people to be liberated by guilt on the basis of His sacrifice? Between people we meet often the case of participation to life of others, but are we meeting there the assumption of the entire guilt and the liberation of the ones from under her? Analyzing the state of spirit of the one who, drove by a great love, feels responsible himself for the sin of the other, we are surprising without any difficulty in it the dominant tendency to totally escape that individual from under the guilt and from under the punishment which is expecting him. The will of the assumption of the sin of the other has a radical and total character; she cannot reconcile with the thought to let also to that individual a part of guilt and sufferance. As bigger is the love towards the ones close to us, as much manifests more decisively the will of total assumption of their guilt. Jesus Christ, tied by all people through the limitless love of His godhead, could take the responsibility for the entire guilt of everybody. What manifests like a tendency in the imperfect love of the people towards the ones deficiently close to them, must be a fact for the perfect love of God becoming even closer by all people in a supreme way. By making Himself man, by making for the second time the hypostasis of the same human nature which is worn by all the human subjects, through the mediation of His nature, He wore in a certain way all the mankind like a subject of it. Every human self he/she bears, in a certain sense, the human nature, actualized in all the human hypostases, but in a passive way. He lacks the love which to actively call upon him everything that is burdening the actualized human nature in countless hypostases. Each man bears the responsibility for the entire fund of sin from within the human nature, but not a responsibility which he voluntarily assumes, but a responsibility which he speaks against, and he pushes it over others.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Thus, one can say that the closeness Jesus has placed Himself towards the people it was right the closeness to this intimacy of the people, which doesn’t have of it no longer has in it the impulse towards sin, but it but it feels the responsibility and the pain for it. What Christ absorbed from the people through His sin, it was, so, this pained responsibility. Jesus has taken upon Him, for the whole mankind, the role of the intimacy from within each man, the role of an interior center, of pristine moral sensitiveness, vibrating of responsibility for the sin of everybody.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The humanity of Jesus was not substantially different from the one of the other people. But it has stayed on the highest level of moral sensitiveness, a responsible and loving one. The humanity of Jesus showed in the supreme degree these noble and essential features of the man’s structure. If somebody possesses or he liberates in himself, in certain measure, these features, he will descend into the intimacy of the people and he will make possible that communication from self to self, by taking, on one hand, from his fellow human, everything that burdens him and, by this, easing him, and on the other hand, by transmitting him everything he has good and noble” – Jesus, by possessing these features in such a measure that we cannot imagine, He descended, in fact, deeper than anybody, into the intimacy of people, taking from them their burden. (Stăniloae 1993)

“But what is accomplished only partially through the voluntary participation of a man to the responsibility of the another, it is integrally accomplished through the Man Who is also God. The limitless love of Jesus towards his fellow humans it makes Him, actually, the intimate center of the human nature actualized in countless hypostases, it makes Him the profound Intimate of each man, capable of taking from everybody’s shoulders the burden of the sin. The problem of Jesus and of His reports with the people it is the problem of the greatest mysterious possibilities which are hidden into the spiritual life of the humanity. Jesus unveils to us, He indicates us the true being of the mankind, the direction which it must be accomplished in⁴⁴. Not spatially, not materially, is Jesus the center of the mankind, but by the deepening to the ultimate intensity of love, responsibility and purity. These ones constitute the conditions which make possible the saving work of Jesus, the assuming of the guilt of the entire mankind and the sufferance for it. Like we saw in another place, these features of the humanity of Jesus they aren't in a contradiction with His eternal essentiality, but there is a correspondence between them. The perfect mankind of Jesus, like maximum love and responsibility in the cycle of the human nature, it is not but the created correspondence of His divine essentiality; it is not but the orientation of this essentiality towards people, its placing in report with these ones. Jesus Christ is not but the transposition in human image of the divine person of the Son of God, and the human face in its true being is the most adequate manifestation, seen and close, of the divinity of the Son. The Son of God, like a model and a like deep and dynamic center of the true humanity, by embodying Himself, He awakened into man the conscience about His closeness, and He proved His kinship with the man. Where it was before an imperceptible center, and abstract and unknown by man center, through embodiment it has been concretized, and He has made the man to realize about this approach, in order to be able to benefit of it. Before that, the man realized only vaguely about his being. The model, though it was in the center of the mankind, He was hidden. The light was hidden into darkness. "(Jn. 1: 10) He was in the world, and the world was made by Him, and the world knew Him not". And, because the man didn't recognize Him - the model of the man's true being - the man didn't know himself." (Stăniloae 1993)

"In intimate human form and closeness, Jesus descended His limitless love and divine self-obligation, the only love capable of taking upon itself the supra-human responsibility for the whole sin of the mankind, a responsibility which was bigger than the mankind's powers of bearing it." (Stăniloae 1993)

44 D. A. SCHLATTER says in "Das Dogma und das Kreuz", Zweite Auflage, Gütersloh, 1913: „Die Christologie und die Anthropologie sind einander unentbehrlich. Wir verstehen Jesus Weg nicht, es sei denn, wir verstehen uns selbst und verstehen und nicht, es sei denn wir verstehen ihn. Eins beleuchtet hier das andere. Das Menschsein heißt, gibt uns den Schlüssel zu dem, was an ihm sichtbar wird, bringt in unser eigenes Bewusstsein das Licht und löst uns das Rätsel des Menschseins auf“.

“Actually, the identification of Jesus - through the unity of nature, but, especially, through personal love - to the profound intimacy of the mankind, it had at the beginning only a subjective character. Without the personal intimacy of people to be awakened, He placed Himself in the situation of the one who is in report with it, in the state of the one who is experiencing the love, the responsibility, the communication with the intimacy of everybody. He was at the door, ready to enter, ready to embrace anyone who was awaken and who opened. Objectively, the closeness it was accomplished. Objectively, He felt Himself burdened by all the responsibility for the sins of the people. His love shows its limitless intensity also in the fact that, without being the state of communion between Him and people produced from both sides - which increases the impetus of assuming of the foreign responsibility - He found in it the power to live the assuming of this guilt, which is an experience of untold tenderness and closeness to the other one.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Christ could show Himself to the Father like a bearer of the entire guilt of the people; even if those ones, they didn’t realize the intimate closeness of the God-the Man to themselves and the assuming of their guilt by Him. And, because they did not realize it, they did not make the closeness of Jesus to them to be a subjective closeness too, and the guilt remained upon them, though the guilt was wholly upon Him and He was suffering for it. Objectively, their guilt was assumed by Jesus and, for that guilt, He has started giving satisfaction to God, but, subjectively, they did not know and they did not recognize this fact, they did not want to give away their responsibility, they kept it upon them and the responsibility has this character too, after it is assumed by many, it stretches upon all of them. Until the intimacy of the man is not awakened at the intimate call of Jesus, the man doesn’t realize the supra-natural, the overwhelming love of Jesus and, so, the man doesn’t experience the confidence in the insurance he is given that Jesus has assumed the full responsibility for the sins of the man. Only when you have experienced the full love of a fellow human, only then you have experienced, also, the relieve you are given by the insurance that He has taken the responsibility for your sins. And the love of Jesus, who assumed the responsibility for the guilt of the people, it was fully manifested in death. That’s why, it was established that the opening of the intimacy of the man at the calling of His love to be done only after the death of Jesus, namely when His love presenting itself with the supreme proof of its greatness. There are three spiritual phases which the man crosses through, in report with the responsibility for his sins: in the first one, his intimacy being fully drowned into the darkness of the sins, he doesn’t feel any guilt for them; in the second one, his intimacy, waking itself up from this state of spiritual insensitiveness, it experiences the conscience of the guilt; finally, in the third one, his intimacy, by being in front of the love of Jesus, Who assures the man of the assuming of his guilt, the man experiences the liberation from that guilt. The second phase, which is produced into man through the fact that God has manifested in a certain way His presence at a certain distance, it is an effect of the preparatory divine grace. The third phase is the result of the communion accomplished between Jesus and the intimacy of the man. Now the man feels that the guilt does not stay only upon him, because Jesus has removed it. If only the endless love of God, descended through embodiment in the front of the intimacy of every man, it can assume in a real manner the guilt for their sins, likewise, only the answer of the man to this love, through trust, it can set the man free from it. Through the fact that Jesus feels the whole closeness to each man, He can really take the responsibility for the sin. But the man also must feel the closeness to Jesus, to reach the conscience of his responsibility for the sin, and then to let it, confidently, on His shoulders.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The responsibility for sin, responsibility which Jesus has taken, it was not only a subjective state, but the Father also regarded his like being responsible. We have seen that the responsibility for sin it can be multiplied and assumed by many persons, even if only one has sinned. Through the simple personal will to become responsible for the sin of somebody, you have attracted the responsibility for that sin. The participation to the responsibility or its assuming, it is not obtained only through the participation to the sin, but also through the decision to participate to responsibility or to assume it. It couldn’t be thrown on your shoulders by the will of somebody else, if you have not sinned, but you can attract it through your own will. The origin of the assuming of a responsibility for the foreign sin it is of ethical character, it is the highest expression of our ethical being, of our wish to help the other one, and to sacrifice ourselves for him. This supreme impulse of our ethical being it has a so-called creative force: it establishes not only subjectively, but also objectively, ontologically, like relation with God, our responsibility for the sin of the other one.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The creator power of objective responsibility of the decision of assuming the responsibility, it is also explained, in case of Jesus and of the hereditary sin, through the unity of the human nature. The entire human nature attracted the godlike “anger”, it became the object of the reaction of the divine majesty and of moral order. God didn’t artificially undo the wires which were tying the nature of a hypostasis on the whole human nature. Jesus, through embodiment, He has placed Him voluntarily like a morsel in the whole over which was hovering the godlike “anger”.

But if these considerations can help somehow the explanation of the objective character of the responsibility of Jesus for the human sin, it remains to try to understand forward, how it was possible to concentrate upon Him the whole sufferance like a consequence of this responsibility.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The painful living of the responsibility for sin, itself, it is also a divine punishment, not having only a subjective character, but also an objective one. It is produced by the free will of Jesus, but also by God’s deed, Who, by ordering the things like so, He gave the act of the assuming of the responsibility a profound ethical gravity and signification. Jesus felt the responsibility for the entire sin of the mankind, like a dreadful pain, sent in the same time by God. The assuming and the bearing of the responsibility for the sin of the mankind it wasn’t to Him only a gesture and a theatrical play, but it was a continuous and quiet moaning under this burden. He had to feel the huge offense that was brought to God by the whole mankind, like His own deed, and He also felt like being His state, the state of perdition which the entire mankind fell into. Only His sensitiveness which, on one hand, it had the human vibration, and on the other hand, it had the resources of intensity which the godhead gave Him, He experienced this pain into a measure equivalent to the entire human sin. By making Himself responsible for the offence brought by the entire mankind, He felt Himself also as hold accountable, by God. Decided to be hold responsible for all the offense brought to God, He endured to see God regarding Him as such and being set, consequently, a distance of a spiritual order. Without being a sinner, by the fact that He has made himself man and He has taken upon Him the entire responsibility of the mankind, all the sins were staying crowded upon Him, not like being done by Him, but hanging on the responsibility which He has assumed.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“In this way, by being dressed in a real way with the human sin, which is so hated by God, and by having to endure the death, it is explicable the distance which Jesus felt that was instituted between the Father and Him. Here is where it made its apparition, the great and fearful mystery of Jesus “forsaking” by the Father. His eternal happiness being the loving intimacy with the Father, and the love of the Father towards Him, the greatest pain was produced to Him by this spiritual distance on which, like the one burdened with the human sin, He must feel it. The sufferance He bore for the sin, it hurt Him only because it was the expression of the distance the Father put between Himself and Him. To the beloved Son of the Father, this distance is unspeakable more painful than to a man who feels that God left him. These are the dreadful torments endured by Jesus in that night from Gethsemane Garden, and which are reckoned by some theologians more dreadful than the torments of the physical death, and considered like anticipation into the spirit of the death on Golgotha (Bulgakov, c. w.).” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Who could dare to analyze in what it consisted, like a state of spirit in Jesus, and in its objectivity, this forsaking by the Father, which Jesus felt like a pain which exceeds all the pain of the people?” (Stăniloae 1993)

“In which concerns its objective aspect, we believe that we can ascertain that it has a dialectic character. The “forsaking” of Jesus done by the Father, it is a leaving which relates, actually, to the sin He bears, not to Him personally, though the punishment of the sin must be felt by the person.

This is a forsaking and a love in the same time, both for the shown reason and for the act of Jesus of assuming a foreign sin it is an act of supreme ethical value, and the fulfillment of this act it is in the same time a fulfillment of the will of the Father, an obedience of Jesus.

The Father forsook Jesus, but He forsook Him grieved and this pain is the expression of His love. He let Jesus to suffer for the sin which is not His, but this sufferance hurts Him also. Bulgakov is right when he says that the Gethsemane’s sad night is of the entire Holy Trinity (p. 383).

His humanity, forsaken by God and left to suffer for sin, felt finished, in the Gethsemane’s night, and in blood sweating shouted out towards the Father: “If is possible, let this cup pass away from me!”⁴⁵.

45 Without being too different from the affirmations developed by us, Romano Guardini sees the pain of Jesus from the Gethsemane’s night: a) on one hand, like coming from the knowledge He had about the profound decadence and perdition of the mankind; b) “All the others are blind; only He sees. He sees the radical perdition of the man... with His human spirit possesses this knowledge. With His heart He feels the perdition and the perdition, even if it cannot snatch the eternal God from His happiness, it becomes into the soul of Jesus an unimaginable sufferance. It manifests in all He does... For this reason is Jesus so lonely”. c) “Who could know how God—the Father showed Himself to Jesus, then (in Gethsemane)? He continued to be His Father, of course, and He also continued the conveying of His infinite love towards the Son, that love which is the Holy Ghost; although, once appeared a moment, which is explained by the word: «(Mt. 27: 46) (...)My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?». If we do not want rather to keep quiet in front of this word, we must say that, on that moment, the Father presented Himself to the Son, so that, the Son experienced that He is the thrown and repudiated man. Jesus tasted in that hour His unity with us to the unspeakable depths. This abandonment does not start only on that moment of the cross, but before. From before, Father appeared like the One that is in report with the sinner, with the sinner of whose fate Jesus impropriated like being His. Maybe we are allowed to say that in the Gethsemane’s hour that knowledge about the guilt and about the perdition of the man, it raised towards the face of the Father - Who started to «forsaken» Jesus - with its ultimate intensity. On that hour, that knowledge and sufferance took such a frightening character, so that the torment seen and the fear of Jesus, the «more insistent» prayer and the sweat, which (Lk. 22: 44) «was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground», they were nothing else but the last sign which came to us, like the storm from the surface of the ocean is the most exterior sign of a catastrophe produced on the bottom of the ocean and of which proportions exceeds our imagination power. In this consisted the hour from Gethsemane: the human heart and the human

The sentiment of forsaking and fear, they were possible in Jesus Christ only because His godhead retained from manifesting His strengthening power.

On how many times do we feel a great exhaustion in our physical and spiritual being, due to the pain, because we have been forsaken by everybody, though the soul is present in us with the same powers of his, without manifesting them because of a reason or another?

This doesn't mean, though, that God-the Man wasn't active through His godhead by any means. Through godhead it was upheld, in the human nature, the love towards man, in the virtue of which Jesus was enduring the torment. Just in those hours the love of God for people reached the highest intensity. We have seen in another place of this work, that the center of the godhead is the love, and that the almightiness is an irradiation of the love. But the love has many ways to manifest in, according to the targets it aims. Sometimes, the love manifests in humbleness and sufferance. But, also through this form, the love shows its power. The love in humbleness and sufferance of God-the Man, it washed away the human sin, it opened the way from God to man, and vice-versa.

spirit of Jesus exceeded in the area of the extreme existence what it meant the sin in the front of the judging and revenging God; His Father asked Him to assume this sin like His own, and, if we are allowed to express ourselves like this, He experienced the anger of the Father towards the sin, directed against Him, because He assumed this sin and, together with this, the remoteness of the Holy God, Who forsook Him" (Der Herr, Werbung Verlag, Würzburg, 1941, p. 483-484). D. Merejcovschi explains the torment from Gethsemane from the Jesus fear of death and from experiencing the divine anger. "Jesus would have been a ghost without a body, or an automat of virtues, if He hadn't feared the bodily pain and the death... Jesus is full of life like no one else and, that is why He fears the pains and the death like nobody else." "But, no matter how big would be the fear of pains and of death into the Gethsemane's agony, the metaphysical fear is infinitely bigger". And Merejcovschi cites in continuation from Calvin "Would have not been accomplished anything, if Jesus had endured only the death of the body: He had to internally feel also the roughness of the godlike judgment, to step for us in front of God's anger, and to give satisfaction to the right judgment". (Tod und Auferstehung, Leipzig, 1935, p. 196, 198). The affirmations of Merejcovschi on the internal participation of Jesus to sin, they comprise a dangerous equivocal, like many expressions of Bulgakov too, so we cannot impropriate them. Behold what he writes further on: "Al the sin, all the evil, all the curse of the world He had not only to take them upon Himself, but into Himself, in order to overcome them not only externally, but internally too, because He made Himself accomplice, in a certain way, to the sin of the world". Karl Adam expresses himself mostly in the same way: "The remoteness from God of the fallen human nature it was placed upon Him and He felt the fears as alive and unmediated, like He experienced, like the beloved Son of the Father, the existential closeness to God" (p. 327). "The specificity of the sacrifice of Jesus it consists of that He is reduced to Himself, of that He is refused the help of God from inside and from outside, that He is given the punishments of the hereditary sin, to the frightening exclusively-natural and exclusively-human, as much in His interior distress, but also in exterior history of His sufferings. By the fact that the guilt of the humanity it culminates in that the fallen man wanted himself to be only nature, on the Savior, who wants to give Himself like price of redemption for the guilt of the mankind, it hits Him with the whole undefeated power of the exclusively-human. Like some beasts tearing apart the powers of His earthly body, the fear and the scare penetrated also the inferior sphere of His soul and try to decompose His natural will, oriented towards sensitive, into disturbance and despair" (w. c. p. 329).

The person of Jesus concentrated in the content of his thought, the whole divine love for man, in order to step in those dreadful tribulations, towards the fulfillment of the great deed of saving the people.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Jesus, though, by having a sensitiveness not thickened through sin, and by having the experience of the full communion with the Father, He felt the infinite sorrow of the cup of the lack of communion with God. Placed into the role of the man who was stranger to God after the sin, Jesus felt the shortcoming and the insufficiency of this state like the whole humanity couldn’t have felt it.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The second reason why the torments of Jesus from Gethsemane exceeded the ones of whole mankind, it consists of the fact that He took upon Himself the whole human sin. Every man bears the whole fund of the human sin. But this is a state that the man doesn’t fully realize. No man sees in the entire depth and extent the sin he bears. On the other hand, the man’s responsibility is somewhat attenuated by the fact that he was thrown into this existence loaded by sin. Jesus, though, realizes the whole extent of the sin He bears, on the basis of His exclusive responsibility. The dreadfulness of the sin which presses on Him, it shudders Him.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“We can say that Jesus, on one hand, through His purity and through the familiarity of the communion with God, and on the other hand, through His identification in love to the responsibility for the sin of the entire mankind, He possessed a sensitiveness which was able to feel the whole pain which should have been felt by the mankind under the “anger” and the estrangement of the Father. Being God, He placed Himself so perfectly on the human line, He identified Himself so fully to the humanity, so that He could feel all the pain which should to be felt by a humanity which offended God. Only He could present how it should the mankind burn down the sin, in this regard, into the torments of an infinite regret, into the endless pain of the experience of the Father’s upset and His remoteness. His being was the oven which burned the sin of the entire world. And only in His being, full of love towards Father and towards the people, it was possible such a fire to be lit up. He concentrated in those hours the whole sensitiveness of the mankind, by bearing the expiatory sufferance for sin and the whole needed sensitiveness. It was the mankind like it should be, the mankind suffering from distance the sin has placed between people and God, and by the deep sufferance and helplessness this state caused.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Despite the whole dreadfulness of those hours, into which the fear of death, the anguish of heart caused by desert, the exhaustion of the helplessness, which were interweaved into a tormenting entirety, this state of Jesus hadn’t a reproachable character, but it was, on the other hand, what was needed for the victory upon sin, it was what God loved for the reestablishment of His authority disregarded through sin. This state was caused and dominated by the regret for the sin of the entire mankind, by the pain of His and humanity’s remoteness from God, which was not excluding that Jesus was, in the same time, into prayer towards God. Even the wish to pass from Him this cup, He didn’t try to fulfill it autonomously, but He addressed a prayer His Father, in order not to be according to His own will.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“And the Father had pleasure for of this state of Jesus, like melting down of the sin, like a humiliation and a crushing of the sin. It was a sufferance like a homage paid to God, not like a sin against Him. Suffering the torments, Jesus was fulfilling the will of the Father; His passion had the highest ethical value, by being a sufferance in the place of all the people and for the abolishment of the sin. Jesus was, so, on one hand, “forsaken” by the Father, subjected to the treatment which was deserved by the sinful mankind, but, on the other hand, He was in accord with the will of the Father, in communion with it. He was, in the same time, far and close to the Father. Just because He was close to His heart, He felt so much His remoteness. Just because He loved Him so much, He was hurt by the forsaking. Jesus felt the Father like the craftsman Manole felt about his wife, while he incorporated her into the wall of the monastery⁴⁶. Accepting to taste, in this way, to the bottom, the cup of the sufferance for the sin, without giving back, trying his abandonment by the Father, but being decided to endure it with the help of the His prayer towards the Father, Jesus has got closer with every hour to His death on Golgotha, like an accomplishment and a completion of His internal pains⁴⁷.” (Stăniloae 1993)

⁴⁶ The Romanian legend of craftsman Manole, a stone mason, says that, in order to make the wall of the Arges monastery to hold, he incorporated his own wife into the wall.

⁴⁷ Through Jesus has reached in spiritual His torments a level that has never been reached by any other human, suffering for all – and in this regard we agree with the Metropolitan Antony and with Sergei Bulgakov – through we do not think like them that the bodily death has staid like a torment a lot lower under the level of the spiritual sufferings, that they consider the true death. The spiritual torments are growing up to the moment of the expiration. Death is the culmination both of the spiritual torments, and of the bodily ones. As the bodily sufferings are growing up, the spiritual ones are growing up also. It is not possible to make a separation between them. The culminating point of the torment was not reached before, in the Gethsemane Garden, no matter what reconciled was Jesus with the cup: in fact, the cup was not fully drunk in that night. In that night has only started the impart by it. The abandonment by the Father Jesus has felt it stronger in the fact that He left Him to die also, on the cross. Then He has said the words: “My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?”.

“In the case of Jesus Christ, it is right that the death was voluntarily, while to the other people is inevitable, even if they were liberated of sin. It would be possible to say that, for the death is not necessary to His person, His death was not a part of the structure of the history. But to Jesus the whole identification to the history it has a voluntary character. He has impropriated all the acts and the passions which are necessarily related to the living into history. But it was a voluntarily identification, of an ultimate ethical nobility. It is true that Jesus could to not die, but if He hadn’t died, how would have been His mission, how would have Him played the role which He has played into history, by identifying Himself to the history? Jesus cannot be thought except like One Who had to die. His being didn’t imply the death in a necessary way, but His mission did. If His being had implied the death as necessity, His identification to the history would not have been voluntarily and His mission would not have been accomplished. Jesus had to die, not through being, but through mission. The necessity of His death went not from the involuntarily fatality of the nature, but through His supreme spiritual–ethical height. At Jesus it stands out on the first plan the will of His identification to the history, but the identification is entirely through will⁴⁸.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Christ fulfilled also the condition required by the structure of the history; but He also fulfilled the request that this act to have a character of ethical plenitude. And, as necessary, we can highlight the full identification of Jesus to the history, or the ethical fullness of His deed. Jesus was not a phantom of the history, because He could die and He actually died, but He neither was a created and naturally rolled over piece by the history, but the only being Who has totally identified Himself to the history, exclusively by will. He alone was only subject in history, even in sufferance, and by no means was Him an object.

48 “The death wasn’t to Jesus Christ inevitable, like it is to any man”, “As free of the ancestral sin, Jesus was free also of the death under the godlike punishment. But His humanity had not the positive power of the immortality, and neither Adam had it until the falling into sin. Thereby, the death of Jesus is the inevitable consequence of the enmity of the ruler of this world towards Him. But this forced death and, natural in this sense, by penetrating directly into the fullness of His life, it was all the more tormenting than any other natural death” (Bulgakov, w. c. p. 403). Speaking about the voluntarily character of the death of Jesus, we are not arguing the impassibility of His humanity. This one was capable of death, like Great Athanasius said, but, though, it was not bearing the microbe of death in it, like the people who have come into world with the ancestral sin. “In order to pay to the death His tribute, He didn’t taken from Himself, but from the others the occasion to bring His sacrifice; it was not possible to be sick, the Lord Who was healing the illnesses of the others, neither to come over His body a weakening, into which He was changing the weakness of the other into power”. Die Menschwerdung Gottes, Ausgewählt und Übertragen von L. A. Winterwyl, Leipzig, 1937, p. 71, 74.

So, He is fully into the history, but He is also fully above history. He let Himself to be ruled by history, but only because He wanted to master the history.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Referring again especially to the death, we can say that Jesus didn’t die His own death. He didn’t bear the death like a condemnation in Himself. Like He has taken it upon Himself the sin of the others. He couldn’t have taken either the sin, or the death of the others, if He had borne His own sin and if He has suffered His own death. If He had been only a man, if He had come from the enchainment from beneath of the history and He hadn’t been God and man in the same time, He couldn’t have taken the two burdens of the man upon Himself in order to liberate the man of them. The historical life is escaped of sin like a necessary stigma, for Jesus came into history from outside history. And the death loses its connection with the sin into history for the same reason, for Jesus by coming from above history, He takes the evil things of the history in order to liberate the history of them. The possibility of the fulfillment of its true destiny it is won by the history only through the descending of the Son of God into history.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Jesus took upon Himself the death of the others for He took their sin. After being committed, the sin attracts the death. And for He took the sin of everybody, He took the death of everybody.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“We have spoken about the sufferance of Jesus in the Gethsemane Garden, for the sins of all the people. Full sufferance is only that which ends in death. The profound pain for the sins of everybody and the sentiment of being forsaken by the Father, in other words the sufferance like a divine satisfaction of the godlike justice, in order to reach its ultimate degree, went all the way to death. The man Jesus, Who identified Himself to the entire humanity, over Whom was concentrated the whole human sin, He disappeared from on the plan of the life from here, and He endured the consequence of the total seen destruction in order the sin be destroyed. Into Him died the whole mankind in order the entire sin to disappear. Embodied into the order of the historical life and in solidarity with it, Christ endured the death in order to be shown that the man’s life into history must to be destroyed, that the body must be abolished, in order to be expressed the destroying fatality brought by sin. The history died in Him, escaping, in the same time, the death and the power of the sin⁴⁹.” (Stăniloae 1993)

49 It would seem that the death of each man, by being a punishment, and Jesus by representing all of us in death, He endured the death like a punishment. The death of Jesus can be considered, though, like a punishment only in a wider sense, like a consequence of the sin and that only because He stood in the place of all the

“Related to the death of Jesus are presented for being analyzed the following problems: 1) How has Him taken the death upon Himself, despite to not being a sinner, and, especially, how has Him taken the death of all the people? 2) What was His death constituted of, subjectively and objectively? 3) How has Jesus defeated the death?

The assuming of the death, of the universal-human death, it is implied in the assuming of the sins of all the people. The death of Jesus was possible, because it was possible the assuming of the foreign sins. And He could receive the death because His human nature, even if it was not bearing in itself the germ of the death, it was capable of sufferance and death.

Jesus has made Himself man in order to enter the solidarity with the mankind, on the purpose to save the mankind. So, He has taken a human nature capable to die, even without personally sinning, but through the possibility to assume the universal-human sin. Taking this sin, it was objectively producing the remoteness from God and the boldness of the people. Because this death is a personal act, and He was not guilty in fact, this death is a voluntary act of clean homage brought to God in order to counterbalance the sinful egotism of all the people. Jesus gives everything to God, including His life, because people refused to give something. The death of Jesus it is a full sacrifice, a perfect cult of God. The character of punishment of the death of Jesus it remains only like an echo, like a memory, like a faded feature, overwhelmed by its character of voluntary sacrifice. It is a punishment not because God-the Father, Himself, would bring the death upon Him, but because He let Christ to voluntarily take the painful consequences of the sin, ordered, of course, by the will of God. Only because the death reminds, by and large, about the human sin, by being the sin's consequence, also the death of Jesus was a sine qua non condition for the escaping of the people, because it should be unconditionally endured in order God to forgive the people, it can be regarded also like a payment for sin. If the death of Jesus had been a punishment for the sin in a proper sense, it wouldn't have accomplished the salvation. The death of Jesus meets the death of the mankind, of the history, and His personal death for it. The first one it means punishment, but the second one cannot be a punishment, because He in only purity. The second one it means homage, sacrifice, and love towards God. The death like punishment, to Jesus, it is in fact a punishment in abstract, a punishment of the idea of sin. In concrete, though, the One who dies, being the embodied Son of God, He in not punished, but He brings homage to the Father like a right redemption for people. Watching at the death of Jesus, we are seeing our punishment and the sacrifice of His love and purity. The punishment is ours; His is the homage brought to God. Of course, the death of Jesus must be regarded also under another aspect. Because His descending into death was a necessary condition for the death to be defeated from inside towards outside, for His human nature, passed through death in a victorious way, in order to irradiate to the whole mankind, the defeating of death's power, there is comprised a truth also into the theory of some Holy Fathers, that Jesus has surrendered from death in order to defeat death in its home. The two aspects do not stay in contradiction, but they can be regarded in a synthesis, as it has been already shown in the content of this work. Jesus, by dying, on one hand He fulfilled the godlike justice, and God didn't forgive the sin without this to be, in principle, sealed through death, and on the other hand, the sufferance to death is a spiritual power which the moral obduracy is broken through, namely the moral obduracy of the souls comprised by sin, and it is gives the human nature an ontological resistance in front of the spiritual death. Saint John Damascene wrote: “The death, by swallowing the body of the Lord, it was pierced by godhead like by a needle, like by a hook and, by tasting the immortal and life-maker body, itself has perished and has turned back everybody whom it swallowed before, for, like the appearance of the light it destroys the darkness, in the same way, through the touching of the life, it was banished the corruption the life appeared for everybody too, and there also appeared the destruction for the destroyer”. The Dogmatic, Book III, Chapter 27.

satan to approach Him. Who can decipher the mystery of the assuming of the universal-human sin, with the effects it has produced into the conscience and into the structure of the humanity of Jesus? But some effects were produced. And they opened into His humanity the gate of the death. We said before that the ethical gesture of assuming the responsibility for the others it has its heroic and grave noblesse in the fact that it modifies realities of structure and relation.

The Self of Jesus, by placing Himself where it is meant to arrive every man when he descends into his intimacy, namely, in the true center of all the subjects, in the point of everybody's sensitiveness, the nonexistence which was advancing towards them, better said, like an organic consequence of the sin, He concentrated it towards Him. Jesus has placed Himself between mankind and death, or between the core of every human being and the death, which surrounds them and penetrates them like a darkness of the nonexistence. Through sin, the initial nothingness receives again power upon the creation, following to the corruption of which this was infected, or better said, the creation started again towards the nothingness. And satan, who enjoys the futility of the God's work, he is in full work, pushing the creature towards there. The death is extinguishing, one after another, the ones who came to the existence.

But the complete extinguishing takes place only into the historical plan. Onto another plan it is kept a wreck from each spiritual being which existed, and God has established to be kept the trace of the creation like an eternal illustration of the tragic consequence of the remoteness from Him, but also like a proof that He does not want, in principle, the disappearance of what He has created. The sense of the death is that to be a punishment for the sinner man. But, if death had been the total disappearance of the man, it would have lost the sense of punishment because through it the man would have escaped the divine punishment. And, by knowing that he had escaped through death, he wouldn't have suffered either on earth of the fear of the eternal punishment⁵⁰.

Jesus, the Logos who defeated the nothingness at the creation, He has placed Himself again in front of the nothingness - this time not like a commanding subject, who scatters it away with His word, namely not like God Who isn't even for a moment the nothingness's servant, but like a man who, even if he has not personally committed any sin, he though bears the guilt of the human sins, and therefore like a victim, like an object meant to let itself to be surrounded, penetrated by nothingness. The Father let Him to be invaded by the entire nothingness, because, seeing Him identified to the human sin, the Father symbolizes, by this applying of the divine justice without any exception, the condemnation of sin of everybody. Satan pushes all the nothingness towards Him, blowing in its sails with all his adversity as much as he has against God, thorough its concentration into the hearts suffocated by hatred of the Hebrew Hierarchs and Pharisees.

50 P. Althaus, Die letzten Dinge, Gütersloh, Bertelsmann, 1933, p. 104 – 105: „Im Tode erfahren wir Gottes Gericht. Das Gericht Gottes aber trägt in sich Unendlichkeit, Ewigkeit. Wäre der leibliche Tod das endgültige Ende, dann könnten wir dem Gerichte Gottes entfliehen in den Tod hinein. Das Erlöschen des Ichs wäre ein Ausweg aus der grenzenlosen Tiefe der Not, aus der unbedingten Verzweiflung... Der Tod ist bricht das Ende des Gerichtes, sondern ein Moment desselben“.

The sensitiveness of Jesus, as big as that of all the people together, it could be deepened with thrilling into all the deepness of the nonexistence. He lived the death of everybody. The death or the nothingness being also the full absence of God and the maximum closeness of the evil one, Jesus tasted like no other man the dreadfulness of this perspective in its gradual accomplishing, until the moment of its fulfillment in death.

Let`s not forget that He suffered all the things of the death with His humanity, and not with the godhead. And this was possible because He was restraining the godhead to exercise his power⁵¹.

Only if the victory of Jesus over the death it was the supreme straining of the human nature to definitively defeat the nothingness, His victory has destroyed the power of it forever, namely He produced in this nature a force categorically superior to the nothingness, which He can communicate to every man who enters the connection with Him.

The entire power of the nothingness, revitalized through sin, it crowded itself, therefore, upon Jesus, on one hand, through an objective movement, allowed by God and agitated by Satan, and on the other hand, through a subjective movement, through the entire mankind`s sensitiveness, which Jesus had after He assumed through love of all the human sins.

But Jesus entered the report with the nothingness not like a commanding Logos, but like a man who receives it in Himself by the fact that He bears the everybody`s sins, like a man decided to let His being to receive it in all its fullness, in order to be able to defeat it entirely. His spontaneous movement towards death no longer means that Jesus came out like a commanding one, in the way of the nothingness, like in the beginning of the creation, but that He placed Himself voluntarily, like a victim, in the path of the death, in order to defeat it not from exterior, like God, but from inside it, like man.

⁵¹ K. IÜSSEN, in the w. c. p. 138, he gives from the doctrine of Hesychios from Jerusalem, referring to this point, the following quote: "The cross and the death He endured them like a helpless man, by not permitting to the angel to serve Him. He was restraining the power of His own godhead, in order to be fulfilled the prophesied mystery about the economy regarding Him".

He didn't wear in Himself the germ of the death, thereby He shouldn't have died on the basis of an organic fatality. The death came to Him because He wanted it to come.

And just because of that, in the fact that the death didn't grow up from Him, that in Him there wasn't any weakness or any illness, it stays one of the circumstances that He tasted the death more than all the people. Though He didn't die His death, His death was more frightening than everybody's. The fact that the death came to Him from outside and He went towards death spontaneously, it gave a never reached intensity to the bitter experience. Like Oskar Bauhofer observed (Das Geheimnis der Zeiten), to the other people the death is a suffering, to Jesus is a deed, being freely chosen; or, His suffering is His deed. In the state of victim, upon whom advanced the death, He is, though, a subject. The sacrifice is in the same time the sacrificer. It is the utmost high manhood to not fall, when you are a sacrifice, in the state of an object, but to keep the character of a subject so full that to commit alone the whole operation of your own sacrifice. Only Jesus could meet these two qualities in a perfect way. We are giving, bellow, the word to Oskar Bauhofer, which highlights very well the difference of the death of Jesus from the one of other people:

"The death of Jesus is not less real, it is not less dreadful and frightening, for the reason that it was freely chosen and it was His deed. A contrary. Maybe, only Jesus could endure the death in all its pure measure, only Him could be lived it, and experienced it – we are using this paradoxical word for the enduring of the death – in all the emptiness of its substance. We must admit, for internal reasons (a proof it could not be brought), that people do not fully endure the death, and much less they really experience the death. The bigger the struggle and the torment of a moribund are, the more the pain overwhelms itself and it quenches through itself. This is a merciful order from God... because we are not capable to endure the dreadfulness of the death. The death is placed on our shoulder, but actually we do not meet the death... We, the people, are falling under the power of the death, the death knocks us down to the ground. Christ, though, He stepped in front of the death, He met the death per se. He wasn't knocked down to the ground and He wasn't laid on the ground, by death. He died upraised. This is the cross... The senses and the soul of Christ weren't - in this suffering - darkened and disturbed, but, if we can say so, they were kept in maximum awakening and capacity of sufferance"⁵².

But, let's not forget even for a moment that Jesus didn't stay in this watchfulness like the one who fights the death, trying to banish the death away, and to get rid of death. He is not a subject who fights the death, but a subject who endures the death, a subject in a role of an object, of a victim, of a sacrifice. If He wanted to defeat the nothingness through activism, He would work like Logos, but in such a case He would not save the man on the inside. By placing Himself like a man in report with His death, He behaved like a man who bears upon him the sin, and He didn't want to multiply it by refusing the sanction, but He wanted to expiate it by voluntarily receiving the death. Though He didn't commit any personal sin, His death was the only one endured in the most possible voluntary way. If the death had defeated Him while fighting it, it would have been easier to Him to endure the death. In the middle of the activism, the sensitivity gets a little blunt. On the other hand, if He had fought the death, and though He had died, the death would have been stronger than Him. And if He had defeated the death, and He hadn't died, then He would have not endured all the condemnation for the sins and He wouldn't have tasted to the end the sufferance and this victory wouldn't have been actually a victory, because it isn't possible to speak about victory over the death until the death has not become a reality.

⁵² W. c. p. 106-107. Moberly says: "Let's remember, in the light of the familiar experience, that in the person of Jesus from Nazareth, like the harmony of the bodily life it was unique in its perfection, likewise the sensitiveness in report with the sufferance and the humiliation under helplessness, they were unique" (p. 114).

Through the man the nothingness received again power over the Universe; through the man the nothingness must be defeated. Through the man the creation became extremely weak and vulnerable towards the nothingness or it received an unrestrained inclination towards nothingness. Through the man and into the man there should be reconfirmed the nature into existence, it should be made again firm and resilient in front of nothingness, and it should be healed of weakness and of the inclination towards the nothingness. But this strength the man should gain it by confronting the nothingness, in the whole force it has.

The simple man, though, he would not be able to defeat the nothingness. In front of it, there must stay the Logos like man, in order to save the man. Like man, to be in the attitude of receiving the death in all its power, and not by removing it from distance, but like a man worn by the Logos, for having the power to endure it in such a way than to defeat it.

It seems that we stay here in front of the greatest paradox: Jesus should endure the death, for, on one hand, to taste the sufferance to the end and to give Himself wholly to God, for counterbalancing the worldly egotism and for satisfying the divine justice, and, on the other hand, to strengthen from inside the human nature in report with the death by fully enduring it. Consequently, it seems that He should receive a victory of death over Him, in order to gain His own victory over death. Is His death a victory over the death and a victory of the death in the same time?

We said that the death is, on one hand, a maximum surrounding through the nothingness driven by the evil one, and, on the other hand, a forsaking from God's part, a cutting off the connection of the created life with God.

They are two aspects of the same reality. But no man, while dying, he fully looks at this terrifying event. "The essentiality of the death, like sum and existential fulfillment of estrangement from God and of being forsaken by Him, it is not possible to be experienced in man, in its purity". Christ, though, He lived this dreadfulness of death to its very end. His shout: "My God, My God, why have you forsaken me?" it is not only a physical reaction, but it is the expression of the full sight of this abyss of the death, like only Christ could experience and endure. Only He endured the death to its final limit, the death by excellence (Bauhofer, p. 108-109). He endured it to its very end, to its expiration. Only in this way He showed the whole power to endure.

But what consisted His power over the death of, given the fact that it ended into the mortal expiration? : into the absolute surety, that the nothingness and the forsaking by God, namely the death, they didn't have the last word. Though He looked with lucidity, like no one else, at the fearsome abyss of the nothingness and of being forsaken by God, He never doubted. He lived the death in all its vastness and deepness, but He was not spiritually overwhelmed, not even for an instance, by death. He looked in death's eyes and subdues the death. The death couldn't touch His spirit. The power of the nothingness and of the forsaking by God, they were not only an object of contemplation to Jesus, but they took place with the whole their terrifying efficiency. This is the signification of the real death, of the stopping of the body functions, and of the separation of the soul from the body. The work of destroying of the historical life of Jesus through the power of the nothingness, it was so intense that even the Cosmos felt it. "(Mt. 27: 45) Now from the sixth hour there was darkness over all the land unto the ninth hour". The nature fell back into that darkness from the beginning of the world; it was on the point to be swallowed again by nothingness. The nothingness was allowed to fight the being, with the whole its power, in order the victory to be decided in fair fight. The luck was that, in the name of the being, there stepped into the arena the man with the heavenly hypostasis, receiving to fight the nothingness. And when the nothingness reached its maximum efficiency over Jesus, when He yielded the ghost, the earth was shaken, the veil was torn apart, and the stones split.

It is shown in this event both the solidarity of the Cosmos with Jesus⁵³, Who has made Himself the heart of the world, through love, and like man, 53 "The sun darkened, because of not suffering to see God mocked", Antiphon 10, voice VI, from the service of the Holy Passion from Thursday evening. The churchly songs give, mostly of the time, like a reason for this shacking of the creation in the moment of the crucifixion of God, the fear which engulfed all the creatures because of seeing the Master nailed on the cross. But, because they cannot have a personal fear, we believe that it is about a solidarity, one somehow organic, between the creation and Jesus. When He trembles because of the torment of the death, through all them it passes the cold shiver of the death. "Every creature was changed by fear, seeing You, Christ, nailed of the cross. The sun darkened and the grounds of the earth were shaken. All of them suffered together with You, the One Who has built all them".

after He was creator like Logos, but it is shown also the supreme tension of the nothingness to roll away, through Jesus, the entire Cosmos into that chaos from before creation. In fact, if had been able to defeat even Him, if neither Him like man had been able to resist the nothingness, there wouldn't have been any hope for the creation. In the name of the mankind, Jesus faced the whole pressure of the nothingness, and He endured the whole pain of the presence of the nothingness, and He gained the victory, namely a power which stretches out of Him in the whole human nature⁵⁴.

Being about the fight between the nothingness and the mankind like a spiritual entity, this fight is decided in spirit. Though it operates also through the pressure and through the extinguishing of the bodily life, the victory is won by the nothingness when it makes the spirit to kneel in the whirl of the terrible pain and sentiments of the end. Jesus experienced by the biggest pain that can be imagined and He experienced His ending gradually and the total forsaking by God. But until the moment which the conscience extinguishes in Him, He didn't hesitate in the certitude that His death will last and He will pass to the Father. "Father, into Your hands I entrust my ghost", said Christ in the vicinity of the moment which ended His life from here. And before that, He said to the thief: "Today you shall be in heaven with me". This certitude is in the same time a confidence in the Father and, likewise, the supreme homage, the supreme cult which He brought to the Father. His death was the full sacrifice like a cult brought to God⁵⁵.

In this way, His death is not accomplished like an extinguishing of the conscience, except for a moment, so much as it was necessary for its tasting to the culminant moment and for the showing of His power to the end. Its ⁵⁴ But this crisis, in which the creation is thrown for a moment, it has also a different significance. Like the death of Jesus represents the necessity of all the people to die after the sin, likewise the darkening and the shaking of the world from the moment of the crucifixion of God it shows that the will of God is not with this form of the Cosmos confused by sin, and once it will be truly passed through the catastrophe of the end. On the other hand, as the death of Jesus is not a definitive death, a death like an ultimate goal, but it is a passing through towards the revival, a means of exiting the sphere of the death in which is the life into body, in the same way the shaking on the moment of the crucifixion, which must be repeated in the life of every man, like a participation to the death of Jesus, it is followed by a surplus of life, by a rebirth even in the life from here.

⁵⁵ A. D. SCHLATTER, Jesu Gottheit und das Kreuz, p. 61 and the followings: „To die believing, it means to affirm God like God in the moment of the ceasing of the being; it means to praise His love and His gift, when everything is taken from us, even our being. This belief has a great measure and brightness, because it hasn't a seeing like a support, it is not helped by an experience, it is not possible a substantiation from the own life, because it looks exclusively towards God, and exclusively into Him it has its reason... By the fact that we collapse into nothingness without falling from God, we sanctify His name. The death like an occasion of a incomparable faith, it provides us the possibility of a divine service (Gottesdienst), which cannot be compared to anything we are doing while we live. But only to Jesus the death was a total voluntary self-giving and not only a passive one. "Upon this giving of Jesus it can be applied, without any diminishing, the notion of «cult», of «sacrifice». Only into His self giving of towards the Father, the idea of sacrifice reaches its full reality. In the passiveness of the resignation, it still doesn't exist any cult. This is a deed... The sacrifice is the gift given by God." (p. 67) culmination coincides to the victory over it. Not touching His spirit, not weakening it to Him, the syncope of the conscience into death it does not last and it does not go with His spirit awakened, to continue a tormented existence, like the other people do. "(Acts. 2: 27) Because thou wilt not leave my soul in hell".

Jesus rises up immediately from the moment of the extinguishing of His historical life into the life of on the other plan of existence. The death is defeated on the moment which it thought that it has won, "(Acts. 2: 24) (...) because it was not possible that he should be held of it."

The death of Jesus meant, thereby, the victory over the death⁵⁶." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The sufferance of Jesus, by coming from the gradual extinguishing of His historical human life, it should go to the end in order to melt down the human sin into the human life. The divine justice allowed His historical life to be destroyed through death, because of His life represented the historical life of the humanity. Only in this way it was possible to be shown the condemnation and the abolition of the sin, because it was destroyed the person who accumulated it upon Himself.

⁵⁶ The philosopher Martin Heidegger, in his famous analysis of the human being, he has reduced the core of the human being to "worry". Through worry, the man is always before himself, to the future possibilities. But the most characteristic possibility, the absolutely inevitable possibility, is the death. The thought at death it makes the man to gather himself into his ultimate intimacy. This thought makes him to be in a state of continuous reconciliation with the death (die vorlaufende Entschlossenheit). Through this assertive state of reconciliation, of the man detaches himself from the merging into mass, gaining his own intimacy of rough singularizing. But out of all this, like Binswanger observed, it turns out that state of intimacy is determined by the flickering of the nothingness and, at its turn, it is the point which gives the clearest perspective over the nothingness from the end. The man, like "worry" it is surrounded on all the parts by nothingness ("Die Sorge ist in ihren Wegen durch von Nichtigkeit durchsetzt". (Sein und Zeit, p. 285). And Binswanger, w. c. p. 139 says: "... ist ersichtlich, von wo aus Heidegger das Sein negiert und den Sein der Nichtigkeit bestimmt: vom eigentlichen Selbstsein aus. Dieses ist das positive, von dem aus das ihm Entgegengesetzte sich als Nichtigkeit erweist."). Binswanger shows though, that the man-worry, who in the better case reaches the consequent line to the man who lives in the center of his intimacy, it is not found but like a case almost ill, of egotism. More or less, the man is also love. And the love provides its intimacy too. In love, though, the man is no longer obsessed with death; he does not care of it anymore, because he is no longer alone. In these findings is content, we think, the germ of an understanding of the substitutive death of Jesus Christ, like also of His personal victory over death. Jesus places Himself in the middle of a mankind weakened to death by the thought to the death, because of the egotistic grinding. He found Himself, amongst people who were in this state, also alone. His loneliness, of course, it was a voluntary one, because voluntarily He made Himself man, by descending into the wilderness among the people thickened into egotistic and worried monads. This loneliness intensified around Him in Gethsemane Garden, when He found out how little He can lean on the man. The loneliness produces the sadness into soul and it opens to the death the gate into the human nature. His loneliness, like forerunner of the death, Jesus didn't feel it because of the sin, of His egotism, but because of the sin of the people. The loneliness like a point of meeting eye to eye with the death, it made Him to see the death, to be shaken by death, but not permanently, because the death was not growing from inside Him, except in the Gethsemane Garden, until He inwardly defeated, through His restless love for people, the discouragement of the loneliness. He defeated the loneliness thickened around Him by all the people, through the love which was though able to pass through death for them, also pulling them off from the loneliness. He didn't feel the nothingness surrounding Him but for an instant, for it was not into Him the sin like cause of isolation and like cause of the fear of death. He was full of love and surrounded into the love of the Father, Who sent Him into world and Who was waiting for Him at the end of His earthly life. And the love, like a surety of the existence, it defeats the fear and it defeats the death.

But any other man, who bears the sin upon him, he bears it like a perpetrator, he is sinful like subject, like source of last self-determination of him. So, the death, by not being but the consequence of the sin, it grows up to any other man from the human subject himself, who is gradually weakened and who succumbs grinded by it, and not having the power to confront it, to resist it. Jesus, though He was identified to the sin of all the people, He was not, though, the perpetrator of the sin. The sin was coming over Him from outside; the sin was not springing from inside Him. It is different when you bear something, from when that something is springing from inside you. In the first case, it is kept a certain distinction between your subject, like the last source of your own existence, and that something that you are bearing. The sin that was not sprung from the deepness of the subject of Jesus, it was not fructifying there the gradual weakening which leads to death. The death came upon Him from outside, like the sin had been done too. So, it is explainable why His subject kept the vigor for confronting the death, and He didn't fall, weakened, under the death, what would have meant in the first place a moral weakening, a hesitation of the confidence⁵⁷. Upon the One without personal sin, the death has not a power of a definitive swallowing, no matter how totally the death would have concentrated upon Him. This was the situation of Jesus. The death surrounded Him and conquered Him like an object. But, also in the last moment of the death passing upon Him, Jesus did not fall inside from the state of a subject, He did not renounce to be a subject, He did not become an object, no matter how much the death tried to make Him like that. The death unfolded all its powers, it did Him what it does to any other man, and He allowed the death objectively do everything to Himself. But He remained subject until the death set arbitrarily upon Him.

The death won in the sight, experimentally. But its victory was not real, because He didn't give up, even for a moment. The death has done everything it could, but it ended exhausted and defeated.

Thereby, He defeated the death, like man. He could defeat the death because He didn't run from death even for a moment, and He received the death without a personal sin, with full confidence in the Father. The fully voluntary receiving of the death and the lack of sin, they belong together. But, in order the man Jesus to capable of this, He had a divine hypostasis.

⁵⁷ B. STEFFEN, Das Dogma vom Kreuz, Gütersloh, 1920, p. 117: „Jesu hat nicht die Verdammnis der Sünder, sondern die Verdammnis der Sünde erfahren. So blieb seine Persönlichkeit mitten in Gericht doch selig“.

His power to win like a man all the rushing in of the nothingness, it came to Him, in the last analysis, from His divine hypostasis. His capacity to receive and to endure the death of everybody, it is one with His capacity of love, of human form but of divine proportions, towards people, which He identified Himself to, also in front of the Father, and about Whom He never doubted, not even when He was totally forsaken.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The love made Christ die; the love gave Him the victory over death. The love is the only power which the soul defeats the death through. The love sustains the undiminished life in the soul, because it keeps the soul in connection with God and with the fellow humans, and it maintains the confidence in God. While the love is in him, he does not hesitate, he does not weaken. Attributing, to the love of Jesus, the power to be defeat the death, we are not contradicting the affirmation from above, that He defeated the death through the lack of sin, because the lack of the sin is not possible without a perfect love. But, having the perfect love like a man amongst people, it meant in the same time the assuming of everybody’s sins, and to go to death for them. Through the same divine force of the love, Jesus is without sin and impoverished by the sins of everybody, He receives voluntarily the death and He defeats her. Through the same divine force of the love, Jesus is without sin and He is burdened with everybody’s sins, and He voluntarily receives the death and He defeats it.

Persevering in a not hesitating love towards the Father, though the death can arbitrarily pass upon Him, He remains, to the last moment, a full and undiminished subject. A real victory of the death over Him, it would have taken place only if He had diminished under the death pressure, if He had given and if He had allowed to be spiritually overwhelmed.

Though, the arbitrary passing of the death over Him, it brought Him to the state of ceasing the bodily functions and of ceasing the conscience. But that took place unjustly. It was not a legitimate victory of the death. That is why “(Acts. 2: 24) Whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death: because it was not possible that he should be held by it.”” (Stăniloae 1993)

“In what sense must we understand that, through the victory upon the death, the death was crushed for all the people? Oskar Bauhofer speaks about a metaphysical power of the death, which Jesus has broken, because He lived it, inside Him, to the end. “From the enduring of the death in its entirety, it follows directly that, through this, the death’s power was defeated... The death, lived in its plenitude by Christ, it is one with the victory over the metaphysical power of the death” (p. 109). Somehow, the whole death has exhausted in itself while trying to get Christ under its control and in the His victory upon it. This idea is characteristic especially to the Holy Greek Fathers.

But the death must not be understood like a self-standing reality, which can be defeated into a huge clashing, so that it can't come again upon the people.

The death is the expression of a relation which three factors enter: God, the man, and the satanic force of the evil⁵⁸. The death means the final end of a progressive weakness of the man, in the first place in his spiritual being, and then bodily. But this weakness is organically tied to the sin and the sin is the remoteness from God, Who is the spring of life. In the same time, this remoteness is a closeness to the personal and satanic source of the evil, or it is caused also through an attraction of that one.

The escaping of the human nature from death, it is not obtained through a victory over the death taken like a self-standing dragon, neither through a hardening of this nature taken in itself, but through the definitive consolidation of the human nature into the closeness of God and into the remoteness from the evil one, by removing of the sin.

After the victory of Christ over the death, the man, who enters, through faith, the range of His power, he no longer dies, for, on one hand, through the sacrifice of Christ, the universal sin received the fatal blow and His humanity has gain the supremacy over the death, and on the other hand, for, on the basis of a new connection, a tighter one, between Himself and the mankind, on the basis of the love emerged from Him and of the faith awakened to the people through His resurrection, the state of supremacy over death, accomplished into the humanity of Christ, it is conveyed to the people too. Not through a simple changing of juridical report between God and man, the man doesn't die anymore, but through the creation of a new power into the mankind, on the basis of the victory of Jesus over the death. But we must not forget that this new situation was accomplished by the will of God, together with the fulfillment of the moral law. The new power into the mankind it consists of the intimate closeness to God, through Jesus Christ. The victory over the "metaphysical power" of the death, it is actually a victory of the spirit into man, through the Ghost of Jesus, a metaphysical-spiritual strengthening of the human nature, the winning of indestructibility through spiritual communion with the humanity of Christ.

58 B. STEFFEN, W. C. P. 114: "Man ist heute so sehr bemüht die «dingliche» Versöhnungslehre zu überwinden. Da soll man auch den Mut haben den persönlichen Feind Jesu beim rechten Namen Zu nennen, anstatt ihn auf das Dingliche zu reduzieren... Wehen unsre Zeit «den Bösen» durch «das Böse» zu ersetzen bestrebt ist, dann wird sie der Realität des Bösen einfach nicht gereicht. Mit dem unpersönlichen Bösen lässt sich spielen, mit dem persönlichen nicht. Das Unpersönliche kann beiseite geschoben oder idealistisch in ein Michls aufgelöst werden, das Persönliche dagegen besitzt irrationale Tatsächlichkeit. Mit dem Unpersönlichen wird man schnell fertig, sobald man sich auf die eigene Persönlichkeit und ihre Überlegenheit über alles Unpersönliche besonnen hat; das persönliche Böse dagegen Tritt unserer Persönlichkeit bestimmend gegenüber und kann sie in eine Knechtschaft zwingen, an die unsre Persönlichkeit einfach zugrunde gehen kann".

Why couldn't have taken place this closeness – one defeating of sin and of death - between people and Christ, before His death?

Because, like we already highlighted, it was necessary a sufferance which to produce a shaking from its basis, of the human thickened nature, a shaking imposed by the ontological laws, by the divine order, and passed into the being of every man when he comes close to Christ Who died for him. It was necessary a death which to be equivalent to their death, lived also by them in the whole its potential, without, though, to abolish them. But, through the same death, through which it was “satisfied” an ontological necessity indicated by the divine being and established by the divine will at the creation, it was produced into the humanity of Jesus Christ that new factor which to create between Him and people that closeness victorious upon death, or, in the frame of this closeness existing also through His embodiment, the power of this victory. The sacrifice of Jesus it was, through the satisfying itself, of an ontological order, of mortal “shaking”, but though, a “creator again” of the decay creation, the supreme revealing of the fire of the divine love, which has thawed the consciences under its blaze. And the resurrection created into people the basis of the faith for their awakened love towards Jesus Christ-God, through His sacrifice. Like the sufferance to death was necessary for the humanity of Jesus to gain the victory upon death, likewise the “mortal” shaking of the man, occasioned by the sacrifice of Christ, it was necessary in order to him be able to receive the victorious upon death power, from Christ, the resurrected One.

These phenomena and the arguments derived out of them, for the immortality of the soul, they give us, though, if they are looked at thoroughly, an answer also to the question about the power which the Resurrected Jesus gives it to all people who believe in Him, for their victory over death, a power which means, in fact, the victory of the Savior over the metaphysical root of the death. In the first place, we must observe that the narrowing of the spiritual life is not due only to the body, but also to the causes of moral order. There are people in the heads of whom there cannot entered any admitting of some realities and spiritual mysteries, because they are dominated by a passionate stubbornness. To the others, those mysteries are quite obvious. The love and the forbearance towards the other, they multiply in an overwhelming measure their knowledge. This means, even if their body disappears, like one of the impediments to the full actualization of our spirit, it doesn't disappear also the shell of moral nature, the life of the soul, after death, it doesn't reach the entire amplitude, which is given in its virtuality. And the removal of this moral shell cannot be produced through an arbitrary external act, but only through the will of the man, who in the moment of his death he can no longer manifest himself and, so, if the man hasn't got rid of before his death, it will compel him after the detachment from his body. No matter how vast had been the range of knowledge, of judgments, of memories and sentiments, on which, not being able to actualize the man in this life, he would have been unfolded in the future one, it will bear in each individual a different seal, similar to the one which his spiritual life wore while it was into body. At one, the whole this life moves on the surface, it is vast, but shallow. To some domains of spiritual order, the man who is like that, he manifests a categorical incapacity. Another man tastes, incompletely, but so far satisfactorily, even from here, the joy of some knowledge, intuitions, and understanding, which refer to realities from above the category of the matter, space, and geometrically thinking reason. The difference is due to some causes of moral order. Thereby, who leaves this life with the burden of the sin, with the entire exit from the walls of the body, he won't experience but only of an extensive widening of his spiritual life, essentially identical to the one from here, but not also a penetration onto a superior plan, a spiritual one. His soul has died since He still was in this life and the bodily death won't liberate him of this spiritual death, but, on one hand, he will finalize it, and, on the other hand, by no longer existing the body, which to find some joys into sin, he will make it more tormenting." (Stăniloae 1993)

"To the eruption of His spirit into an incomparably ampler a much happier life, he cannot be partaker but the one who left from here without sin, and who, consequently, communicated while still in the body, in a certain way, with the realities according to the spirit. The first one Who left from here without any sin, and the only one Who hadn't any trace of sin, was Jesus Christ. His life from here was not narrowed by body, neither by sin. That is why, immediately that He escaped the body, the powers of His spirit – we are talking here about the human spirit – gushed in deepness and vastness into a measure which we cannot even imagine. Thereby, His death was, in the same time, the supreme sufferance for the human sin, and also the only one gate through which entered the life of full greatness, the life in the Johannine meaning of the word. The moment of the death coincides to the moment of the outbreak of His full life.

Now it becomes clear the answer to the question of how Jesus defeated, through His death, the metaphysical power of the death, in the other words, how has He transmitted, after His death, power to all the people who believe in Him, in order to defeat the death. The indestructibility of the human nature it cannot be explained except through a communication of it with a human nature which has raised itself upon the history, untouched by death, and it is near to the transcendent spring of the divine, eternal, and fresh life.

But this answer stays in connection also with the Resurrection of Jesus, which is preceded by His descent to hell.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The royal dignity of Jesus Christ has manifested also while He lived the earthly life, through the authority which was emanating from Him, through the wonders He did and through the acts of power through which He gave forgiveness of the sins or through which He established the future organization of His church. But, in a principal way, this divinity manifested into the victory over the death, through the descent to hell, and into resurrection, in the placing of Himself on the right side of the Father, from where He directs the work of salvation, and in the final judgment.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“We do not know, in a clear manner, all the reasons which Jesus has descended into hell for, if He didn’t do it in order to endure the pains from there. Because the victory over death coincided to the receiving of the death, for, thereby, the resurrection like fact into deepness and into spirit it happened into the moment of the death and the death is the premise for the resurrection of the body, this resurrection with the body could have been done immediately after death. But, probably, for His death not to appear like illusory to the people, He left His body to lie in grave for three days, and meanwhile He descended with the soul into hell.

Leaving the body into grave and living for three days only through the soul, Jesus wanted to teach, on the other hand, that it is possible a spiritual life, a victorious and happy one, even without body⁵⁹. Until Him, everybody left the body and went to the tormented existence from hell, because all of them were passing the threshold of the eternity with their spirit disfigured by sin. These three days of life of Jesus, with His soul separated from His body, they form the beginning and the condition of the happy existence of the souls of the righteous, until their resurrection with the bodies. The fact itself that Jesus was the first One Who wasn’t engulfed by the torments of the hell, it constitutes a victory over the inferno⁶⁰.

⁵⁹ The arguments for the immortality of the soul, from the mentioned study of mister Ion Petrovici, it suggests, all of them, the possibility of a spiritual life without body, a lot richer and happier than the one into body.

⁶⁰ The contemporary Protestant theologians do not admit anymore an existence of the souls after death. The whole man, body and soul, he is destroyed, by having to resurrect in the doom’s day only the righteous ones. So sustains C. Stange, Das Ende aller Dinge, 1930 and Paul Althaus, Die letzten Dinge, 1933, though the last one is more reserved than the first one, and he admits also a resurrection of the unbelievers for the eternal punishment, and not only of the righteous for happiness. In the dogma of the Orthodox Church about the descending of Jesus with the human soul in hell – with the body was impossible, because the body was in the grave, and with the godhead He was everywhere – it is implied a rejection of this theory, into a double way: 1. What would have been Jesus searching for in hell, if the hell hadn’t existed like a place of unhappy living of the

The Holy Scripture and the churchly songs seem to tell us that Jesus did not stay, in the interval from His death to His resurrection, only in hell, but He went also in heaven. "(Lk. 23: 43) (...) Today shalt thou be with me in paradise." And at the Holy Liturgy, after the entrance with the gifts, the priest says: "In the grave with the body and in the heaven with the soul, like a God, into heaven with the thief and the chair you were sitting on, Christ, with the Father, and with the Holy Ghost, fulfilling everything, You, Who are boundless".

Also, from these places it would turn out that Jesus was also in heaven not like God, because like God He was everywhere every time, but like a man because while He was on the cross, He announced like something future His presence in heaven. His place like God, though it is everywhere, it is about everything, it is a place of a Master, it is "on Chair". The heaven is the happy place from after death and in it arrive only the righteous, but, anyway, it is a place for people. In heaven will be Jesus, like the one Who has in common with the thief, the humanity⁶¹.

These expressions about heaven, probably, they must be understood that in the interval while the body remained in grave, Jesus did not defeat only the inferno but He also inaugurated the happy life of the righteous ones after the death with the body. These two deeds stay, it is closely related. On the other hand, the establishment of this happy life of the people on the plan from beyond, it is the same with their escape from death.

The songs from Triode present the victory of Jesus over the hell, like a helplessness of the hell to hold Him. The hell received Him into its content, not knowing what a power hid into the One Whom it received. But, once being inside the hell, the power of Jesus has erupted in all its shininess and breaking the gates of the hell. This event has a spiritual signification, not a material one. Jesus didn't break material gates and He didn't collapse walls which surrounded a space. If it had been so, then any soul could have come out from hell, from its content, and neither the hell wouldn't have been anymore a reality to the people who die in sin, since then and into the future." (Stăniloae 1993) souls after death? 2. By staying for three days with the soul without a body, He showed also the reality of a happy existence of the faithful souls after the separation from the body.

61 H. ANDRUTSOS, by not affirming that Jesus stayed during the three days in hell, lets open the possibility that He was also in heaven (w. c. p. 230). Of course, because the heaven was still not existing when Jesus died, but only after He inaugurated it through the liberation of the souls from hell, it is explained why the teaching of the Church it does not explicitly mention the heaven related to the three days while Jesus stayed with the body into grave. Even more, because the action of Jesus in those three days it seems to be concentrated on the raising from hell the souls of the righteous and only like a result of this action it begins the heaven's life, like a final of these three days, it is very justified to speak in a accentuated manner about the descent of Him into hell and to let on the second plan, on another meaning, the idea of the heaven.

“Jesus didn’t enter in hell in order to taste this state. Not even for a moment He did belong to hell in this quality. Right from the first step He was victorious over the inferno. He didn’t experience the inferno inside Himself, and He didn’t descend with His spirit into the spirit of the hell. By stepping inside the hell, He remained somehow above the hell. If it can be said that He entered the hell, this is only for, the moment of His death consisting in the passing of the human soul on the plan of the eternity, and the eternity of the human souls not having until Him another form except the tormented one, His soul had to have attitude towards that tormented eternity in order to inaugurate the new form of the eternity. Jesus died the death of the people burdened with the ancestral sin. To the law of this death, it belongs that the soul, after the short time of the expiration, to wake up in hell, in the first moment of the existence separated from body, in order to see himself in hell, in the world of the tormented spirits.

Jesus, by obeying this death to the very end, He saw Himself, on the first moment of His existence without body, in hell. But, on the same instant, the power of His soul - unchained from the sin accumulated during the bodily existence and intensified by the union with the godhead - erupted out into a plenitude of life and, through this fact, He was not even for an instant a citizen subjected to hell, and He didn’t descend into the spiritual deficiency and into the abnormality which the ones who belong to the hell live in.

I believe that it may be said that, through the same act of eruption of His life after the separation from the body, though He defeated the death, He established also the order of the happy eternity of soul, namely the heaven. Through the same deed He defeated the hell, but He also established the heaven, though logically it precedes the reckoning with the hell or His detaching and, through this, of the souls of the righteous from hell.

But, if the things are like that, it won’t be needed to be told that any soul who goes into heaven, it firstly makes contact with the hell, in order to verify its state of purity? Partially, the Church affirms this thing in the doctrine about the judgment which is done to every soul after the separation from the body, doctrine that has found an intuitive expression in the belief about the twenty-four customs. Though, about the human souls it cannot be told in a proper sense that they make contact with the hell in order to defeat the hell, because of, on one hand, the law of the death, like punishment for the sin, and thereby like a bearer of the souls into hell, it has been removed to the righteous through the death of Jesus, and on the other hand, only Jesus defeated with His own power the force of the hell and He has established the order of the happy eternity. The believer goes, on the virtue of a new law, right into this eternity, prepared by Jesus Christ⁶². Jesus defeated the hell,

⁶² “(Jn. 14: 2) In my Father's house there are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. (Jn. 14: 3) And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also.”

in principle, and He prepared the heaven to all the ones who believe in Him. If every soul is placed after death, for a moment, between hell and heaven, the decision for heaven is not, in fact, a man's victory, but it is a victory of God, or better said, an ascertainment of the man's faith in Jesus Christ.

But to Jesus it is attributed the descent in hell also for the reason that He removed from hell the souls of the ones who died with the faith in Him, but they were kept though in solidarity with the condemned souls, on the virtue of the fact that the law of death, like passing towards the hell, it was not affirmed yet. Jesus didn't remove them through a purely exterior action, because of the faith into which they died was gave them the comforting certainty that they will escape, and gave them a power of spiritual raising which started working by itself when Jesus appeared in front of them. Though, their escaping it couldn't be done until the Savior didn't show Himself in His victorious brightness, announcing through this that the law of the universal punishment was removed. Jesus, like Savior of all the people who believed or who will believe in Him, He should go to announce also to the ones from hell, who died into faith, that they are saved, in order to bring to them the fruit of His salvation.

By and large, the teaching that Jesus descended in hell, but like a king, and not like a hierarchal, so that He remained though above the spiritual torments of the hell, perhaps it must be understood like a special closeness, of His, to the souls from there, for those ones who put in the life from here, by faith, a basis for the salvation, in order to raise at the salvation. Though the happiness of Jesus begun immediately after the expiration on the cross, unlike the believers from after Him, in His happiness He couldn't forget about the sufferings of the ones from hell, He couldn't come closer to them and to not make them everything possible to be done from His part, in order they to be saved and - if they fulfilled the condition which, they like men, they could fulfill in the earthly life.

His closeness to the souls tormented by inferno, it didn't last not only for a moment, but He insisted among them for reestablishing the full communion between Him and the souls capable of that communion, namely for their full exit from hell and consolidation in heaven. He must also give to those souls, the joy to spend more time around Him and for they to enjoy the sweetness of seeing Him. If among the people on earth He stayed for thirty, and respectively, three years, leaving after Him an important trace in their historical memory, He must stay also, among the ones who had not the joy to know Him into history, at least for three days, for they to feed out of the memory of this joy, until the final judgment. Of course, Jesus, like God, and through this, even like man, He still remained after that, towards the souls from heaven into a bigger closeness than towards the people on earth. But, though, by the fact His second coming, to the last Judgment, it will be - to the ones from heaven too - a second coming, a turning back after a long time, during which, in a certain way, He was gone, it turns out that, in a certain way, He is not fully present neither to the souls from heaven, until that day. All of these are according to the doctrine of the Orthodox Church, according to which the happiness of the soul after the separation from the body and before the final Judgment, it is not complete. Only the Roman-Catholics sustain that their soul will immediately receive the full happiness and the final Judgment will not bring anything new in this regard.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The ascent to heaven it is the elevation of the mankind of Jesus into the ultimate intimacy with the Holy Trinity and to the state of honor, power, and full sovereignty. “The dogma of the ascent comprises the idea that the glorified human nature of Christ, elevated to heaven, it has entered the very bosom of the Holy Trinity. God-the Man has sited at the right hand of the Father, and not only with His godlike nature, but also with His human one, which consists of body and soul, of the animated and spiritualized corporality”⁶³.

The Scripture and the Church give such an ultimate importance to the resurrection with the body, considering it like a true victory upon the death, then they are far away from the thought to annul it again through a teaching like the one of Bulgakov. Why would have been resurrect Christ, if He had left His body at the ascent? Bulgakov says that, by keeping that energy of the body, Jesus has not left the body through ascent, like He did through death. “This is not a separation from the body, like it happened through the death defeated by the Lord forever and ever”. But what could consist the energy of the body of, kept by the Lord through ascent, like a plus, in comparison to the human soul kept through death, soul in which was also a power of connection with the body?

The godhead without humanity it is present in another way. It is not close like saving efficiency, like accessible intimacy to our humanity, or like a power which convinces us from inside us. Otherwise, the Son of God would not have embodied Himself. Only by remaining a man, God is close to us like one of us, like a power which belongs, in the same time, to the ontological region of the mankind. By ascending like man into the bosom of the godhead, Jesus has elevated the creature, by and large, to God; He has introduced the creature in the intimacy of the Holy Trinity⁶⁴, because He remains in a communication, enhanced to the maximum, with the whole creation and with the Holy Trinity, in the bosom of Whom He has elevated His humanity; He overflows, by this, His power over the entire world.

⁶³ S. Bulgakov, w. c. p. 421.

⁶⁴ Bulgakov, p. 432.

Sergei Bulgakov has admirable pages about the closeness of Jesus Christ to the world, after resurrection. But, while He conditions this closeness to the abandonment of the body and to the keeping of an energy which Christ makes all the world a body for Himself through, we argue, listening to the teaching of the Church, that this closeness will be the more possible, the more the Lord stays in the ontological plenitude of the human nature. Through this closeness, by intimately descending into each man, He works not only from above over the people, but also from inside them, by making them a body to Himself and, into a wider meaning, by constituting His Church. Like a man puts the seal of his influence, of his person, on everything that stays close to him and on all the persons he loves, and for whom he sacrifices himself, by making them to cogitate like him, and to feel like him, and to follow him and, by this, to become a body of his, worn by his soul, Likewise Jesus - but in an incomparably greater measure, by penetrating into the intimacy of everybody, He makes them His mystical body or the Church. "The Lord masters not only from above, like God, Creator, and Providential, but also from inside us, like God-the Man, on the basis of His lack of separation from the world and this inward connection is His life into Church". "He remains united with the world, not only in a Eucharistic mode, through the mysterious eating of His Body and drinking of His Blood in the Holy Communion, but also through His power which works into the world. This is His spiritual presence into the world and His participation to the human life, not a sacramental presence, but a mysterious, spiritual, and invisible presence... This is not a pantheistic presence, a Lutheran one, but, if we may say so, an authentic pan-Christianity, a dynamic one, namely the life of Christ among people and the life of the people into Christ, in a closeness which, through its authentic intimacy, it surpasses any other closeness" (c. w. p. 426-7).

Just for Jesus has elevated, through His ascent, the humanity in the ultimate intimacy of the Holy Trinity, keeping and deepening, in the proportion of the ascent, the closeness to the whole mankind, He descends, shortly after His ascent, the Holy Ghost over the ones who are of Christ, thus founding the Church. The Holy Ghost, like a supreme love of the Father, like a manifestation of His intimacy, He has descended over the world, because He has set Himself, in a perfect manner, over the humanity of Jesus, which has been elevated to the divine intimacy. Because the humanity of Christ, raised to that intimacy of the Holy Ghost, like His godhead, it is in the same time into the deepest intimacy of the people who are opening the gate of their inside through faith, the Holy Ghost surrounds them, for they are bearers of Christ. The Church, the mystical humanity of Christ, it has received the Holy Ghost, in the Church's quality as Christ's body. "The Holy Ghost, by resting upon Christ, He overflows over His earthly humanity into the persons of the apostles and through this it is done the work of Jesus on earth”⁶⁵.

Jesus is, through this placing of Himself into the supreme intimacy with the Holy Trinity, but also into the supreme intimacy with the mankind, a continuous absorbent of the humanity into the zone of the godhead. “He leads the mankind towards God, He introduces the mankind in the intimacy of the Holy Trinity. He appears, in this way, not only like the Reconciliatory of the sinful creature with God, but He also appears like the Mediator between the creature and godhead” (p. 432).

In another place we have shown that professor S. Bulgakov, by precisely delimiting the course of the mission of Jesus in the three dignities, he affirms that through His placing on the right hand of the Father it ended the hierarchal service and it has begun His royal service.

But when he arrives to talk about the role of Mediator, fulfilled by Jesus after His ascent to heaven, he clarifies his idea in the sense that God continues to be hierarch, but not hierarch in humiliation and sufferance, but in power and glory. The high priesthood it means now a dignity, and not a service, and its meaning doesn’t imply the sacrifice and the intervention for the sinners, but it means, in general, an ontological bridge between God and His creation. That’s why, His high priesthood continues after the end of the world too.

“In His high priesthood the ontological abyss which separates the Creator from the creature, it is defeated. And this mediation doesn’t end ever; it continues even beyond the borders of this world” (p. 432). “The Holy Trinity is turned towards the world and the Holy Trinity unites with the world, through God- the Man, in His godhead-humanity, which rests the Holy Ghost upon. The godhead-humanity is, consequently, not only a fact, but also an act, not only an event which took place once, but it is also a continuous work, a work of God and a work of the man, a work that is being prolonged. The history of the world and of the man it has become a divine-human process. And the Logos is not only the demiurgic hypostasis, through God is turned towards the world in His creator work, but He is also the historical hypostasis, like Mediator, Wholeads the world, through the Holy Ghost, towards its salvation... His history (if we can say so) prolongs in heaven after the Ascent too, because it still comprises new and unfulfilled events, like it is the second coming into glory, the parousia, and the other events shown in the Apocalypse (like Christ is shown by Paul the Apostle, by Stephan, and by other righteous from the Church)”, (p. 434).

⁶⁵ W. c. p. 431.

This cosmic vision of S. Bulgakov, in the perspective of which the world appears like penetrating, wave after wave, due to a powerful force of attraction, through the great door which is Jesus Christ, in the godlike intimacy, it is wrong only because of too much letting Christ in oblivion, the One Who mediates through His sacrifice, by putting on the first plan that Christ, Who simply mediates by the fact that He is embodied, and He meets in His being both the divine reality and the creatural reality.

We are noticing here, like in the whole book of S. Bulgakov, the tendency to reduce the factor person in the favor of the factor substance, the factor liberty and the voluntarily interposition in favor of ontological fatality. Somehow, the world is united and it grows up in the unity with God, in a necessary way, through the force of the ontological attraction which is exercised by Jesus in the virtue of His identity, both with the being of the world, and with the divine being.

Regarding this tendency, we must accentuate that Jesus attracts us towards God through the intensity of some acts of personal character. The idea of a permanent sacrifice in His heavenly existence too, it is affirmed by the Holy Scripture and by the Church, with so much insistence, just because of that. The sacrifice and the sufferance express a report based on the most personal interest, by maintaining a supreme but free and personal intimacy. Otherwise, the high priesthood cannot be separated from the sacrifice. If Jesus continues to be hierarch, he will continue an actuality of the sacrifice. The high priesthood is not a simple ontological bridge, a mix of two opposite substances⁶⁶. The high priesthood is of a personal character, by mediating between personal factors which are not opposed through substance, but through ethical conflict. The high priesthood is mediation through the identification of the personal love both towards the Creator and also towards the other one. But the love towards two factors opposed through an ethical conflict, on the purpose of reconciling them, it is sufferance in the same time. The high priesthood is the mediation through love, and not through substance - through sacrifice, not simply through existence. Only because on the highest plan of the existence and, especially at God, the substance is nothing else but spirit, will, and love, and that's why it is possible to talk also about a closeness, through substance, between God and man. The love, in the intensity of the sacrifice, it exercises the most powerful force of attraction. Of course, in order this love to be possible, the one who manifests it must be capable of it. He must be God, in order to be capable of a divine love towards the man, and the man must to be capable of the man's love towards God. But the love of God towards man it must be shown to the man through a human face, in a human form, from human intimacy, and the love of the man towards God it must manifest with godhead intensity and power. There must be God with Human face to the man, and Man with godlike power to God⁶⁷ - but not like a simple putting together of the natures, but like a loving and suffering person, like the Hierarch by excellence.

⁶⁶ The high priesthood is neither a simple title, earned through the past sacrifice. Like says Johann Tobias Beck in "Lehwissenschaft", p. 619 (according to Ewald Burger, Der lebendige Christus, p. 148): "The eternal priesthood", to which He was raised, it is not "only a title property or a sinecure", but "a living function". The salvation hasn't been ended, it hasn't been finished, or isn't static, but it is in a living working. Jesus is the steadfast Mediator, through personal interposition between God and people.

According to the Epistle towards Hebrews, Jesus, like the true Hierarch, He had entered the Holy of the Holies, namely the heaven, with His blood that was shed on Golgotha, like the hierarch of the Old Testament was entering the image of the Holy of the Holies, with the blood of a goat. But who enters the heaven, He enters the eternity. The act or the appearance which He enters there with, it gains an eternal actuality. Only on the basis of this permanent actuality of His sacrifice, Jesus is Hierarch for eternity. This actuality doesn't mean only the objective memory of the sacrifice brought once, but it means a certain subjective presence too, of it, in Jesus Christ. He is, until there still remains a man to be saved on earth, in the state of savior will and of suffering love as when He brought His sacrifice on Golgotha. By this state He manifests the supreme love of the closeness of Jesus towards people and towards the Father. By this love He brings people close to God, through this love He is the Mediator and the Hierarch, and not by simply putting together in His being the two sides of the reality⁶⁸.

The priest Sergei Bulgakov sustains that Jesus in heaven is Hierarch only into glory. It is true that in heaven the high priesthood of Jesus has entered a new phase, into which the glory appears on the first plan. But, the state of glory it is not fully incompatible with a certain sufferance for the fate of the people, that also to the people, in the most profound state of the spirit, various and opposed elements are comprised one into another. Paul the Apostle often confesses in his Epistles such states, by declaring here that he ⁶⁷ By the fact that the Person of Jesus Christ meets both the human and the divine natures, His acts are historical and supra-historical; what He manifests towards us it comes from the heights of the heaven and what He manifests towards the Father it raises up from the human heart. After His ascent in the heavenly transcendence, Jesus, by remaining man, He communicates us the godlike goods from transcendence (see also Martin Kähler, at Ewald Burger, w. c. p. 161).

⁶⁸ According to Saint Maximos the Confessor, Jesus assumes our sins, in a relational way, not only when He is on earth, but all the time, in His quality of Head of the Church. This assuming of the others' sins it takes place between the persons connected through love. Between Jesus, in His quality of Head of the Church and the members of the Church, there exists this condition of maximum closeness through love, which makes possible the assuming of their sins by Him. But this assuming means participation to what burdens the ones to whom He wants to ease their situation, says Maximos the Confessor. So, Jesus suffers for our sins, after His ascent too, by melting them through this sufferance until He liberates us of the sins' burden. "But only by assuming from mercy, He bears them (the reproached passions), like the One Who is the Head of the entire body, like the medic who shares the sufferings of the one who suffers, until God, the One Embodied for us, He will liberate us of them, by scattering them and by totally abolishing them from us, through the power from within the body He has taken" (G.P. 91, 237: 6).

is full of joy, and there that he is upset (for example Phil. 2: 17– 28). He tells the recipients, here to endure the sufferance, and there to continually rejoice (Phil. 1: 29 – 4: 4). Of course, in heaven Jesus is into glory; no one continues to hit Him, like it was on earth, but it is about a different sufferance, different from the one from earth, which is endured now by Him, completely voluntarily. “In the vision of the Apocalypse about the Lamb, who stays on the God`s throne, the death of Jesus and His ascent are seen like a whole”⁶⁹.

The book of the priest S. Bulgakov let the impression that the sacrifice of Jesus on Golgotha has had not but the meaning to consummate the individual humanity of Him, to bring Him the glory and the placing on the right of the Father. The salvation of the people is due to this power, into which was placed the humanity of Jesus after death. So, the sacrifice has only an indirect report with the people and, in any case, the sacrifice belongs exclusively to the past.

To this conception must be emphasized that the sacrifice is the direct and permanent bridge between Jesus and people and just in this is manifested the intimacy and the intensity of the personal character of the report between Him and them.

The pure sacrifice of Jesus on the Golgotha was not only the cause of a merit which He was raised together with His humanity for, on the godlike throne – the ascent impacted over the entire mankind – but also the permanent means of closeness and efficiency upon people. On this it is based the reality of the Eucharist. His own sacrifice, like sufferance from love, which brings the one Who bring it, closer to God and to people, with whom otherwise, He form a whole. Starting the walking on the path of closeness to God and to people, like man through embodiment, Jesus did a part of it on Golgotha, in order, through the sacrifice on the cross, to walk this path entirely at once. His human nature was suddenly deified through sacrifice, showing and transmitting through itself, in a maximum way, the godhead. It is not only about a bodily transparence and transmissibility, but it is about a spiritual one too. All His spiritual powers become incandescent of love through the sacrifice which He brings. Through sacrifice these powers become capable to bear in them, like some unburnt pyres, the godlike fire. They become of an unimagined tenderness, of an untold penetrability and efficiency upon the human souls⁷⁰. In this way, Jesus ⁶⁹ Ewald Burger, Der lebendige Christus, Stuttgart, 1933, p. 100.

⁷⁰ For the explanation both of the way how, through the descending into the intimacy of the people, Jesus has taken upon Him the responsibility for the sin, but also of the way how, at His turn, He transmits, especially after His ascension, through love, His purity to the people, there can be used the results to which have reached the psychology and the anthropology when studying the relation of love between two persons. These persons enter a reciprocal communication which they grow and they tend towards resemblance through, until their identification to one another. It is the so-called phenomenon of the “imagination”, which constitute of that, that the face of the could resurrect all at once, after His death, transmitting this spiritual force to His body and to resurrect Himself, showing the total intimacy that He has placed Himself in, through the sacrifice on Golgotha. If He does not cover these acts all at once, this won't be due not to an evolution which He will need to pass through, like a man – which would mean the reducing of the sacrifice to its unique importance in what regards the transformation of the humanity of Christ – but of some motifs which are important only to the people.

He does not resurrect all at once because His death was real and because the life only with the soul, which is lived by people after their death, it is possible, but it is an inferior stage of life in comparison to the life in the resurrected body.

He didn't ascend all at once after resurrection, in order to convince the people about His true resurrection and in order to show His real connection with the people in their life on earth. (More than that, though, He could not beloved person, received in the inside of the other person, it becomes an impulse, which organizes all the spiritual powers according to his model. What the law cannot do, the commandment for the ennobling of the man, it is easily effectuated by the face of a beloved being, which the virtues and the ideals are concentrated into. B. Viseslavtzev, based on the theories of Freud, Jung, Baudouin etc. he sees this power of the face in that fact that its sight causes the forces from the subconscious to sublimate (Etica preobrajennago Erosa, Paris, Ymca-Press, p. 71, etc.) L. Binswanger, without mentioning the subconscious, he insists upon the fact that the imagination between the persons who are loving one another, it is reciprocal, and it isn't only a subjective illusion, but it is a reciprocal communication of being, like in the case of communicating vessels, so that the two ones reach some kind of "Wäre die Imagination aber nur Verbildlichung und Einbildung im Sinne im der «bissen Phantasie» der Psychologen oder dar der Illusion im «aufklärerischen» Sinne eines... Feuerbach oder Freust, so wäre nicht einzusehen, inwiefern die liebe eine «Realität» sein kann; denn auf etwas «Unreales» kann sich keine Realität «stützen». Begreifen wir die Imagination aber als sinnen transzendentalen, Realität «aufschließenden» Modus de Daseins und verstehen darunter die transzendente Einheit von Phantasie («Bildhaftigkeit»), Realitätsoffenbarung und Einbildung – im Sinne des «gläubigen» Scheinbildes des Daseins als unendlichen in das endliche Sein – so bleibt die «Realität der Liebe» - ohnehin das Realste «unseres» Daseins – auch «als Imagination» gewarnt und gelangen wir erst einen ontologischen Verständnis der Phantasmagorie der Liebe. (Franz v. Bader) und der Daseins fülle «entsprungenen» Magie der Wirrheit“. „Die sorgende Scheidung zwischen Mir und Dir als Individualität, ja als Existenz, schwindet hier hin“, w. c. P. 146-7. „Nur liebende Wirrheit besitzt ganz; denn ganz besitzen Wir nur in der erwiderten gläubigen «Sehnsucht», in der Reziprozität der «unaufhörlichen» Ein-Bildung (imaginatio), in Ein-Atmung (inspiratio) und Ein-Schalung (intuitio), der liebenden Begegnung, mit anderen Worten, in der «unerschöpflichen» Selbstmehrung des Eros“, w. c. P. 278. „Nach all dem bedeute es auch eine viel zu enge Fassung der Du-Offenbarung oder Begegnung, wenn Mann sie als Intuition bezeichnet; denn sie ist viel mehr als An- und Einschalung in irgend einer Form, als rein schauendes Haben; sie ist An- Verwandlung, An-Eignung, und Ein-Bildung, in einen Wort; Wandel, nicht nur Schau“, (w. c. p. 502). The fantasy and the reality go hand in hand with love, increasing to the infinite the common existence. Everything you can imagine as pure about the beloved one, he or she actually receives it, and at her/his turn, she/he will send back upon you like a formative power. In the relation of love, two beings are opening to one another the deep sources of the universal existence. All the more, the relation of love between man and Jesus-God, it makes that all the purity and divinization which Jesus wants the man to be raised at, it becomes reality which the man is actually imparted with. From Him it is conveyed to the man everything He imagines like an ideal form of the man. The form of Jesus is really conveyed to the man like a power which makes the man to grow up according to His norm, and Christ raises the man up, by the fact that He contemplates with love the face of the man, into the intimacy of the infinite space of His heart, in His “body”, which is the Church.

stay on earth after His resurrection, if He didn't want the people to believe that the life with the resurrected body is not but a momentarily turning back to the earthly life and not an experience which happens according to another cosmos).

Jesus slowed the effects of the sacrifice from Golgotha for the sake of the people.

But this permanent and supreme closeness of Jesus to the people it continuously has at its basis His spiritual tension, through which it has been established too: the love to the death. This hadn't disappeared from Jesus through His ascent to heaven; otherwise, the closeness would have had an ontological character, of a substantial kinship, not a personal character. The love to the sacrifice, the state of spirit which determined Jesus to receive the death for the people, not only those have remained after that, but, because the whole His spiritual power through deification it raises and it intensifies, reaching an untold efficiency – His spiritual power raises also to proportions which we cannot imagine. Jesus does not forget in heaven about the sacrifice that He has brought for people and He is not ashamed of it, but He affirms about them, what He has done for them. Jesus even on the godlike throne, in the state of glory, He is the Lamb who appears like “stabbed” (Apocalypse 5: 6). The salvation of the world is being worked, in all its continuity, not through a kingly command, but through the Lamb Who, though He has defeated the death, He still remains stabbed. The big and the uplifting power which gives the human souls life, which saves the world, which upholds the world, which destines the world to eternity, it is not a magnificent exterior authority, it is not a development of prestigious force, but it is the suffering love of the Son of God become man. The stabbed Lamb is the base of the foundation of the world, a world which is in course of salvation, which Christ is the force maintaining the dynamism into, the dynamism of the world towards the world's consummation, towards the world's growing up in spirit. Only Him opens up the big mysteries of the mysterious book, which comprises the development of the historical life. The sacrifice of the biggest One, for the little ones from the world, His love brought to the sufferance, namely to the maximum focusing, it is the ultimate explanation of all it is shown noble on the world. “The Lamb is the torch of the fortress”, namely of the saved and eternal world (Apocalypse 21: 22), “from His throne springs out the river and the water of the life”, (22: 1).

The meaning of the ascent of Christ like man on the godlike throne it is presented, under two aspects, which stay in close connection to one another. On one hand, the Man is called to work through entire his ontological kingship and through the whole fervor of His brotherhood, but, in the same time, with godlike power, for the salvation of the fellow humans.

On the other hand, the humanity is elevated to the supreme honor, to the honor which is deserved only by the Creator and the Master of the World.

Among the consequences of the hypostatic union, there is comprised also one that we have not analyzed yet in the respective chapter, because it is more appropriate to speak about it here. That consequence constitutes in that, to Jesus Christ, on the basis that He is the embodied Son of God, that the same divine subject is also a subject of the human nature, He deserves to be worshipped like God, either He is looked from the godhead side, or from the side of His humanity. To His humanity, of course, by not being regarded as self-standing (such a thing does not exist), but in the hypostasis of the Word, it is granted the same worshipping like to His godhead.

This teaching regarding the fact that Jesus has been elevated as man, on the godlike throne, it is beyond any doubt.

Staggering it is this fact: our nature, not as self-standing, but in any case, our real nature, it stays on the godlike throne, and it leads the world. Of course, the being of the godhead hasn't been changed through this, but henceforth our nature participates too, and it is taken account of it, to the almightiness of the administration of the world. The Son of God is colored by the human feeling in everything He does. At the leading of the world there is a mind, a feeling, and a soul, like we have, and through the intimacy which exists in amongst all the living, feeling, and activate through the human nature subjects, there exists a deep communication, a lasting solidarity, between the One Who holds the rudder of the Universe and of the people, and somehow, the entire mankind participates to this leadership of the world. At least through prayer and through love towards Jesus Christ, we are all of us partakers to the leadership of the world, through God's benevolence to have had decided to elevate our humanity on the heavenly throne. At the rudder of the world is not only the divine wisdom and almightiness, but there is also a heavenly heart, which participates in the same time to the faith of sufferance of the mankind, relieving it." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Jesus Christ has ascended to heaven shortly after His resurrection, both in order to receive the whole godlike power in the leadership of the world towards salvation, and to let to the latitude of the people to freely decide to believe in Him or not. If He had continued to stay, with the greatness of His resurrected body among people, those ones would have been forced to recognize Him as God. The history, like the arena of the life of the free decision, it would have become impossible.

But now comes to question: how it is possible the connection between Jesus Christ, the ascended One, with the people from history? This is the same with the question: how can be Jesus Christ not only a past reality of the history, but to be also a present reality, together with His sacrifice and resurrection?

When we say the Jesus has ascended to heavens, we think that He has ascended Himself on the plan of the eternity and, though it is easy to think that He, from there, He watches with interest our life in time, though it is harder to us to understand how can we be capable of the connection with Christ, which it is intended by Him. In other words, how could the time meet the eternity?

When we have highlighted the role of the history like a propagator environment of the Revelation, we have seen that the history is accompanied by a presence and by a work of God. So, even before God has made Himself a man, it was possible a certain connection of the history with God and a certain closeness of His to the history and it continues the remaining into this closeness. But, by the fact that Jesus Christ, even after His ascent, He is God in human nature, His connection with the history must be more intimate. And that part of history, which stays in this more intimate connection with Him and it unfolds in this way, by constituting some sort of a core of the history: it is the Church.

Within the Church the conscience of the presence of Jesus Christ it is alive. The Church is the community of the believers, from all times, with Him. The question is: how is this communion possible, being given the eternal plan, on which Jesus lives, and the temporal-historical plan, on which the life of the believers' community it unfolds?

The biggest difficulty on the way of understanding this communion it is constituted of the difference between time and eternity. That's why, in the contemporary theology and under its influence from today in the philosophy too, the problem of the time has reached in the middle of the debates. It has been argued that the Kantian notion of the time, like an empty shape, which the man fills it with the intuited contents, it makes impossible the presence of the Resurrection of God in the present time. In this case, either is a part of a past time, or it is outside time, and the man cannot elevate to it, except by getting out of time, which is, according to the Kantian conception, impossible⁷¹. "The formal notion of the time it impedes us to understand the present Jesus like a reality"⁷².

71 W. KÜNETH, DIE Theologie der Auferstehung, p. 167: „Hier erscheint die Zeit als der an sich seiende inhaltleere Rahmen... Der Mensch tritt erst in diese Zeitform herein und macht das Vakuum der Zeit durch das Dasein zu dem konkreten Leben. Zeit und Dasein sind also gesündeste Größen, die sich wie Form und Inhalt zueinander verhalten... Von dem Perfektum der Auferstehung die Gegenwärtigkeit aussagen, heißt das, was jenseits der Zeitstrecke liegt... zur Veranschaulichung in das Formschema der Zeit pressen... Alle Aussagen über die Gegenwart und Zukunft des Christus... sind dann nur als bildhafte, uneigentliche Ausdrucksversuche für einen ewigen Inhalt zu werten, der schlechterdings nichts mit der Zeitform der Welt zu tun haben“.

72 W. Künet, w. c. p. 168.

The dialectic theology identifies the time not to a shape, but to the transitoriness with the ephemeral character of all the things into history. In this way, the dialectical theology establishes an opposition of exclusivity between time and eternity. A connection between the eternal God and the temporal man it is impossible⁷³. The dialectical theology brings to extreme the Protestant thesis that the man cannot have from God any sign, or any bridge, but the man is exclusively entrusted to the manhood of a faith which is not leaning on anything.

Unlike these theories of the time, a number of theologians like: H. Schmidt, H. Frick, W. Küneth, they have formulated a notion of the time which to make possible the connection of the life from time with the eternal God and, especially, with Jesus Christ.

According to H. Schmidt, the time is “something pre-formal” (ein vorformales Etwas), which is able to offer shapes both to the finite contents and to the infinite ones. The passing character of the things it is not due to the time, but to some content of them, which the time offers a special shape to. That pre-formal something can offer also a shape to the imperishable contents. But this way of existence is not the quietness of death. The eternity of God, like we know it through Revelation – otherwise we do not know it – it is comparable to the time, because it has entered the time; it is an infinite content of the time. Schmidt calls it plenary temporality. It is a continuous present, not a dead one but one full of movement⁷⁴. So, “the eternal life of the One resurrected from dead it is not an empty of content timelessness, but it rather is a fullness of content of a filled-up time⁷⁵.

This positive conception about the time, about the its possibility to give shapes to the eternal life, these theologians take it out of the fact that the time is created by God, so it is not a product of the sin, and therefore, there cannot exist any contradiction between time and God⁷⁶. The same thing results from the fact that God has revealed Himself into time⁷⁷. Of course, 73 “Damit wird die Zeit mit Zeitlichkeit gleichgesetzt... Diese Statuierung eines ausschließenden Gegensatzes zwischen Zeit und Ewigkeit mach eine Verbindung des ewigen Gottes mit dem zeitlichen Menschen unmöglich“, p. 168.

74 Vollzeitlichkeit ist die Vollendung, die in sich bleibt und nicht mehr über sich hinausweist, trotzdem aber nicht in toter Ruhe erstarrt“, p. 307.

211 “Das ewige Leben des Auferstandenen ist darum nicht eine Inhaltsleere Zeitlosigkeit, sondern vielmehr die Vollinhatlichkeit einer erfüllten Zeit“, W. Küneth, p. 173.

75 “Die Bestimmung der Zeit als Schöpfung macht grundsätzlich jede Entgegenschätzung der Zeit Gott unmöglich“, Küneth, p. 171.

76 H. Schmidt, w. c. p. 302-303.

77 “Aus dem Fall resultiert die Not und der Fluch der Zeitlichkeit“, Küneth, w. c. P. 172.

because the human existence which lives in time it has fallen in sin, the time has become for it a means of punishment. "From the falling come out the distress and the curse of the impermanence"⁷⁸. This state is an illness of the time. Instead of the plenary time (Vollzeitlichkeit), we have an impoverished temporality (Halbzeitlichkeit).

Jesus, by resurrecting, He has reestablished, through the restoration of a new content of life, the full time. Better said, He has brought it to the state which the time has tended to, before. "The reality of the resurrected Christ it is the new time, namely not a timeless eternity and a supra-temporality radically remote from this world, but a time brought to consummation, a filled-up time". From here it turns out that, clothed in our time, we have a capacity to get closer to the sphere which the resurrected Jesus is in. And the fact of the resurrection, by being a continuous present, by being of a full temporality, one in connection with our time, the permanent contemporaneousness with Jesus it is possible. Jesus is not into an eternity with no connections with the time, and the fact of His resurrection is not exclusively into a past point of the time⁷⁹.

The new reality of the time started to grow up under the veil of the old time. Between this new reality and Jesus, it is being done the communion. Properly called, that hidden reality is a prolongation of the reality of the resurrected Jesus, comprising in itself the ones clothed in Him.

We will avoid naming the form of the life, which Jesus is after the resurrection into, as a full temporality. But, in any case, into the views of these theologians, there is a core of truth. The life of Jesus after resurrection, like our life after we will resurrect, it cannot be without any memory, without any trace of the life on earth. Jesus, since He has got out from the unimaginable and the inaccessible abyss of the godhead, in order to be in connection with the man and, since He hasn't left the humanity after resurrection, in order to prolong this connection, He is closer to us and more ontologically related with us under all aspects, except the sin. So, because an essential structure of our life on earth it is the temporality, He is closer to us than the unrevealed God in this aspect too. If He does not live, ⁷⁸ W. Küeth: „Die Auferstehungswirklichkeit des Christus ist die «neue» Zeit, d. H. Sie ist nicht zeitlose Ewigkeit und eine von dieser Welt radikal distanzierte Überzeitlichkeit, sondern ist eine zur Volendung gebrachte Zeit, eine erfüllte Zeit“, p. 113.

⁷⁹ "Diese Einsicht hebt einerseits die Spannung zwischen der Gegenwart und dem Auferstehungsereignis in der Vergangenheit auf, da die Auferstehung ja gerade kein Element der alten Zeitlichkeit darstellt, zu dem ein solches Spannungsverhältnis denkbar wäre. Die Beziehung des Gegenwartspunktes der Zeit zu dem Auferstandenen kann darum nicht als eine gleichsam längsdimensionale oder horizontale im Sinne einer Zeitlinie verstanden werden. Andererseits beseitigt der neue Zeitbegriff die Trennung von Zeit und Ewigkeit, denn die Auferstehung besagt nicht zeitlose Ewigkeit, zu zerr nur durch Preisgabe alles Zeitlichen eine Verbindung hergestellt werden könnte... Demgegenüber besitzt die Ichzeitlichkeit des Menschen als geschaffene und sündige Zeitlichkeit eine prinzipielle Offenheit gegenüber der neuen Christuszeit als ihre Erfüllung und Aufhebung“, p. 175.

in temporality, in any case, He lives into a form closeness to our temporality, neighbor to it, compatible with it, able to ease and uphold the connection between Him and us. Jesus, the resurrected One, He places us into a temporality open to His eternity, and His eternity communicates with our temporality.

Without exiting from time, like a creational form, but by raising us over the sinful living of the time (above the state of animalism, of egotism, of rush, and of fear), what we can do only by faith, we must be able to enter the connection with His reality. He must be eternally the same, but not careless, not far from us. The reality irradiated from Him, by clothing the ones who believe in Him, it composes the Church. This Church is a whole composed by all the ones who believe in Him, but also by a reality which surrounds them, having Him in its center. It is a temporal-supra-temporal whole.

It is the place here to clarify somewhat - starting from our experience into Church - the connection of the Church with Christ.

We have insisted in the introduction to show that the transmission of the faith is done in the meeting of my intimate subject with your subject. But this meeting does not lock up my permanent self into a restrained horizon, with only one fellow creature. I am not receiving and I am not strengthening the faith through only one subject. I do not stay in a faith report with only one man. But I reach, one by one, in such a report with many people. My faith becomes on this way increasingly firmer. If I had met in my life only one man who believes, I am not sure what would have happened with the fate received from him, under the dissolvent influence of so many people who do not believe. In front of a man who believes, it is being woken up in me the memory of other believers that I have met and it receives a new support the faith received from those ones. And among many people who confess their faith – unveiling in the same time their intimate subject – I feel it like descending into me, like a true torrent, the faith or the plus of faith, awakening myself to communion with all them in the same time. In this way, in the transmission and in the sustaining of the faith we do not encounter in a given time only two by two people – eventually three by three, because the one who transmits the faith, he has received it from a different person – remaining permanently like some close pairs, but each of them enters, with one at the time, or with all them together, the communion with many other fellow humans.

It is a larger communion, constituted of the entire circle of the believers among whom the human person lives. It is called community, like a grouping of all of them who can enter, without difficulties of spiritual order, the me-and-you communion, or the me-and-you (the last you is at plural (E.l.t.'s n.)) in the same time; like a grouping which the embers of the intimate communion burns into, either it raises the flames of the supreme actualization in different spots one at the time, or all over in the same time.

But the communities are not isolated either. The faith in the circle of the people which I am living in, it has come once from a man from another circle, and what permanently upholds and fortifies the faith in my community it is the conscience about other communities who believe. We all from my community, we feel ourselves in connection with the community from around us and with all the communities which exist on earth, even we do not know all of them by their names and even if we do not know but only few of them. The conscience tells me that I am one with all the ones who believe like I believe, from all over the earth, that we are forming together a big and brotherly solidarity. I feel that my faith is due to the entire brotherhood, and that through faith I am incorporated to the whole. The rennet which links, which unites entire humanity who believes like me, it is of divine character, because not even two people could create and throw between themselves the bridge of the faith, if they were only by themselves, and there is not, also, present God. Solidary with all the ones who live and believe like me, solidary with all the ones who died into my faith, solidary with all the ones who will believe in the future like I believe, but all of us connected with God, this is the feeling which I am mastered by, having the surety that I am partaker to a spiritual community: present, past, and a future one. This is the Church.

But what makes me remaining solidary with a certain universal brotherhood of faith it is not only the fact that all its members believe, but it is also the identity and the content of their faith related to the entire content of my faith. The interest for the same content of the faith it contributes in a great measure to the unity of the Church. We have spoken more, in the introduction, about the faith like a simple certitude about the existence of God. But into this certitude it is comprised also certain content. The conviction that God exists, it is also a conviction about God's certain way to exist and to work, especially in report with the people that we are. The belief in the existence of God would not conquer me so overwhelming, if it wasn't a belief in a God Who preoccupies Himself with me, having such features and doing such works for me, in the past, in the present, and in the future.

We are not approaching here the details, but from this short sketching it can be understood why the believer has for a certain content of the belief the same vital interest like simply for the act of faith. When it starts to be produced a disinterest in the content of the faith, usually, it has started to melt down also the solidarity due to the act of the faith.

If now the belief like an act, it could not be born, sustained, and fortified into the man except only into a large communion, as more as the faith like content cannot be received, fortified, and transmitted by the man in its integrality, but into such a communion. The lonely man cannot warranty the intact preservation of a content of faith and he cannot establish it with his own authority. Only a community gathers the features for both these missions.

The double responsibility for conveying the belief like an act and as an unchanged content, it is assigned thereby not to the isolated human subject, who would not be capable of fulfilling that task, but, in the last analyze, to the universal community, and to the individual only like a part, like a member of that universal community. The individual transmits the faith having like reinforcements the will and the authority of the entire Church, being indebted not to work on his own. Every man is responsible for propagating the faith, but his responsibility and work grows up from the responsibility and the work of the Church. I am not responsible by myself, but I am together responsible with all of us who build the Church. My subject is based – without losing its responsibility – into the subject of the community, which comprises me and which widens me. Two persons, tied through the me-you communion of love, they can be to towards a third person a unity, a subject with the same intention, exercising an all the more important influence upon that third person. Let us think at the report between parents, on one hand, and the child, on the other hand. The same is the report of a large community, like the Church is, towards each person from inside its content or from outside it. This subject, which is not anything else but the unity which is formed by the community between more persons, it is in the same time interweaved with the divine subject, because two or more people who believe, forming a communion, are carried by the same godlike intention and power. Not the people taken in themselves form the subject of the Church, because, as such, they cannot believe, but, because God is working into themselves, and God wants with their will. The subject of the Church is divine-human, the godlike will having permanently the initiative, and the wills of the people being under the influence of a common will which follows to the divine one. As a manner of fact, only existentially there are distinguished two types of will, because functionally they present like one.

The experience which the man who receives the faith has, that he receives the faith from God, it reaches its fullness into Christianity and it has an objective basis into the ontological closeness of the God-the Man Christ to the people.

Any member of the Church, into the fact of the transmission of the faith, he works in the name of Jesus Christ, from the assignment and with His power.

The community between many in the same time, especially when I can no longer speak with resonance about the two-by-two intimacy, it manifests and it strengthens through the leading of everybody towards their common center, which ties them in the act of the belief, through confession and prayer. Even two individuals, who are in communion due to the faith in God, they feel the need to confess not only to each other their faith and their love from it, but also to the one who unites them. Two brothers, of whose love for each other it comes out of the common love they have towards their parents, they feel the need, not only to talk about their parents, but also to go before them, confessing them, together, the love they feel for them. In the presence of their parents their love increases. Two persons unveil to one another the intimate subject and they enter the communion also when they are looking, with the same love and understanding, at the third one. Into him, through him, and over him, their souls and their regards pass and meet.

The confession of the faith towards the face of God, but also the confession of the sins, it is, like the prayer, a dialog with Him, a grateful and loving paying homage to Him. So that, in fact, the prayer is the means of maximum intensification of the communion from belief. All the ones who are together praying to God, they feel themselves like a family, like a unity, like ones who have nothing to hide and among whom there is no distance. At the end of the prayer their regards meet twinned; they have met and discovered themselves by looking at God.

The prayer is the act of entering the full me-you report, because through the prayer we enter such a report with God. When, since our subject of communion, he has awakened, he has emerged, he has been brought out by the power of God, this subject does not go away immediately, but he turns easily also towards the fellow human which prays with us. The confession towards God is it the fullest unveiling of our intimacy, with the help of which, we enter the communion and, in the same time, God, to Whom we unveil ourselves, He is not far away from our fellow human who stays also into the prayer, but He is close to him, He is familiar with him, He is present also into him and, in this way, our word of love towards God passes also through our fellow human, it produces joy also to him, for he rightly feels that we are showing to him too, the love we show to God.

Let us stop for a moment in a special way, upon the me-you report, which we enter with God through prayer. We have seen that we fell in this report the ultimate reality of a man; even the fact that our fellow human exists like a reality different from the objects which are so indifferent to us, we discover our fellow human in this report. Only when: we actually experience that the subject limits us, in a way totally superior to the way which the objects limit us in; and like a subject who definitively limits us, who is spiritual and conscious, being equal to us and not only temporarily, materially, like something subordinated still in the last analyze. Only in the me-you which is in the same time a report of love, we are not mystifying the reality of our fellow human.

This fact takes place, in what regards God, into prayer. Into prayer we actually make the experience of the most intensive reality of God.

The prayer is the plenitude of the faith and of the communion with God; it is the maximum closeness of God. In analogy to what you experience when you talk to the other one, when you talk to God into prayer you are no longer alone, with your thoughts which walk on doubtful paths, but He fills you up with the His mystery and with the certitude of His mystery, with the plus of power and of being which you feel that can to flow infinitely to you, on the measure of your growing up and love.

But the own prayer takes power from the prayer of the others. If my faith strengthens from the faith of the other one, all the more I will take power towards prayer, towards this plenary act of the faith, from the prayer of the other one. The certitude that I am in front of God and the word of my prayer, which meets, directed towards me, His face, it grows up into me the certitude which is spread from the prayer of the other one. Increasing itself from one to another, like a communication of being which comes from above the ones who pray, the profound prayer in common it is a great, it is a huge certitude, which raises up from the whole community, like a gift from God, but in the same time like a sign of His intense presence - a close presence - of a Parent Who embraces all His sons.

Behold why we own our faith to the Church. But not only the faith like an act, but also like a valorization of the content of the Revelation, not like a sum of knowledge which addresses to the mind, but like a continuous speaking of God towards us, being intensified through this the faith.

H. Frick, though Protestant, he draws in one of his writings⁸⁰, to this conclusion: the word of the Holy Scripture does not open itself to us like a word of God, but only into the Church's atmosphere of faith. Who does not live in the Church's ambiance of faith and approaches the Holy Scripture with the simple natural understanding, he will take the words from it like nominations of some meanings, which he will judge them critically, treating the Bible like a human book. The godlike power of this book it will be unveiled to him only if the words sound to him also like present impartations of God; only then the Ghost of God will walk on above of the Scripture and its reading will be also something else then an intellectual occupation. Only when the speaker is present and the words have not become self-standing realities, we enter the communion with Him through the words, otherwise it is put to work, in an individualistic state, only our intellect. But only the faith of the community, especially on the moments of its manifestation, it creates into me the certitude of the presence of God like a You of mine, and of the community, Who speaks through the words of the Scripture, to me and to all those who are present there, by connecting us, even more, through the common experience, through the common destiny which He unveils and imposes us. Frick considers like an exceeded and wrong stage the individualistic reading of the Scripture, in the searching for the simple meanings of the words, a thing which was practiced in Protestantism to the mutilations of the Scripture and to the evaporation of its divine character:

⁸⁰ Wissenschaftliches und pneumatisches Verständnis der Bibel, Tübingen, 1927. To see also another writing of his: Mythos, Ideogram und Wort, in „Marburger theologischer Studien“, 3, 1931, Klotz Verlag, Gotha.

“In the second stage it has caused a limitation the fact that it was taken the word only like naming (Name). We must consider like a progress the fact that in the third stage it is taken the word like expression (Ausdruck). It is in this stage still a limitation, because it is not given enough attention to the character of the word like impartation, like communication (Mitteilung) ... It must be considered especially the living relation between speaker and listener, therefore between me and you, between whom the word creates, like a bridge from a side to the other side, the communication. The richest kind of relation of the «word» it is hardly the full dialogue. The words of a dialogue cannot be explained neither as a simple naming of the things, about what is upon which is speaking, nor like a simple expression of a personal spirit which wants to unveil itself. To the just exegesis of a dialogue, it belongs especially the understanding for the reciprocal movement between me and you... The Scripture is a dialogue between the divine Me and the man's you”⁸¹.

But for God to unveil Himself to us like an interlocutor, it doesn't depend on us, but on Him. “We can by ourselves to show the scientific meaning and we can even force ourselves to get closer to the moral seriousness of a strict research of the truth. But, the ultimate and the proper thing we cannot to obtain it. This is: the descent of the Holy Ghost. Because the prayer is not a method with an effect which we can surely anticipate, count, neither is an exegetic recipe. In order to establish the prayer like the first request of the just interpretation of the Scripture, it means, before all, to confess our human helplessness to reach the right understanding, namely a pneumatological understanding of the Bible. The God's Ghost alone, and not our spirit, He is the one Who opens the just meaning of the word: the interior hearing of a word of repentance and the divine grace which it is sent in present to our ear, the factual introducing of the man in the divine dialogue...

Only through faith it can be heard and understood the biblical word, like a present utterance of God towards me.

“As, though, this belief is not a private thing, even if – from psychological perspective – it penetrates as «internally» as it can, we realize that the Ghost belongs in a necessary way to the community. Who says Ghost, says Church (wer geist sagt, sagt Kirche) and the Church exists only because the Spirit blows within it. To «pneumatologically» understand the Scripture it means this: to reach in the situation to hear speaking the common Ghost of the believer Church, namely now and here... The pneumatological exegesis belongs to the high calling to the Church”.

⁸¹ P.21-22.

In the cult and in any other form of proclaiming the word, in the entire atmosphere of the community of belief which surrounds us, which upholds and penetrates the lonely Christian, there is the place where it can be produced the dialogue between God and man... there where the research of the Scripture by the lonely reader it passes into the praying mediation and in the state of availability into which the man says: “Speak to me, Lord, your servant listens to You”⁸².

The belief reaches its full intensity, and it is at its filling up source, in the prayer community of the Church, for here the believer is dominated by the certitude that God is present at the second person, into a role of an interlocutor to him. But into this community it is valued the content of the Revelation too, and the content of the faith, for God communicates here just the being and the will, by showing them like unchanged in all times. Here is how the Holy Scripture, unveils this character of itself, only through the Church, and only through the Church it is a word actually spoken by God. Only through the Church, the Revelation - met in a precise moment of the history, which, like a temporal moment it belongs to the past - it has a permanent presence. God spoke in a given moment in time, but in the Church He speaks always the same words. Due to the Church, the Revelation is not stolen by the torrent of the time and driven to the past, but it remains continuously present, like a godlike act, because into the Church God remains present too.

But if in the community of the Church it is experienced the plenary certitude that God speaks now the word from the Scripture towards the ones gathered in the Church, this will mean that not the reading in isolation of the text of the Scripture it produces to us this state in a consummate way, but the hearing of the word from the Scripture spoken with a loud voice to the hearing of the entire community – then we feel better that God it is a subject Who limits us, by meeting us from beyond us, and not a quality of our inward states, and the community only in this way it can be achieved that all the gathered ones are focused on the hearing of the same voice, of the same commandment hanging on the same Master⁸³.

⁸² God, by being the plenary existence, He cannot be experienced as such when we are talking about Him at the third person, because then it diminishes into us the overwhelming feeling of His existence. The reality is the most fully felt at the first and at the second person. The second person, so the reality not identical to our person, we feel it fuller when it manifests like at the first person - namely when we are listening to him and not when we are speaking to him so. We are experiencing God in the most adequate measure, into His existence of supreme richness and intensity, when we are hearing Him telling to us: “I Am That I Am”. Here is a reason why into the Church it is more principal that the Scripture to be read into the hearing of the believers, rather than to be read separately by each believer.

If it is like that, it won't matter the way the word of the Scripture is uttered, namely if it read or told by heart. It is even more natural when it is said by heart. We have said that the faith like act and content it propagates through the certitude of the man. When the godlike word is said by heart, the one who speaks the word to the hearing of the others, he can give another accent to his certitude. The prophets did not read the unveilings which God give them, from a text to the auditors, but after the introduction: "The Lord declares", they were proceeding to the reproduction of His words, like God Himself was speaking them. It is given a much powerful impression that God Himself says again His words, when the one who transmits them, he doesn't read them but he speaks them.

At the beginning of the Church all the words of Jesus and about Him, they were preached orally.

The oral preaching is from the beginning and it is the one that continues having the most important role into the community of the Church, and not the reading.

Either it is recorded like a whole, or it would not be, the content of the Revelation must be continuously repeated with the word of the mouth in front of the community. The Revelation regarded under this aspect it is tradition. For we are repeating all that was said before all the forerunners in the churchly community, we are into tradition. But for this repeating is done, through the mouth of the one who speaks, by God Himself, yesterday and today the Same, the tradition is a living force, a continuous novelty. The tradition is the permanent presence of the unchangeable God, into time and into history. If the will of God had not been like being the same, in the form of the tradition, we would have lacked an important support of the faith in Him. God is not in a seen manner with all the generations, or with the whole history, but He is there in the form of the tradition. The Revelation itself, like God's unveiling in time, it cannot be shared to all the people but in the form of the tradition. The tradition is the eternal novelty into the big river of the relentless passing of the time. Only like tradition, a gesture of God, by touching a certain moment of the history, it touches the entire history, and it has efficiency over all the following times.

⁸³ God, being the plenary existence, He cannot be experienced as such when we are talking about Him at the third person, because then diminishes into us the overwhelming feeling of His existence. The reality it is felt most completely into the first and into the second person. On the second person, namely the reality not identical with our self, we feel when it is manifested like a first person, so when she speaks towards us, not when we address to her, so into our obedience, not into our words. We experience God in the most adequate measure, into His supreme existence of richness and intensity, when we hear His saying: "I Am That I Am". Here is a motif for which into the Church it is more principled to be read the Scripture into the hearing of the believers, that to be read by each one on them.

The tradition is my connection with the people from before me and with the heaven, in the same time. The tradition is a living force of the present for it unites me with the heaven, but not with the heaven of a present without horizon, but of one which makes me grateful to the past and it keeps me in connection with the past. The tradition is the eternity in time, the only form of the eternity which does not annul the time, but it values it. The tradition is the same living voice of God sounding on every time, overflowing in souls the infinity of meanings and faith. In the identity of the voice stays the identity of the Revelation and into the infinity of the contents it stays the possibility of a continuous novelty to the understanding of the people.

But in the community of the Church there isn't only God speaking, but the community too. The voice of the community is the prayer. The community prays to God to give it power to hear Him speaking. But, also to thank Him for hearing Him and to promise Him that the community's will fulfills His will. God speaks through the repeating of the infinite Revelation, and the man answers through prayer. These are also the two constitutive parts of the cult, which is a dialogue between God and man. Prayer - into a wider sense a grateful effort of the man to put himself in the me-you circuit with God, in order to notice what God speaks - it is also any meditation, it is any effort to understand the content of the Revelation. The whole this second part it is the churchly Tradition, unlike the godlike one. This one multiplies, orients itself according to the needs and the problems of each time, according to what occurs, on the plan of the reality, as others and others preoccupations, methods and forms of showing. Through these ones, the man speaks in his concrete needs, by constantly changing ones, touched by the amber finger of God. It is the reaction of the changing history to the unchangeable word - but one infinite in meaning - of God.

We have spoken about the responsibility of the Church for the preservation and for the propagation of the divine Revelation, a responsibility which burdens each member of the Church.

But the mission of preaching it must be entrusted in a special way to some of the community's members, for the people are also limbs of the history, living into the body and having to occupy themselves with the things necessary to their existence, they cannot exclusively dedicate their spiritual powers to the preaching of the Revelation and to their preparing for this work. There must be destined certain persons to the role of bearing the Church's permanent responsibility for transmitting the Revelation.

In this way, the resurrected Jesus Christ clothes in His reality - the resurrected reality - increasingly greater parts of the historical humanity, being contemporary with its development like church. The intimacy between Him and the believers of the Church it is not accomplished like a phenomenon of the nature, but through the spirit, through the personal communication, the man getting righteous through faith, and Him waiting for the man and urging him with the love.

The new reality, which it is bathed and constituted the unity of the Church in, like a communion between people and between them and Jesus Christ, it is the love of the Savior, manifested also through His sacrifice on Golgotha.

And the love is not an organic substance, but a connection between subjects. Through love it is overcome the difference of the existence plans between people and Christ. The faith makes them surpassing the spreading force of the time, by concentrating them on the direction of a living of a full present, dominated and filled up with the tension for Jesus Christ. The faith makes them stretching over the sinful form of the time towards the reality of Christ, and through His love, Jesus Christ, in fact, He comes closer and He enters the connection with them, and He overflows Himself into their form of life.

The overflowing of the new reality of Jesus Christ through the love that was built through sacrifice, when there is the concentrated faith, especially, it is accomplished, especially, through the Holy Mysteries.

And this is because into the Holy Mysteries, more than in any other moment, the entire Church prays together with the believer and it confesses. Where is the faith of everybody, and the love of everyone together, and towards Jesus Christ, there His love is more penetrating, and more efficient, and there His grace overflows with the whole its power.

But in this book, we cannot afford to treat widely about the Church and about all its aspects. We highlighted only a few considerations on the Church, as many as were absolutely needed in connection with our theme. We want only to accentuate that between the Church and the ascended Jesus, there is no separation. The place where He is, and the heart of the Church, they coincide. The Church, in this sense, it stretches from earth to heavens. The humanity of Jesus is elevated in the same time in the central intimacy of the ones who believe, in the supreme closeness to everybody. That is why, one cannot say that the grace of the Holy Mysteries, including of the ordination, it comes from Christ Who would stay somewhere isolated from Church, but by coming from Christ, it is coming from the depth of the Church⁸⁴.

⁸⁴ The dogmatists say that the grace of the Holy Mysteries it is “deposited” into the Church (Andrutsos, w. c. p. 235), that the Church is the “kingdom of the grace”, (Makarios, The Orthodox Dogmatic Theology, translated by Gherasim Timus, the second Tome, Bucharest, 1887, p. 239). But the divine grace cannot be cogitated like an entity of energy standing by itself, separated from Christ. Where the divine grace is, there Christ is, like a source of the divine grace. The Church is the depository of the divine grace, like one which is into Christ or it has Christ like a basis of its entire being and power.

Thus, we understand the truth that Jesus suffers together with all the members of the Church, purifying their sufferance and making it easier. By being Him the intimate basis of the Church and of the spiritual life of every one of us, He is in the same time, the bearer of all our pains.

We told before that through ascent it has been instituted, to the rudder of the Universe, together with God-the Man, a human heart. We can add now that, because of this helmsman of the Universe is the Head of the Church, and the Church's heart, the Church itself participate somehow to this supreme dignity. Jesus said that the one who believes with power he can move the mountains from their place. But this is only for into the faith of that one it is concentrated the belief of the entire Church and the power of Christ Who is into the Church." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Through everything Jesus Christ did until His ascent on the right hand of the Father, He laid the basis of our salvation; He objectively saved us, like the dogmatics says. He gave satisfaction, through His sacrifice, to the godlike justice, He defeated through His resurrection the power the death had upon the human nature, and He received through His ascent and through His placing on the right hand of the Father, the whole godlike power in order to put it at the disposition of the attraction of all the people in the region situated above death and sin.

Now it starts the work of fructification of the objective salvation through the personal conquest of the people.

Serge Bulgakov sees only from this moment of the placing of Jesus Christ on the right hand of the Father, starting His kingly dignity. On earth, Jesus would have exercised only the prophetic calling and the hierarchal service, the first one until the transfiguration like introduction to the passions, and the second one, after that point. Only since Jesus would have shown Himself like a King on earth, rather prefiguring His future glory, namely when He entered Jerusalem. The wonders, the resurrection, and the ascent, they wouldn't have been acts of the kingly dignity, but the first ones of His prophetic calling, and the last ones of His ministration as high priest service.

The opinion of Serge Bulgakov seems to have two powerful reasons:

1. Jesus Himself declared near to His ascent: "All the power has been given to me in heaven and on earth". Until then, so, He wouldn't have had the kingly power. He would have had the power like almighty God, like the One Who exercised the power in the quality of supporter and providential God of the world, but not like an embodied hypostasis, worker of the salvation through the method of the spiritual conquest of the man. And this last one, it is envisaged when is about the three dignities of Jesus.

2. Jesus is recognized like Lord of the souls, and He becomes a subject of the cult, only after His ascent, when "His Kingdom" appears too: the Church.

In what regards the last consideration it may be told that, neither like a prophet-teacher was Jesus recognized in all His fullness while He stayed on earth. His high priesthood was even more exercised while surrounded by the people's understanding's darkness. Despite this, they were really unfolded on earth, but into a plan of objectivity. In some measure, in a clear-obscure way, for their work and sense were though noticed by a group of people. But the result of their objective work, accompanied by the understanding of that small group of people, had such efficiency, then, after His ascent to heaven, the entire huge meaning of the dignities exercised on earth in the objective hidden it entered in the light showing and into the recognizing. But the extent the prophetic and hierarchal work of Jesus were understood in, on earth from, it was understood, especially, on the basis of the power that He spread over His disciples.

Consequently, the kingly power Jesus had on earth, in some extent was noticed too. What was differently produced through the ascent it is the elevation of all the three dignities into a sphere of light and of recognition from the part of the people. All three dignities continue in heaven too. Jesus continues to intervene for us and to teach us through the Holy Ghost. It is true that what it determines, after the ascent, to be Jesus recognized in all His three dignities, it is the power manifested in resurrection, in the ascent and, especially, in the efficiency the Holy Ghost has upon hearts, namely through the kingly dignity. Though, through this manifestation of the kingly dignity, He does not unveil Himself to us like a king, but like a high priest and prophet. The power He plucks His recognition with, from us, it is the kingly power. But through it we see Him not only like a king who masters upon our hearts, but also like a high priest who seeks our salvation through His everlasting love. Even more, the kingly power, which He plucks His recognition with, from us, and which He masters upon us with, it grows up from His hierarchal sacrifice from history and from His hierarchal love from heaven. The kingly element is the power to make Him recognized and, in this regard, the placing on the right hand of the Father, by making Him master upon increasingly larger circles, it means the beginning of a new phase into the life of Jesus Christ. But what we find at Him through this recognition, it is His hierarchal and prophetic fervor. All of them are transposed through His ascent into an atmosphere of glory. The glory is the kingly fullness, but into the glory it is seen Jesus into the fullness of His saving work. If He had presented Himself after His placing on the right hand of the Father only like a king and not like a high priest too, and like a prophet too, He would have been an imposing and almighty king, like God is in His quality of upholder, and not a Savior King, Who works through spiritual means upon the spirit of the man. He wouldn't have been King into the saving mission, King on the basis of the custody to save the world. Only just because He is King and Lamb, in the same time, His kingly dignity to which He was elevated like man too, it is a different one than His kingly dignity into the frame of the work of upholding of the world. The power which Jesus Christ have been given with, through His placing on the right hand of the Father, it is not the relocation of Him into the function of almighty upholder and director the world. From this He has never got out. This is the designation of Jesus like Savior with the whole godlike power, the putting of this power at His disposition for another goal and to be used with another method. Until then God was leading through force like an Almighty, upholding the laws of the nature and of the human individual and of the social life, without searching for the conquest of the souls.

Now, a divine person who has embodied Himself and Who suffered for people, because of His love for them, He receives - in His quality as their brother, Who wants to save them through the work of the love from their hearts - the whole power. The second godlike person is placed at the disposition of this work. It is not forsaken the work of the world's leading through the laws of the nature and of the social order, but, in addition to this work, it receives the whole godlike power the new work of the salvation of the people, through the method of love which whispers compelling inspirations and it pours, through this, power, out of its being, in the heart. The work of leading of the world, through the implacable force which upholds the nature and the social order incorporated into State, it remains only a substrate condition for the fulfillment of the savior work of the people. That is why, Jesus Christ, like King Savior, He takes the place of supreme honors and power. The method of world's government through direct almightiness it cedes the main place to the savior method.

Now Jesus is known by the people like a King, but like a King Who imposes us through His sufferance from earth and through His lenient care from heaven, like a King-Hierarch. His power is the Love. The Holy Ghost, with His all-penetrating godlike power, He does no longer stay only in the service of the life and of the natural perfection, but He puts Himself into the service of the savior work of Jesus Christ, by making His love to penetrate to the heart of the human subjects, by working into their interior in order to make them sensitive to the love of Jesus Christ.

This idea, that the kingly dignity of Jesus it is also a service and not a manifestation of forced almightiness, it is largely developed by Serge Bulgakov, without seeing instead what gives this kingly dignity of Jesus a character of service, namely just its interweaving with the high priest service. The providential king is Son from ever and ever, and now He has become King-Savior, King-Lamb, King Who works through the force of the love into brotherly hearts. This is the power given Him at the ascent (Mt. 28: 18). But this kind of power was held into a certain sense by Jesus, also on earth. Bulgakov recognizes like a kingly act on earth only the entry into Jerusalem. Though, abstracting it from the other acts, even though His word of teaching, Jesus manifested His power upon the souls, like otherwise Bulgakov himself confesses (p. 455).

Jesus, seated to the right hand of the Father, He did not finish His savior mission, but He continues it especially on this third ministration, by bringing His world under dominion. The Apocalypse impressively describes this fight of Jesus, fought both by Him and by His followers for the victory upon the powers of the evil. "The imposition of the kingdom it is accomplished into the fight for the kingdom with the master of this world, with the forces of the Antichrist, which fight the forces of Christ. It would be impossible the adversity of Antichrist to refer to the mastery of God-the Creator upon the creation. The adversity of Antichrist would be impossible to refer at the dominion of God-Creator over the creation. Here is about the kingdom of Jesus-the Man into world and He works in this regard with the godlike almightiness from this world, not with an army and not through force, but with the godlike Ghost" (p. 447).

The final result of this fight, namely the imposing of the Kingdom of God through Word and Ghost, it is indicated in 1 Co. 15: 22-28: "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order: Christ the first fruit; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming. Then cometh the end, when He shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when He shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. For He must reign, till He hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For He hath put all things under his feet. But when He saith all things are put under Him, it is manifest that He is excepted, which did put all things under Him. And when all things shall be subdued unto Him, then shall the Son also Himself be subject unto Him that put all things under Him, that God may be all in all".

So Jesus continues His work of salvation of the word, He continues to do this ministration to the Father through the three functions which He has assumed at embodiment and, especially, through the one of the King-Savior, which is different from the one of King-Providential, on the basis of which He is not fulfilling a ministration to the Father. The target of this ministration like King-Lamb it is to bring back the creation into the intimacy of God, to remove the border of the sin and of the death which is between the world and the Creator, in order again God to be in everything. This conquest of the world it cannot be manifested by forcedly almightiness through the majestic dignity. That is why the Son of the Father humbled Himself, by making Himself King-Lamb and striving in the course of the history to bring the souls back, through love and persuasion, at first under His dominion like King-Lamb and then to submit them and Himself under the dominion of the Father. Then the Son will end His mission and He will no longer fulfill this intermediary role between the world and the Father. Will the Son then disrobe Himself of the three ministrations and intermediary dignities, which He has accomplished the bringing of the world to the Father through? From the Epistle towards Hebrews, it would turn out that He remains forever high priest; like so, it would turn out from the Apocalypse, which continues to speak not only about God, but also about the Lamb, even after the end of this world, and “the tabernacle of God is with men” and when “God will be with them” (Rev. 21: 3, 23). But the Son will have the three dignities only like titles of glory for the work that He has accomplished, like a crown of His endeavor, basing the gratefulness of the saved ones towards Him also like a crowning of the definitive union between God and people, and not like a continuation of the work of salvation.

Once reestablished the union of love between God and creation, God won't appear to the world saved and made like His kingdom, only like a forceful providential, but also like a loving Father. For the saved ones, not being necessary the punishing function, there is no longer a difference between the form which God shows Himself into, like a Savior and God, and like All-Upholder. The All-Upholder Father clothes Himself up in appearance of love. The Son unveils us the Father, like He truly is. This function of true unveiling of the Father it is fulfilled by the Son in the entire course of the history. Where He descends on heart, He descends together with the Father.

The consummation of this unveiling of God like a loving Father, it equals to the full submission of the creation under His feet, out of love, the defeat of the death and of the sin. So, in fact, far from renouncing to the image which the Son conquered the creation with, the Father too will cloth Himself up in that image.

This fight of the Son for the conquest of the world it is a fight of a king, but a King-Servant, and this fight lasts to the end of this age. As He conquers ground, He grows up into His kingly glory, but it also comes closer the moment which the Father's kingdom be installed on.

Of course, the Son in His fight for the conquest of the world through the Ghost of His mouth, a fight which He wages from the right hand of the Father, this fight enjoys the godlike power which He receives from the Father. That is way it is spoken into the quoted place from the Epistle towards the Corinthians, also about the Father, like about the One Who submits everything under the feet of the Son. The same thing is said into the Epistle towards Hebrews 10: 12-13, like a commentary to the Psalm number 2, 8: “(Heb. 10: 12-13) But this man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins forever, sat down on the right hand of God. From henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool”. The history, like a wide frame into which the salvation is being consummated, it is being led by the providential and the almighty God. The troubles coming upon the people, the suggestions that are offered them by the situations of the natural life, the historical events: all of them serve like reasons for and advices towards receiving of the word administered by the Church in the name of Jesus Christ like God Savior. In this way, not only the history needs the Church, but also the church needs the history, in order to conquer the souls of the people for Jesus Christ.

This sense of the history, namely of being the environment which is carried the fight of Jesus Christ into, in order to restore the rule over His kingdom, it was unveiled in the Apocalypse. The Apocalypse - meaning unveiling – it is the apocalypse of the history, like an unveiling of the internal sense of the history⁸⁵. The big book, which is not opened except by the Lamb who sits “like stabbed” on the throne, it is the future content of the history. When He takes the book - the One Who sits on the throne - He is appointed in the ministration of the King-Savior, and He starts the fight for imposing His kingdom (chapters: 5, 6, 7). This happens in the moment of the ascent to heaven and of the placing on the right hand of the Father. Jesus, though, He does not fight isolated for conquering the world, but through the ones on earth who believe in Him, those ones manifesting His power as high priest and king. He has made those: together kings and priests with Himself (Rev. 5: 10).

With the opening of the first seal, it begins the history full of the problem of salvation and of the fight for Christ. This fight takes place in the same time, also into the world of the ghosts from earth. The fight gradually increases. As time progresses, the forces of the evil become more radical and in increasingly terrible offensives, because the man who is used like and instrument by them, he increases in passions and refinement. That is why, the fight between Christ and Satan, on the measure on which it gets bitter and it gets closer to the culminating moments, it is accompanied by increasingly more history’s turbulences and by cataclysms into the nature.

Because the opposition of the evil is becoming increasingly radical, the man is forced to decide in a categorical manner to be with or against Christ. They cannot live into a compromise. In this way, the main goal of the big and of the small Apocalypse (Mt. 24-25, Mk. 13, Lk. 21) it is the one to determine the believers towards manhood, towards watchfulness and towards resilience into trials. The history of the Church, into the frame of the general history, it will not be an idyll – like the first Christians may have been thought – but an endless fight.

The Savior described, in general lines, the route of the future history and the signs which will anticipate the end, but He did not mention chronologically the moment of the end, declaring that only the Father knows that day (Mt. 13: 22). “No matter how this declaration of the Son it will be explained, it remains incontestable that here is announced a certain impossibility of the prediction of the day of the end... This impossibility can have diverse explanations: it means that this transcendent fact cannot be comprised in the human empirical consciousness, or that the man doesn't need this knowledge, or – and this explanation is the more important – that the arrival of the end it hangs on the participation and on the work of the man, fulfilled on the basis of his liberty, which must not be paralyzed or even affected by this unnecessary and unfit knowledge to his power (in the same way it is hidden, into the lack of knowledge, the personal death of the man)⁸⁶. From the fact that the end cannot be known, the Scripture pulls out for people the advice: "(Mt. 24: 44) Therefore be ye also ready: for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh".

⁸⁵ Bulgakov, w. c. p. 448.

The participation of the believers to the work of spreading the God's kingdom, of raising up of the Church, it is done not only through the word, but also through facts. As substantial the facts are, which somebody contributes with to the rising of the Church, as big will be the honor he will enjoy on the Day of Judgment. The growth of the God's Kingdom it is a common work of the mankind under the leadership of Jesus Christ. "In this general perspective it is impossible to understand «the human facts», namely the Kingdom with Christ and the participation to His kingly ministration in a transcendent-eschatological manner only, like a basis for the «reward» or, by and large, for the personal fate of one or another of the souls. This participation means also an apocalyptic – historical fusion, being considered like deeds of God on earth and into history among people"⁸⁷.

"After the embodiment the whole humanity of the mankind it is of Jesus and everything that is good in it belongs to Christ. He works into the mankind not only through the influence of His teaching and of His face, through the power of conviction, but also through Himself, through the unmediated power of His, through somewhat internal forcing, because "(Ga. 3: 27) For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ" and Christ lives into him (2: 20)... on the measure of this kingdom of His over and through people, it is somehow defeated the Ascent in its sense of remoteness of Christ to world, into which, according to His own promise, He still is always present, now and forever" (S. Bulgakov, p. 458).

S. Bulgakov goes even further, framing into this work of the history, led by Christ, the entire mankind, even the unbelievers. Through the fact that Christ has not taken an individual human nature but the human nature into its generality, His power connects together the mankind and the entire history. "That is why, not only the ones who knew Him into His life, but also the ones who didn't known Him, and even the ones who deny Him, all of them are partakers to Him and subjected to Him. The history of the mankind after Christ it is not only the history of the Christian mankind, but also of the humanity of Christ... The work of this community, contradictory and divided, includes in its synthesis the work of Jesus too". That is why the mankind will be judged like a whole, with its common work. "This together being and work with Christ, it does not abolish the personal liberty of the man, it does not make the man a blind tool. Though, through His internal power, the humanity of Christ leads everyone on their paths and it integrates their deeds to the common work, by preparing through them the path towards the transfiguration of the world or towards the end of this eon"⁸⁸.

⁸⁶ S. Bulgakov, w. c. p. 455.

⁸⁷ S. Bulgakov, w. c. p. 458.

To the eventual objection that this is a deterministic conception, which transforms the power of Christ into a natural one, S. Bulgakov mentions that through such "natural" power it can be understood a physical principle or a metaphysical principle, not only a person in relations with other persons. As proof he brings the resurrection of everybody, even of those who did not believe in Jesus. These ones are also determined by the power of Jesus, by the new energy brought by Him into world. "All the people are subjected to the resurrection, no matter the personal relation of each of them with Christ". "They resurrect not on the basis of a creator act of God the Almighty, but on the power of their internal relation with Christ, the first One resurrected from dead, this connection having, though, into the given case, not a personal character but a natural one".

If even the sinful ones resurrect on the basis of an internal connection with Jesus Christ, this connection exists from before, from the course of the historical life. "If the entire natural mankind resurrect into Christ, why would not be tied to Him also in the historical life? This is because the life, the death, and the resurrection are united and this connection could not be reduced only to the resurrection, into which case this would be an external case, without any internal basis into the human life related to Christ, a deus ex machina which forcedly imposes to the human nature"⁸⁹.

This global vision of S. Bulgakov can comprise into itself a truth only in a certain interpretation. The connection of the believers with Jesus Christ, though based on the ontological closeness, on the basis of the identity of nature between them and Christ, it is actualized through an element which form the content of the personal relation. The closeness of Christ it is in a certain way perceived by the unbelievers too, if not otherwise, at least like a master present in some of the fellow humans, like a general content of the society and of the human history. In front of this presence, they adopt a hostile attitude; somehow, Christ embodies for them a personal adversary. But the adversity is a kind of connection between the human persons and a factor which determines their behavior and the content of the future historical development. The man learns from the One he hates, that he is positively influenced in his preoccupations. The adversaries go together into the evolution of their contents of life. By fighting each other, they borrow a lot of preoccupations and problems, but they give them another answers. The same content is in both of them, but one sees it in a certain way, and the other one into the up side down version. The progress of the good ones into the understanding of the Revelation and in living the Revelation it is conditioned right by the progress of an atheistic thinking. And the progress of the Antichristian ideology and hate, it is conditioned right by the Christianity.” (Stăniloae 1993)

⁸⁸ S. Bulgakov, w. c. p. 459.

⁸⁹ S. Bulgakov, p. 460.

“Killing this weakness sneaked within nature, strengthening the nature through asceticism, it has become possible through the mortification and through the life-maker death of Jesus Christ. The godhead’s power helped Him to overcome His nature’s love for pleasure and fear of death, to make it, therefore, firm. And the mysterious bond which the nature from any human hypostasis is with the human of His divine-human hypostasis in, by becoming through a living and working faith an increasingly effective bond, it determines that force regained by His nature to be communicated to the nature of the other people too, who believe in Him.” (Stăniloae 1992: 10)

“What essentially differs the Christian spirituality from any other spirituality it is, besides the fact that the Christian spirituality doesn’t affirm the identification of the man to the godhead or to the total essence, it is its Christological character. The Christian’s ascension towards God it has Jesus Christ not only as norm but also as way, according to His declaration: “I am the way...” (Jn. 14: 6). Nobody can advance towards the mysterious union with God by following another way than Christ (= the Way), and nobody in this union can reach beyond Christ. And our connection with Christ it is done and it is strengthened through union with His Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 1992: 38)

“Jesus Christ is the bridge stretched from God to the realm of our humanity, through His one hypostasis, a hypostasis joining both the godlike nature and the human nature.” (Stăniloae 1992: 39)

“Even if we make abstraction of embodiment, the Son of God is the One “in Whom all the things are settled”, for “in Him all the things have been made” (Col. 1: 16-17). He is not only that one in Whom the Father looks at His own brightness, but He is also that One in Whom the creation can contemplate the glory of the Father. By having a revelatory purpose, the Son has been appointed for - and in report with the world - he to be the Trinity's Revelation. When God undertook the bringing of the world out of nothing to existence, to the Son has belonged the role of standing with the world in the most immediate contact. The deeps of absolute transcendence of the godhead, which the world cannot become aware of by any means that they exist, those depths, become through the Son, somehow cognoscible by the mankind. Through His Son, God is to the world by and large, a voice sounding within nature, as sign proving His existence, namely a "Word", and also through the Son, God is to the world, somehow, "Rationality", namely a reality that can be understood to a point, or cause which the world is ordered through, it is explained, and it explains all things to itself. That's why the world has been created through the Son, in order to be capable of receiving the relation with the Son. The Son is the reflex of light of the Father within world, through the "rationalities" or through the meanings and the purposes dwelling within all things, without which the world would be sunk in the most discouraging darkness and lack of meaning. Even the imperfect, unilateral, and non-savior ascension to God, through our rationality touched by the sin's disease, it still is only an ascension through the Son and into the Son as supreme Rationality of all things and as the last one that we can somewhat notice out of God." (Stăniloae 1992: 39)

"God has made through the embodiment of this "Word", of this "Rationality" of His, a step forwards in exiting His transcendence and coming close to us. He Has made Himself to us, in Christ, a "voice" of love, sounding of all the affection familiar to us, of a human being. But this means that the man himself has been made capable of becoming environment through which the Son of God communicates himself to us. He is now in a maximum closeness to us and in an ontological bond, and that makes that in the whole road we ascend towards God we are not alone, but with Him and in Him. But this objective fact is corroborated to the subjective fact, manifested in the conscience awakened by the Holy Ghost, that this ascension we do not do it out of our powers, as some enterprise which we are going to conquer the divinity through, a divinity staying in front of us passively and impersonally. As Christians we have, starting with the lowest level of our spiritual state, the conscience sensitized by the Ghost that in this tiresome and long undertaking we are ceaselessly in connection with Jesus Christ, Who stays next to us, upholding our walking, but Who also stays in front of us as role-model, calling us towards Him and towards a fuller communion with Him, like a friend does, a friend who is better than you in all respects, and who is next to you on the road you walk towards the moral consummation, but who is also above you and always attracting you there. Where there isn't Jesus Christ, where the godhead is reckoned as an absolute transcendence, the godhead cannot have a personal face for the eyes of the adherents; in such a case the godhead is conceived according to the nature of the hidden forces, which one tries to approach to on occult ways, ways that belong only to the human factor, that force not having a personal initiative and the capacity of offering a loving aid by entering the personal communion.” (Stăniloae 1992: 39-40)

“Rather Christ makes Himself contemporary to us for the life of each of us it has its uniqueness, which cannot be lost. Jesus participates to all our sufferance, easing it, and He fights together with us the temptations and our sins, and he strives together with us in order to achieve the virtues, and he takes our true nature from under the sin’s seal.” (Stăniloae 1992: 42)

“We know that there is an intercommunication from man to man; it is a fact that, on the measure the people are interested in another, they pass to one another, mysteriously, their burdens, their pains, and their joys; it is a fact that one can feel all the other’s states, by receiving that one in himself, or by penetrating within that one. But if the man reaches through the sensitiveness of the love to know and to understand his fellow humans, by burdening himself with the living of all their experiences, all the more can this be done by Jesus, the culminant Man, the consummate Man in His love for the fellow humans, the Man Whom His consummate cleanness of sin and therefore of egotism it gives a unique sensitiveness. He is nigh to everybody, he notices with supreme finesse what is in everyone, and he participates generously and without sin to the vibrations of all hearts, to their good aspirations and to their struggles against evil, by fortifying them.” (Stăniloae 1992: 42-43)

“The embodied, resurrected, and ascended Son of God, He is the bridge between the believers’ life on earth and what we will be able to have in the future life. In Him we advance in this life and through Him we will advance in the future life. In Him is accomplished the whole prophecy for the time of our life on earth and for eternity.” (Stăniloae 2005: 18)

“Each one of the acts of Christ represents a spiritualization of the humanity assumed by Him, but this means a growing up of it in freedom, in authenticity. This fact is shown to us in the embodiment of the Son of God by the persistence of the assumed human nature and by the freely submitting Christ under the conditions of the human life. The embodiment act is an act exceeding our power of understanding, so that we must understand it as spiritual as possible, in a less objectified mode as possible. “The spiritual foundation of the reality” or the divine free and unconditional force it makes the human nature as its consistent and firm environment for acting upon creation, by achieving with this environment such a tight union than they form together a sole Person, working upon creation in a human mode, but in a degree of supreme spiritual intensity and height. This is, on one hand, a kenosis (a humiliation) of the Godhead, and on the other hand, it is a deification of the humanity, but neither the Godhead's kenosis changes the Godhead according in His nature, nor the deification of the humanity changes the humanity in its nature. The human is elevated in freedom, to a supreme degree of spiritualization, to the capacity of being subject to the divine work, and the Godhead descends, in freedom, to the mode of manifestation through human acts and forms. The supreme humbleness of the human it is one with the greatest raising, and this humbleness is the point of meeting the descending Godhead. The human's humbleness means surrendering his will to the divine will, but this means also the greatest effort of ascending to wanting some target of supreme quality, which are the target of the divine will. And the divine will doesn't force the human will in ascending to this wanting, but it helps the human will in its efforts of achieving this supreme ascent, by renouncing in a kenotic manner to any forcing. Everything is here spiritual relation, interior and free, and nothing is here mythological violence from a superior force manifesting itself with "objective" pressure upon a worldly reality which is physically overwhelmed. The embodiment elevates the human assumed by Christ on a supreme level, but this is the supreme level of the human freedom and authenticity, namely of the human spirituality. We must understand the embodiment of the Son of God within this spiritual contour, by maintaining the teaching about embodiment as a reality with a permanent and general significance, and not to "demythologize" it by considering it as a capricious and unreal element, imagined by the phantasy of an inferior mentality." (Stăniloae 2005: 19-20)

"About Christ's crucifixion on the cross we mustn't speak too much, for it is accepted even by Bultmann and by his more or less direct disciples. We must say only that the crucifixion of Christ has a unique, universal, and definitive importance for everybody's salvation or spiritualization, but only considered in connection with the embodiment, as a consequence of the embodiment. The crucifixion meant the supreme spiritualization of the human nature only by being accepted in a full freedom and out of a perfect love for people. But the premise of this kind of accepting the crucifixion was laid down by the embodiment. The crucifixion was the decisive act of a human will, elevated on the supreme level, at wanting eth superior targets of the God's will, in the conditions of the feuding and divided mankind, as means of achieving the unification of the human wills by conforming them to God's will." (Stăniloae 2005: 20)

"If Christ-God through embodiment, living, and crucifixion, he worked perfectly frame within the conditions of the man into history, but of a man elevated to a culminant spiritualization of His will, the act and the state of the resurrection no longer belong to the history, the history live and endured by all people with various degree of will's strength. The resurrected Christ no longer works directly within history, as he worked until His crucifixion, and like all the people work until they are alive. If the Christ's life on earth and His crucifixion aren't myths, for they were real acts into history, if His embodiment isn't a myth, for through it appeared within history a real man, and the history is the central action environment of "the spiritual foundation of the reality", then His resurrection and His state after resurrection won't be myths either, for they do not bring a strange being in the history itself. The Apostles come to know about the resurrected Christ when He wants to show Himself to them, namely to get out from the supra-historical, invisible plan. The resurrected Christ is on a spiritualization level which the entire mankind will be elevated on. And only the ones who somehow have opened themselves by faith to this level, they could see Christ on that level. The resurrected Christ proved to be equally real as the historical Christ, but on a different level, on a level which we cannot experience and understand. We only know that the resurrected Christ is the historical Christ, elevated on a level superior to the present history, on a level superior to our present experience and action. He is advanced to the future plan of the present life. In a way, the believers are continuously between the historical and the supra-historical life, between their passing life and the life of the resurrection. The living Christ isn't outside a connection with our historical life, neither our historical life is outside a connection with the life of the resurrected Christ; they are complementary to one another. But our life still remains historical in its autonomy, in its freedom. Our life will tend towards the life of the resurrection only if it wants to, it listens to the requirements of the life of the resurrection only if it wants to, and it receives the perspectives opened by the life of the resurrection also only if it wants to." (Stăniloae 2005: 21)

"If, by and large, it is in progress a process of penetrating the creation by the "spiritual foundation of the reality", this process is being now facilitated by the fact that in a point of the creation this process reached its culminant result and that on that point the creation advanced to the heart of the "spiritual foundation of the reality". We are attracted through the resurrected Christ especially towards the state of resurrection, for the resurrected Christ, though being in a plan superior to us, he is, on the other hand, One of us, namely He is in an ontological and spiritual bond with us. Thus works God the "spiritual foundation of the reality", out of this point which is ontologically connected with us, which is an invisible center of ours.?"

The same things we must say about the ascent of Christ.

Christ's bond with us, His influence upon us, our gradual likeness to Him, our spiritualization like Him, all of these are exercised by Christ through the Holy Ghost within Church. This is the prolongation of the act revealed on the day of Pentecost.” (Stăniloae 2005: 22)

“By installing this image of God in front of the people, and this being also the culminant model of theirs, namely Christ, the purpose of the prophetic, inconsistent images, or of the shadows, it ceased (Hebrews X: 1). This is a model ontologically tied on every man, with a real efficiency upon the man. “The Law’s shadow has passed”, in order the hypostasis of the reality to come, full of efficiency upon humanity.” (Stăniloae 2005: 28)

“These schematization of the Jesus’s image in the Orthodox icons it is justified by the fact that Jesus, though He was man, He wasn’t like any other man who is only a man. Jesus’s humanity was sinless and it has been carried by the godlike hypostasis. So, the face of Jesus painted on icons won’t shows a natural humanity, as we can find at the usual people. Jesus’s face must express only the general, the abstract traits of the humanity, by being let aside everything that we meet in the concrete countenances of the natural people. There will be drawn only the foundation lines forming the frame of the humanity. In this way, the painter will avoid to affect the countenance of Jesus with some psychological sinful element, and the flight of the believer soul towards the heavenly Jesus won’t be impeded by the likeness of the image from the icon to any concrete man. The portrait which only that much of the Jesus’ humanity is shown in, of course it will be in the truth, in a general conformity with His countenance, though it won’t be in the whole truth.” (Stăniloae 2005: 56)

“If in Christ hadn’t been preserved our nature, all the aspect of our nature would have become characteristic to the godlike nature of the Word, and this one would have become mixed and it would have lost the simplicity and the consubstantiality both with the Father and with the Holy Ghost and with His Mother and with us. By this, the perspective itself of the salvation, namely of our eternal and happy persistence, it would disappear.” (Stăniloae 2005: 173)

“The human image is a servant image relatedly to the image of God that is the image of Master. God preserve in Christ, differing from the servant image willingly assumed by Christ, His image as Master, and when He shows His godlike image through the servant image, it is obvious that His Master image it differs from the image of a servant and it is endless in the richness of His glory as Master, in comparison to what a servant image is by as such. Although, the image of servant has become in Christ image of the Master, without Him to cease being felt as Master too. The Master adopts the humble and brotherly behavior towards His servants, but by doing this He elevated the servant image in Himself and in His servants’ still, one always feels that the elevation comes from Him, as from the Master. The servant is made together-son with the Father's Son, but the man still feels that he has become that by being assumed by Christ, and not by himself. The Master wanting to be servant, in order to make His servant as son, He doesn't forget that He remains always Master, as he doesn't forget also that He is servant become Son too. And the fact that He can be simultaneously both, He shows also the capacity of the servant image to be transparent to the image of Master, of the capacity of the Master to make Himself servant, namely the high quality He has given to the servant, through creation." (Stăniloae 2005: 194-195)

"If Christ had had a universal humanity which could be contemplated only with the mind, He wouldn't have existed as concrete man, but His humanity could have been contemplated only in the other human individuals. Namely, the Son of God has made Himself man not in the sense that He was born as a concrete man, but in the sense that He bears all of us, without being one of the men. Christ isn't Who individualized as man, but all of us constitute Him as universal humanity." (Stăniloae 2005:197-198)

"Christ isn't only generally a man, but He is an individual man too. That's why, along with the generic appellative as man, which He is one with all the people in, He has also the proper name Jesus, this name showing Him as Hypostasis differing from all the other people." (Stăniloae 2005: 198)

"Of course, the individually borne humanity, or in an own hypostasis, by the Son of God, it doesn't deprive Him of His quality of comprising in Himself as man, everything characteristic to the human nature, namely the human nature in its universality. Jesus reestablished in Himself, more than any other human person, the universality of the human nature, not narrowing it, by not diminishing it through any egotism tendency and through any opposition to the other people, as it happens to the people dominated by sins. The hypostasis doesn't mean narrowing of the generality of the human nature, but it means the mode of existing as a who, which in his normality it accomplishes its tendency of self-giving to everybody, of concretely manifesting as belonging to everybody. While the human nature is virtually common to everybody, it actualized this fact through hypostasis, for this characteristic not to be only a fact of nature, but to be also a fact of decision and of love. From this point of view Christ is more universal than any man, He is the universal Man by excellence, so that in Him there is no tendency of separation from the other people, but of comprising everybody and, by this, He has in Himself what vibrates to everybody's feelings. In Him we find all of us, in any good tendency, in any good feeling. He suffers with everybody and for everybody, for, in a way, He comprises everybody, but without ceasing to be an own Person, and the others, likewise, they do not cease to be own persons. In this direction are developed all the ones following Him." (Stăniloae 2005: 198-199)

Christ shows us through His life lacking of greediness and pride, through His crucifixion, through all the good He overpours upon the ones loving Him, through the commandments of loving our enemies too, that no evil, that no egotistic tendency is within Him, but there is only love within Him. He always elevates us towards good, through the union with Him, through the power given by Him, and through the commandments given us by Him.” (Stăniloae 2005: 234)

“It is most easy to the man to see God - Who gives the man the assurance of the eternal life – through Christ. This is for Christ isn’t a limited light, but He is the light by excellence, a light come as the good of the eternal life within world, by the fact that Christ is both God, providing us the eternal life, and He is man too, and Who overcame the death of His humanity, and Who defeats by that also our death, the death of all people. Christ is the light of the world, for He came within world as One Who doesn’t exclusively belong to the world, but He came from above the world, and he has brought within world the power that helps us to get rid of the death which the world leads us to. Christ doesn’t belong only to the world, as the other people do, for if that had been the case, He would have walked into the world’s darkness too. Christ is God coming within world, but coming as man and, therefore, He wasn’t defeated by the world’s miseries and death, but he endured them willingly, and he overcame them.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 50-51)

“Without Christ, the world would have been to the man only that one that provides him with passing pleasures, pleasures followed by hardships, by hard to endure illnesses and, at the end, the total death. Christ is God coming within world as man, He remaining God too, and therefore He didn’t crave for the passing pleasures, but He endured the world’s hardships (hunger, tiredness etc.) and death, in order to cross Himself through them as man and in order to cross us too to the eternal life.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 51)

“Christ, as man, has made Himself to us - and He has remained as God too – as path and target, not only through human words full of right teaching and of godlike urges, but He has done that also through the role-model of man which He has given us, and also by giving us the power of following Him as role-model. He has made Himself such a model, due to His love for people. He has unveiled to us, by doing so, the value of the human being, and He has given us the power of following the example of living into Him as God made man. By all of these, He has lightened the value and He has strengthened our capacity which we are called to actualize it to us, into Him.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 52)

“The darkness of not knowing Christ it means also that the man doesn’t know the target of his life. Christ, as God made man, he is a role-model as man and, as such resurrected from dead to the eternal life, he has shown us that we have in Him a target of our life on earth, when we live it according to His role-model and when we give out life as a living sacrifice to God, for our fellow humans. Then we reach the resurrection, namely the eternal life into happiness.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 53)

“The capacity given by the Son of God the Creator, to the man in order to unite with Him, until making Himself man, it was shown in the highest mode in the fact that Christ has made Himself man, or person of the human nature, out of a representative of the human kind, namely the Virgin Mary (Mt. 1: 2-3; Isa. 7: 14; Lk. 1: 35).

If Christ hadn't been born as man out of the Virgin, He wouldn't have been God and He wouldn't have brought to the world a light from above the world, showing thus the man as destined to eternity, but He would have left the world and the mankind locked up in the world's matter. He would have been proven as framed into this world's laws, and he would couldn't have elevated the world on a superior plan of eternal happiness. If he had been born like any other man, He would have died like any other man too, without being able to resurrect either Him or the people whose nature He has assumed. His cross wouldn't have been savior if he had been born bearing the sin and the sin would have submitted Him to death, like on everybody, so that He wouldn't have accepted willingly His death for the other people, in order to defeat the death, but He would have endured the death unwillingly, for His own guilt, as a law which He would have submitted Himself to. He wouldn't have brought anything new in the world. The neo-Protestant groups are consistent when, by rejecting the Christ's birth out of Virgin Mary, they also reject His cross as endured for the people with the power of defeating the death received through it. Only thus Christ showed Himself as Savior through the cross, namely as luminous light elevating us up from the death's darkness, for He showed Himself as Savior God through His birth out of Virgin. Only thus we can ask Him for, at the Holy Liturgy: “Wash, Lord, the sins of the ones who have been remembered here, with Your honored blood”. Only thus we can say, also at the Holy Liturgy: “Behold, there have, through cross, come joy to everybody”. We've said that the Son of God descended to the man, and he elevated the man on His level, by grace. The most He has done this to His Birth-Giver or, through Her, He elevated all of us at Him, us who believe in Him as God and in Her as Birth-Giver of God; He elevated us from the law of the meaningless and definitive death. This has been done by the fact that He was born out of Virgin, also by taking in account Her words: “bridge truly crossing us from death to life” (The Akathist of the Mother of the Lord). Only by being Him born out of Virgin, She was made as “heavenly ladder which the Lord has descended at us”. She has been made the “Mother of the Light”. The fact that the Son of God has brought the light to the world, through His birth as man out of Virgin Mary, it was shown by the light seen by the shepherds, as surrounding a multitude of angels (Lk. 2: 9). And that the Son of God has humbled Himself by mankind Himself man, it was shown also in the fact that He was born in a manger.

b. Christ Jesus makes Himself man, but he remains God. Only by these two qualities he shows His maximum closeness to people and His quality as Savior. Only by descending to the quality as man, but by elevating the man to the quality of God as Person, Christ elevates the people to the equality to Himself, without confounding the godhead to the humanity. Christ affirms in His birth out of Virgin both His quality as Creator, as God, making Himself man in a supra-natural mode, and His quality as man, by being born out of a representative of the mankind. He wasn't born as man only out of people, but neither was He born out of people without using the human nature, being born out Virgin. He doesn't made Himself man only by creating Himself as man, without the connection with the existing mankind, because in such a case He wouldn't have shown the cherishing granted at the beginning to the created mankind, but He is born as man out of mankind but also by using His creator power, in order to show the restoring of the mankind as it was at the beginning. Only thus Christ elevates Himself as man above man, by still remaining in union with the people. And this shows how much was the man created as able to be united with God. Christ makes the man able to become also as God - not the man by himself but through Christ - or nature of the godlike Person, through His born out of Virgin Mary. Christ has made the mankind greater, capable of giving birth to God as man, but not without the God's power. A greater closeness of the mankind to God couldn't have been accomplished and, though, this doesn't mean pantheistic identification of God, in the maximum closeness through love, of the Creator Who has remained, thus, as differing from creature. He makes Himself as Person of the creation (of the creature), but He still remains Creator. In this is shown the great honor granted to the creature. He has made out of a creature a Mother of His, but He has done that without ceasing to be God. He has entered the relation as Son with Her as Mother, but without ceasing to be Her Creator too. This is because, if the case was different, He wouldn't have been except an existence submitted to the laws of the created general nature, and He wouldn't actually have elevated His created Birth-Giver on the level as Mother of the Creator. That's why She is placed in the highest closeness to Him, or She is elevated to the most appropriate position as true Mediator between all the people and Christ, but still being only praying for us. That's why we say: "Rejoice, the mediator of all people towards God. Rejoice, the everybody's reconciler with God. Rejoice, the One Who delivers the world out of troubles, through Your mediations". We decidedly say to Her: "Rejoice, the One Who has united God with the people". But She has done this by Christ's will, for Christ has created the mankind able to be united with God and, that's why, He especially has given to the Virgin Mary a special role in accomplishing His union with the people, by taking in account Her special faith and cleanness.

Christ makes Himself as Son of Man by excellence, for He elevated the man at His state of man without having a sick nature. Christ makes Himself as the new and healthy beginning of the mankind. The ones remaining in Christ they no longer fall down from the true humanity. And the true humanity isn't except the one strengthened by God. Christ has made Himself luminous light to us, also in the sense that he showed to us and he has made Himself again the beginning of the true mankind, and this reestablishes as true people and gives them the power not to fall again off this state, on the ones who are born out of Christ through His Holy Ghost. And only those ones inherit the Kingdom of God and the incorruptibility. If the ones born out of Adam are submitted to the definitive death, the ones born out of the second Adam they can inherit the eternal happy life (I Cor. 15: 17, 50).

d. The light, or the full meaning brought to the man in Christ, it is the man's endless happy life. And this has been brought by Christ by His birth, without sin, out of Virgin. Christ has made Himself, on this purpose, the Son of Man. But He has made Himself as Son of Man after Him being the Son of God and due to the fact that He was the Son of God. Only by the fact that Christ had God as Father since ever, He could made Himself also a Son of a Virgin human Mother. Only for He was Son of a heavenly Father He didn't need a father on earth, or He could make the human son of a Virgin Mother and, as such, he could save us. By being the Son of the heavenly Father, but by making Himself also the Son of a Virgin Mother, he could make us too as sons by grace of the heavenly Father, by giving us the Ghost Who He has from the Father as Son of the Father since ever, and as man born out of Virgin.

Christ is born, in the firstly, out of the heavenly Father, as Son of God, and then He makes Himself, by assuming the human nature, also as the Son of Man born out of Virgin, in order us, who are born firstly out of a father and of a mother on earth, to be born after, through His Ghost of Son of the Father, as sons of the heavenly Father. All of us must be born out of the heavenly Father in order us to be saved. But we can become sons of the heavenly Father through the One Who is since ever as Son of the heavenly Father, and then He was born also as Son of Man, born out of Virgin.

e. The power of giving birth to children, it is actually from God. But the woman gives birth after sinning, namely by passionate union with the man. On the other hand, was natural that the man, who isn't totally submitted to the rigid laws of the matter, and who, through his soul he is created through godlike breathing in the image of God, and who can use to a certain extent, freely, the nature's laws, and to aspire towards a live beyond the historical life even after his falling into sin, for the man has still remained in a certain conscious light, to be elevated up to the end in this freedom from the material laws, and to see his aspiration for luminous light as being fulfilled, for he is a meaning desiring creature, and he could achieve the eternal life.

This accomplishing has been restored through the Son of God made man. By overcoming the birth's corruption, He has overcome also the end of the corruption which is death. By this He enlarged to their fulness, the freedom and the aspiration, namely the man's character as luminous light, through the openness towards the eternal life, firstly in Himself as man, and then in all the people who, by uniting themselves with Him by faith, they receive the second birth, contrary to corruption, through the Holy Ghost, through Whom the believers advance towards overcoming the corruption through death, by nourishing themselves with His resurrected body, and by imitating His life, contrary to the sinful passions.

Without this accomplishing of the man as luminous light, this quality of his would have been meaningless, or it would have been a cause of torment, by his form of contradictory existence.

f. If the ancestral sin hadn't intervened, the successive human persons would have been born out of a union between man and woman, but a union not dominated by passion, but overwhelmed by the spirituality of the conscience namely that God Himself creates, through breathing, a new soul who organizes the material matter in a new body. Because of their passionate union, the man and the woman have lost this conscience. So, we have to think that God didn't create through His breathing only the Adam's soul, uniting it with the Adam's body composed of dust, and making Him in His image, but God also showed that He can do that with any new person, by placing on the common image of the Word a special and unrepeatable seal. God creates the unique soul of each person, in the same time with the beginning of that person's body's forming, out of the union between the man's seed with the forming capacity of the woman. This is for, otherwise, it is difficult to understand that in the same time with the forming of a new body, out of the union between a man with a woman, it occurs from their union also the soul of a new person as a result of the union of their souls. One mustn't cogitate that God is absent from the forming of a new man. God creates a new soul since the beginning of the forming of a new body from the union between a man and a woman, though this new soul bears also some of the characteristics of the parent's souls, which were concentrated in the man's seed and in the woman's forming capacity.

Through the parents have a contribution in composing the new person, by forming the body of the new man, the One Who makes that out of the parents' union to start, actually, the forming of the new person, it is the new person's soul, created by the breathing of God, within this composition since its beginning. God have given the pair of humans too, a responsibility in conceiving the new persons, but God is the One Who actually creates the new persons. The contribution of the parent is let to the humans also after their falling into sin, namely also after the bodily union is done in a passionate mode. That's why, the wedding is holy even after the people are influenced by the passionate pleasure of the union, after the falling into sin.

Of course, to the extent they are aware of their responsibility for composing a new person, the act of their bodily union is filled up with spirituality.

The fact that the bodily union is the occasion used by God for giving existence to a new person, in His image, imprinted with a special seal, it highlights the sin of the pair using the pleasure of the union while disregarding the responsibility of using it on the purpose which God has let it with, namely as occasion for bringing to existence a new person as a new image of God.

If God-the Word continues His work as Creator of human persons through the soul He places in their composition through the union of the pairs of people, of course that He can use their creator power in order to form, to Himself, directly, only through woman, the composition of an own body, which He instilled to, since the beginning, an own soul.

He is exercising now His power of creating people, in a fuller mode, by creating both a soul and a body borne by His own Person, namely by creating it through His own breathing, as in the case of the other people too, but in a body composed, by His power, out of woman as participant to the human nature. The creator word frames Himself, thus, amongst people, but he also is Creator of an own humanity in order to tie Himself as tightly as possible with the people and, by that, he becomes a permanent source of the humanity's renewal.

If it hadn't been like that, the mankind would have permanently remained spiritually ill and submitted to death, namely having a meaningless existence, and that would have been contrary to the nature given to the people by the Creator Word." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 59-67)

"Being close to Christ's Person, we can advance increasingly further, while walking on the path of the consummate union of the human nature with the godhead within Him, but without us ever reaching to be identical to Him. Christ is path to us, by helping us to make out of our humanity an increasingly transparent environment to the godhead, as His human nature it too, and an increasingly adequate means to the work of the godhead, as it is the humanity assumed by Christ, but without ever reaching the full this quality of His. He is, in other words, the way towards our deification by grace. And He is path to us, not only for we want to follow Him, by getting us ever closer to Him, but for he makes Himself path of ours, by giving us the power of impropriating His life. On this purpose, He dwells within us since our Baptism, or we dwell in Him. Thus, Saint Apostle Paul said: "As many in Christ you've been baptized, in Christ you've been dressed up too" (Gal. 3: 27), and: "I no longer live, but Christ lives within me" (Gal. 2: 20). Still, we must want to be in Him and we must want Him to be within us. And this will of ours, it is shown by our deeds, as fulfilling His commandments, or as fulfilling His will, that being the answer of our love to His love. Thus, Christ Jesus Himself says: "If you keep My commandments, I will remain within you... and you will remain in My love. And the one who remains in Me and I in him, that one will bring many fruits, because outside Me you can do nothing” (Jn. 15: 5, 7, 10).” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 71-72)

“The believer is into Christ, or he has Christ within him since baptism, he being as a branch in a vine, and by being imparted with His fruitful life. But the believer must increasingly advance in being imparted with Christ life, with His fruitful power, in order the believer to bring forth, at his turn, increasingly more fruits. That believer has Christ within himself in Christ’s quality as path towards increasingly more life, in union with Christ’s life, but the believer must constantly advance towards Christ. That’s why, both Christ and the Apostle John speak not about a motionless tarrying into Christ, but they speak about a “walking’ into Christ (Jo. 8: 12; I. Jo. 2: 11). Christ, after he resurrected, He has given us birth again, at our Baptism, but towards “living hope” in increasingly more true life (I Peter 1: 3). Without Christ, by living in the monotony and in the narrowness of a depleted existence, we cannot know a way and a target which to advance towards (I Jo. 2: 19). This is for only into Him, as the One Who has in Himself the limitless and endless life, which he can make us partaker to, we advance in the infinite life. By not advancing into Him, as Person Who communicates us the limitless life, we cannot advance in anybody in order to be us imparted with such a life. Only by advancing into Him, and by being us imparted increasingly more with the perfect love and with the resurrected life communicated us by Him, we can also advance into others’ love and life. Otherwise, we remain into our egotism, in our despise towards others, for in such a case we do not have the power of moving ourselves towards the union with them through love, because we do not advance in the union with Christ and in the endless life, without Him. The lack of love for Christ, united with the lack of love for our fellow humans, it keeps us in an agitation that doesn’t take us out of ourselves, namely it keeps us in darkness. “The one who hates his brother, he walks into darkness and he doesn’t know where he is going, for the darkness has blinded his eyes” (I Jo. 2: 11). Therefore, advancing into Christ it means advancing on the path leading us towards life, and this is shown also in our communication with others. This is for Christ is the path toward life. Christ came within world as luminous light, in the meaning of a true path towards the true life. By being increasingly more imparted with Him, of with life, we no longer walk into darkness, but we walk into light. Christ is the true Light, for He is life. He is, in His quality a luminous light too, also a path towards the true life: “And the Life showed Itself and we saw It and we preach you the eternal Life, Who was at the Father, and Who showed Himself to us... And this was the message we heard from Him and which we herald to you: that God is luminous light and there is not darkness into Him. If we say that we are imparted with Him, but we still walk into darkness, then we lie and we do not commit the truth” (I Jn. 1: 2, 5-6).” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 72-74)

“Christ produces, within the ones who fierily repent, a fire of the friendship, “through His much love for people”. (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 127)

“The world without Christ, it gives us a few pleasures and many pains. And the pleasures a perishable and meaningless. The whole life, with its strain, with its passions, with its greediness for power, all of it moves in darkness. The egotism that masters us is purposeless. All the unrest tormenting us it is groundless and ridiculous.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 139-140)

“Jesus, though He was man, he gave through the consummation of His words and deeds, all the necessary proofs that He was God too. The people could doubt about the affirmation of a prophet, that God really spoke to that prophet. This was because, through prophet, God spoke inside only one human being. That’s why, the people could reckon that the prophet was sunk in the ultimate essence of the existence characteristic to any other human being, with the illusion that he found God as Person and he spoke to Him. But the Son of God Himself came and spoke in ways exceeding the human being’s powers, visibly, to many who were together. Therefore, it was proven to many, through the consummation of a humanity never reached by somebody, but shown in Christ, of a humanity which, through the real and full communication it enters with the people, and also through the power that comes from beyond His humanity, but still through His humanity, that it is superior to the nature’s laws and that it was impossible not to be borne by God, according to the common witness of the many who were in His closeness.” (Stăniloae 1995: 165-166)

“Christ hasn’t brough the huma nature out of the unity of the contrasts, but He has widened those ones, by comprising in them the divine too, and He united them at maximum. Our humanity, as become God’s humanity, it has remained humanity, on one hand, in order God to participate through it, to our limitations and to our ways of living, to speak and to suffer, and on the other hand, in order to elevate our humanity in these aspects, and in all the other aspects, to His godlike glories. His words, though human words, they were able to express, on our behalf, through the uncontestable truth, through the steadfastness of the conviction and through the expressed infinity of the One Who was uttering those words, the experience of His godlike infinity, and His deeds, though committed through the human body, they exceeded, in cleanness, and ones of them in their power above nature’s laws, the level of the human being’s deeds.” (Stăniloae 1995: 166)

“Christ lives His assumed humanity as His own and His humanity is in a full communication with His Hypostasis, with His Godhead. He lives, as man, His Godhead in another union with His humanity, differently than the one which we live with our humanity in, as penetrated by His Holy Ghost with His Godhead.” (Stăniloae 1995: 179)

“Can Christ know His godhead and the whole His godhead’s fullness through His humanity? For He is the same Subject of the godhead and of the humanity, one cannot say that, with a part of His Self He knows His godhead and all His godhead’s things, and with another part of His Self He doesn’t know that. But Christ know with His humanity His godlike depth and all its things in the mode characteristic to humanity, widened and deepened at maximum, but not abolished. He has in His humanity the conscience that He is united in the same Person, with the godhead, and that He lives the godhead as the source of the whole knowledge, power, joy, and depth of His humanity. He doesn’t see His humanity as confounded to His godhead, but He neither sees it as not-partaking to some of the godhead’s good things in its proper mode. He lives His humanity and He sees His humanity as open without the narrowing of the kindness, of the love, and of the understanding belonging to the godhead, but His humanity is aware of the fact that those aspects do not belong to humanity by nature, but they are poured within humanity out of godhead. He lives with his humanity in the infinite horizon that is characteristic to His godhead, but not belonging to His humanity by nature.” (Stăniloae 1995: 183)

“Christ felt His humanity as elevated on the level of humanity belonging to His godlike Person and, before His death He lived also His humanity’s weaknesses appeared in humanity consequently to the ancestral sin, but He was defeating those weaknesses ceaselessly. That’s why He felt His humanity still making efforts in that direction, because His humanity preserved its human will and work. Christ was living in Himself the transcendence of His humanity to the level as His humanity as unity of God, but he was also living His humanity’s will and thirst as helped by His divine Hypostasis for ascending even more in that transcendence, towards His humanity’s full transfiguration and towards living His godhead with His humanity. That was done through His humanity’s will which His humanity was constantly exceeding itself through. And this transcendence has been fully accomplished by receiving the death of the cross, and. It has been accomplished in a culminant manner, by defeating the death through resurrection. But neither through resurrection have been confounded the humanity to the godhead. The humanity will feel as consummately crossed through, and transfigured, in the state of resurrection. His humanity isn’t lost in His godhead in a pantheistic sense, and it still remain humanity, though it is deified a maximum. His humanity lives the supreme happiness of the human in maximum union with the godhead, in the same Person, and He lives Himself, as godlike Hypostasis, this happiness of His humanity. He lives, in the same time with the infinity of the godlike happiness, also the human participation in human form to this happiness.” (Stăniloae 1995: 183-184)

“Christ lives, with His humanity, His godhead’s infinite love for the human being, namely not as a love He would have had from His humanity, but as poured within is by His godhead. And He lives this love also for His brothers, by knowing, in the same time, the whole their need for love. Concomitantly, He know His humanity’s love for God, once His humanity has been filled up with the loving power brought to His humanity by His godhead. And this love for God, from the part of His humanity, He communicates it to the other human being too, as to His brothers, and through the same humanity of His, he understands it, and the human being must impropriate His love through their own effort, to the extend which each human being makes that effort, an effort also understood by Christ.” (Stăniloae 1995: 184)

“Withing Christ, the mind that was gathering through the mediation of the body’s eyes the images of the things from outside, it has been made as the mind of the godlike Hypostasis. Therefore, we can say that through Christ’s eyes sees the One Who is in the same time God, so that he looks at the people as to His brothers, with brotherly understanding into humanity. The humanity is elevated in Christ at the quality as supreme organ and environment of the godhead, and of the sensitive and loving understanding of the people, by God embodied as man.” (Stăniloae 1995: 184)

“Who could look at people with more understanding than the Man Who is God too? What eyes could have been filled up with so much mercy on the people than the eyes of the Man Who was God too? Who could show so much understanding and Who could communicate that through the modulations of His voice, except the Man who was God too? They said that God has made Himself Man in order to deify the Man. But we mustn’t overlook the first part of this affirmation. God has made Himself Man as much as He deified the Man. Namely, as much as the human of Christ has been deified, equally much has been humanized His godhead. But neither His godhead existed its nature, nor his humanity did that, but each one appeared to be itself all the more it made the another like itself. The human being is the more deified as the more he is man and God shows Himself the more God as the more He comes closer to the humanity. The more God makes Himself man, the more He shows Himself as role-model to the human being, full with the love that He wants the man to have it too; also, the more the human being becomes god through his union with God, the more he shows himself as human being, as God wants him be. The closer is God, through love, to the man, the more luminous is the showing of His godhead within that man.” (Stăniloae 1995: 184-185)

“We know that the soul feels the pains of the body, because the body alone couldn’t feel the pain. But, on the line of Christ’s soul, His godhead is extended beyond Him, tightly united with his soul and, through that, with His body. Doesn’t He feel the pains of His hypostatical godlike body, through and with His human soul? Didn't Christ's Hypostasis feel, on the cross, those pains, for His Hypostasis didn't belong only of His godhead but also to His body? If through the eyes of our body the mind itself shows its suffering for others, the pains of the godlike Hypostasis of Christ bearer of humanity, weren't seen those pains through His body's eyes, as pains endured for us by His mind? The pains seen through Christ's eyes weren't they His Subject's pains Who was godlike Subject too? We can say that nobody was more compassionate and is more compassionate than the Son of God Who has made Himself man, out of love for us. That's why, nobody suffered more, for us, in his body, than the Son of God made man for us, did. This is the meaning of the expression "One of Trinity suffered with the body", which the Dacian-Roman monks from Dobrogea⁹⁰ fought with, with so much energy, at the beginning of the Fifth Century, and which, finally, has been imposed as Church's Christology. In all of these, one can see the living, concrete meaning, of God's "descent" to us." (Stăniloae 1995: 185)

"Christ shows Himself, to us, in all aspects, as the love's Person-Absolute Who willingly endures all pains, in order to defeat all the pains, and Who wants to united us with Him in this quality of His." (Stăniloae 1995: 186)

"Christ as Absolute, by taking the human face, he has made it supra-humanly human, by the fact that it is the face of the Absolute Who has an endless love. But He has made our face, in Himself, so supra-humanly human, in order to attract us too, towards that state. But just by this He has made our face, as loved by the Heavenly Father. He has made our face, as beloved face of Father's Only Begotten Son. He has made Himself, through His human face too, loved by the Heavenly Father as He is too, in His quality as Son of the Father and as of-the-same-being with the Father." (Stăniloae 1995: 186)

"The decisive role in the final and eternal union of all the human persons, it belongs to Christ, for in the light of His kindness, he feels all of them alike, and he makes all of them as close and united through communication (Jn. 17: 21). That's why Christ truly is the Source of the salvation and of the eternal happiness, and the Savior of everybody. He is the godlike Hypostasis Who has created us and Who upholds us, and Who gives us through His assumed body, the savior power from His godlike nature. He isn't only a powerful Hypostasis, through His human deeds done for everybody, but He is also the Hypostasis comprising all of us without confounding us to Himself. Being God, He has made Himself as one of us, and He has entered forever, the relation with us, as One of us, but still remaining God, so that he comprises all of us. United with me with His human nature common with mine, He also frames me, in a certain manner, within Himself, or, better said, He frames all of us within Himself. But he gives us the possibility of communicating ourselves to Him, as persons united with Him, as no other person can give it to us; we also communicate amongst ourselves, but we consummate ourselves as individual persons. And thus, each person finds all the other persons within Christ, or, each person is united into Christ with all the ones who, by faith, they receive from Him the power of communicating to Him, and amongst themselves. All of them will reach to know one another and to live within Christ, in their fulness; all persons can reach to feel Him as an own and common Hypostasis Who do not confound them to Himself, but Who unveils each person to Himself and to the others, at maximum, as worthy of maximum love. This is for all the persons are ontologically framed within His Hypostasis, a Hypostasis irradiating all-comprising love. All persons can reach to feel themselves, within Him, as in their Bosom, as at their home, though He is the Son of God. By being, as Son of God, the central Hypostasis of the persons' hypostases, He moves, as superior Hypostasis, their hypostases, towards the communication with Him and amongst themselves." (Stăniloae 1995: 209-210)

⁹⁰ Dobrogea is a Romanian province, situation in the Southern part of the Country, delimited by the Black Sea at South and by Danube at West.

"If Christ is the superior Hypostasis of all of us, my limbs are His limbs, and my thought are His thought. And He is actively present in each of our limbs and in each of our thought; and each of my limbs and each of my thought are His, but without they ceasing to be mine. I am united with Christ through each believer. The more I am united with Christ, the more I am united with each believer. And I see Christ's beauty in another person." (Stăniloae 1995: 210)

"The overflowing of love, from the center and from the top of the humanity, Who is Christ, it is so strong that it attracts the people, with supreme strength, in communion with Him, and therefore also amongst people, but without annulling the persons. By this, Christ brings the humanity borne by many hypostases, towards a loving multi-hypostatical unity, like the one of the Holy Trinity, by removing the divisions caused amongst persons, by their egotism. Each human person, by living in another mode the richness of the divine goods received from Christ, and also their impulse for communicating those goods to everybody, as also the desire for receiving the infinity of the divine richness in all the personal forms, the person lives the most alive communication with all the things. But the richness of the lived and communicated goods, good belonging to Christ, that richness is variously live and communicated by each person, and it is the richness of the Holy Trinity, a richness communicated to everybody through Christ's humanity." (Stăniloae 1995: 211)

"Christ is the Son and the Word of God made man. In Him, the humanity is framed within the godlike Hypostasis, eternally bearer of godlike nature. In Him, the human rationality had, as in His own Person, the knowledge of the godhead's infinity, and He can communicate it to the people, endlessly, in a mode accessible to the people. Christ loves the Father, as man, with His love of Son, and the Father loves Him as man too, with His love of Father. The human has achieved a worthiness for infinite love, by being the human of the Son of God, and the human as become characteristic to the Son of God it has achieved the capacity of the endless love of God. Christ keeps in an indissoluble connection the rationality of the mankind with the divine rationality, the divine rationality being one with the divine Hypostasis, but it is too, hypostasis of the assumed humanity. This one can no longer be locked-up within world as in a reality independent from God, and exclusive, but it is eternally deepened into knowing the godhead from the divine Hypostasis, which has become own hypostasis, and with Him in the Father's love." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 16-17)

"The Word of God has defeated, in humanity, the death, he has made the humanity immortal, firstly on spiritual plan, and then this immortality has reverberated upon the body too. The Word, as image of the Father, he has restored the humanity as humanity "in His image", He loving, together with His humanity, the Father as supreme and inexhaustible origin of the life, and the humanity seeing God-the Father – for the humanity is partaker to the Son." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 17)

"The Word of God has made Himself liable, instead of us, up to the end, in front of the Father, by totally willingly enduring the death, though He had no sin. That's why He defeated the death through resurrection." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 17)

"By making Himself man, the Word of God hasn't accomplished as man only the full of love and responsibility relation with God in our behalf, by receiving and by defeating through that the body's death too, but He also entered a relation of maximum efficiency, in good, with His fellow into humanity. This consequence was implied in the fact itself that he has made Himself man, of-the-same-being with us, according to humanity, so that he received the death which the humanity was submitted but he has defeated it, with His godlike power shown also in His humanity elevated to sinlessness." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 17)

"Christ, as Son of God made man, he is for both resurrections "way" and "life", for He is the "truth" which cannot be except the infinite as Person, as plenary and eternal existence, and as upholder and creator of the created existence, role-model and helper of the existence in its way towards Him (Jn. 14: 6). He is the "way" for He has made Himself our fellow human, communicating us by this, increasingly more, out of His "life" as God. He is out "way" towards the resurrection with the body, for he has taken a body which He has resurrected after a life in cleanness and after His body's death as surrender to the Father, in order to give us His body in the Holy Mysteries, with these powers of His, in order us to reach the state of His resurrection as "life". (Stăniloae 1995, I: 18)

"Christ makes Himself known to us in His quality as "way" and "life" and "truth"; "way" towards resurrection and immortality right through His "voice" which, on one hand, it resounds out of His Gospel and out of the Church which spreads Him through tens of millions of mouths, and on the other hand, it resounds into our conscience, awakening our liability and making us to receive Him and to follow Him into His endless knowledge and love, towards our resurrection with the body." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 18)

"In the fact that the Son of God has made Himself human "voice" it is shown again that the Word of God no longer remained the Word of God speaking to us through the world's things and through other people, but He has impropriated our word, namely he has made Himself One of us also Who speaks to us as a fellow human of ours, but with the godlike power of the One Who resurrects the one who listen to Him." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 18)

"The Word of God has made Himself not only a fellow human Who speaks to us, directly, His word – in order to be further conveyed by other people – but he is a fellow human needing us, also towards our benefit, since He said that the one who gives food to the hungry and who visits the sick, that one does all those things to Him (Mt. 25: 33-40).

He also helps us to fulfill our duties when we are in the role of the ones whom He needs, He impropriating the situation of our fellow human who needs us and who awakens our humanity towards compassion." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 18)

"Our relation with Christ, as road towards our spiritual immortality and towards the resurrection with the body forever, it isn't a relation outside our relation with our fellow humans and with the things seen as gifts give us by Him, in order us to gives those things as gifts to one another, and thus us to increase in the loving unity amongst us. Our fellow humans are transparent to Christ in his quality as "Way", as the things, revealed as gifts from Him and as gifts amongst us, are too. We understand that He is "way" also through His body and through the powers imprinted in Him through His savior deeds, body and powers give to us through the Church's Mysteries. Thus, at Christ as target of our eternity we cannot reach except through His humanity, and as such He is target and way communicated to us through Mysteries, but also through our fellow humans and through the gifts we give to one another, and that shows that we cannot reach Him as target except together with others." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 19)

“Only the coming of the God-Person into our world, in the Person of Christ, it has opened the horizon of that plan superior to the monotonous world, and it unveiled Him to the man, objectively and subjectively. The true Absolute and the enriching with the infinite preoccupations of the man in connection with Christ, they thus have become really accessible to the man, out of God’s initiative Who sent His Son as Man within world, in communication with the people. If the pantheistic philosophies locked-up the transcendent, to the man, and they cut off the man’s connection with the transcendent, Christ has elevated the created on the superior plan of the creator and savior transcendent, above the monotony of the death which masters the immanent. Now, the transcendent Absolute elevates the created being of the man, with His love as Person, in the ambience of the true immortality and of His interpersonal love. The Christendom opposes the meaningless denial of the transcendent, the elevating of the created being in the transcendent fullness of love, above the monotony of their apparition and disappearance, namely to their deification by grace – and not by being. And this is one with their happy and eternal life, with their existence of endless complexity and enrichment, given as aspiration in their being itself. This is the happy immortality open to the man, as possibility. This brings the man’s real accomplishment. Contrary to that is the immortality into the monotony of the living of a false accomplishment. Since God has given the creature an eternal existence, the creature can adapt his possibility to be immortal, because of his opposition to the Creator, to an immortality in an extreme spiritual poverty and torment. In the man’s capacity of participating to God, it is given the possibility of his endless advancing into this participation. But it that is also given the possibility that God to manifest His life too, through human. And the supreme manifestation of God through human it is accomplishes into Christ Who fully frames and actualizes the human in His Hypostasis, and that means that the Himself the Son of God manifests Himself through the human thinking, feeling, and speaking, and He also can suffer like a man.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 42)

“In this hypostatic unity of the body and of the soul, in the endless movement towards comprising the entire created and uncreated reality, it is implied the possibility of the union in a hypostasis, between the godlike and human natures, in the Hypostasis of God-the Word, Whom Maxentius the Scythian (the Roman-Dacian), Leontius of Byzantium, and Maximos the Confessor said about, that He is composes and all-comprising.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 43)

“In a universe that is no longer seen as united with the Son and the unifier Word of God, the human persons no longer consider themselves as coming out of the only loving and conscious origin of all things, namely out of the supreme Father, and they no longer promote the filial sentiment towards the Father, and in the union amongst themselves. This is the falling off

Paradise, namely the falling off their full unity with the Word. But the Creator, for He didn't want to let the universe in that state, He brought the universe back into the unity with Himself, by more tightly uniting the universe through His Word. On that purpose, the Father sent His Son to make Himself man, to take a body, in order Him to remove the death and to gather within Himself, through His love all the way up to sacrifice, the people as His brothers and together-sons of the heavenly Father, and in order to bring all things back into harmony, by removing the disorder and the decomposition and by restoring the true rationality. But, in order that to take place, it was necessary a preparation of the universe." (Stăniloae 1995: 50)

"The resurrected Son of God, after such a life detached from the superficial universe, He is helping the ones who will attach themselves to Him, to walk this road of His, in order they to cross, through death, to Paradise, with their souls, and at the end of the present form of the universe, to resurrect to the eternal life, with their bodies too, as whole human beings." (Stăniloae 1995: 55)

"Jesus Christ, the Word of God, Who all the things have been done through, He has come not only as a man of the highest quality, through the love He is animated by, but He has also come as a man wanting to embrace all the people into His love." (Stăniloae 1995: 63)

"Jesus Christ is confessed by Gospel and by the Church's teaching, as the Son of God Who, by making Himself man, while still remaining God, he is the only One capable of showing the love and the almightiness of God towards us, and, as such, to save us from death and to provide us with an eternal life in communion with the Holy trinity, the Source of the life in plenitude. But by that, into Jesus Christ, it is implied the Christian teaching about universe too, universe as creation of the God in Trinity, transcendent and almighty, and loving Person." (Stăniloae 1995: 69)

"The impossibility of separating the natures which are really seen in the unity of the Person of Christ, it has allowed the Church to use, during the Fifth Ecumenical Synod, also the expression: the Person of Christ is "in two natures", but with the condition that this expression not to be understood as annulling or confounding the two natures in only one. This would offer a basis for the conciliation with the old Oriental Churches, as it was intended by the Eighth Ecumenical Synod. The Canon of the Eighth Ecumenical Synod says: "If somebody, by confessing that the union has been made "out of two natures" or by saying "a nature of the embodied God-the Word", he doesn't understand these like the Fathers has taught us, that, by being done the union according to hypostasis, out of the godlike nature and of the human nature, Christ has been constituted, but he deduces out of these words that there is a sole nature or being of the godhead and of the body of Christ, let him be anathema". But the Canon of the Seventh Ecumenical Synod, likewise condemns the ones who, like Nestorius, by using the expression "in two natures", they do not recognize that "out of these two natures" it has been constituted a sole hypostasis, without being abolished the differences between the two natures, and that the two natures aren't discerned only by cogitation but they are really two hypostases. Let them be anathema." (Stăniloae 2006: 23).

"But the fact that the Hypostasis of the two natures is one Hypostasis, and that the two natures are not confounded, it allows the divine Hypostasis to be known also through the human nature, and this has, as effect, the humanization of the Word and the deification of the human nature. The not-changing of the human nature doesn't mean else but not getting out of its "definition", and not the fact that the human nature is being maintained in not-consummation and in its helplessness to be filled up with the godlike life. The eye's matter doesn't cease to be matter by the fact that the eye is an organ of the conscious sight, or by the fact that through the eye, there shine meanings, or by the fact that we no longer feel the eye's matter when seeing through it, or by the fact that the eye's matter is overwhelmed by the spirit." (Stăniloae 2006: 22-23)

"Nicholas Kabasilas spoke about two kinds of lives, about two kinds of feeling in man, the natural ones and the spiritual ones. Amongst the natural ones, each of them functions differently to the others; that's why the natural man lives his life in bits. But, by being concentrated through Mysteries, the man's feelings are united in Christ with the feelings of Christ and they function in a united mode with the feelings of Christ. The different functions of the man find their real center in Christ, they are unified, and the man finds the simplicity and the unity imprinted by the image of Christ." (Stăniloae 2006: 23)

"The love for a person unifies one man's functions, for all these functions are imprinted by that person's image. The more does this the love for such conquering Person of Christ." (Stăniloae 2006: 23)

"If all the extraordinary supra-natural acts of the Revelation are acts of great importance for the history of our salvation, guiding us towards the final target, the supra-natural acts done with our human nature into Christ, they place the human nature under the ray of its final target." (Stăniloae 2003: 38)

"Christ represents the last stage of the supra-natural Revelation and the fulfilling of the supra-natural Revelation. Out of Him it irradiates the force of fulfilling this plan with the entire Creation and with the entire Universe.

That's why the period after Christ it is the last stage of the salvation's history." (Stăniloae 2003: 39)

"As God, come into the maximum closeness with us, as man, elevated through the union with God in a person at the supreme height, as plan of God reached and concretized in Him at the last fulfillment, Christ starts the work of extending the state achieved in Him, to all of us." (Stăniloae 2003: 49)

"As God, (Christ, o. n.) He wants to achieve in his humanity the closeness to all people, like some partners equal to Himself, by maintaining the personal identity of each one; by doing this, He want to take each one to the maximal level of human achievement. In other words, He wants to extend the plan God achieved in Him." (Stăniloae 2003: 49)

"But He is above everybody. For He is not a human person who needed salvation and, in order to achieve that, that person was united with God. He assumed the human nature not-hypostatized in itself, but hypostatized in His own hypostasis, in order to make out of it the fundamental environment through which to extend, to all people, the deification the human nature has been elevated at." (Stăniloae 2003: 49)

"In the Divine Logos have their origin and basis, they existence and their meanings, all the things, and through His embodiment the divine Logos gathers all thins within Himself." (Stăniloae 2003: 73)

"Christ is the living, all-comprising, and working dogma, of the entire salvation." (Stăniloae 2003: 81)

"Christ must ascend, with the body, to the full spirituality and communion with the Father, in order that through His body that reached the supreme force of spiritual irradiation, the Ghost to be outpoured." (Stăniloae 2003: 93)

"The One Who restored and consummated the unity in Him - between all the things and God - He has Christ, just because He has been both God and man. Because the man didn't move towards consummating his unity with God and with all the things, God has made Himself a man in order to heal, in the humanity he assumed, the "tearing apart" emerged through sin, and to recapitulate all the things in Himself, and us with God." (Stăniloae 2003: 174)

"The impulse that Christ imprints it within us, in order to give ourselves, an impulse given to us through the Holy Mysteries, it doesn't make us ceaselessly giving ourselves, but our giving of ourselves it if followed by a withdrawal within ourselves, namely we do not totally and definitively surpass the interval. All these delays in giving ourselves to God, they also manifest the delays in giving ourselves to others. We have the thirst of a consummate and absolute adequacy between the appeal and the answer to love. But this adequacy cannot be lived except from and in God, through the full trust in Him, by accomplishing His commandment to fully love each other, by fully loving Him.” (Stăniloae 2003: 198-199)

“The human will of Christ fully answers His godlike will. But through this it isn’t suppressed the distinction between them. The godlike will it remains always the one that offers, that calls, that asks for the answer, and that imposes a responsibility; the human will it remains the one that answers.” (Stăniloae 2003: 202)

“By the fact that the human will of Christ it answers for the people, it asks for the people, this will persist in a connection with the people’s temporality, with their aspirations, and with their impediments. And this makes Christ to live also as God these connections with the temporal humanity. As long as we won’t be all of us in the consummation of the answer to the offer of the godlike love, Christ remains too, even more than in quality of God before the embodiment, in connection with our temporality, though, on the other hand he has brought in this temporality, as Subject of the eternity, also the power of a more complete answer of the people to the divine offer.” (Stăniloae 2003: 202-203)

“The embodiment of the godlike Word and the fact that in Him coexists the surpassing of the temporal interval between man and God and his connection with the temporal people, they show too the connection between the godlike eternity and the human temporality.” (Stăniloae 2003: 203)

“The Son of God embodied Himself in order to help us exceeding through our movement the temporal interval that separates us from the full communion with God. He does, in some manner, this movement together with us. That’s why He still is in this interval, though, on the other hand, He is above this interval.” (Stăniloae 2003: 203)

“In Christ, God has accepted also spatially, a kenosis. Properly-said, God has come through Christ in the maximum closeness to the people, though with His being He hasn’t ceased to be present everywhere. The kenosis would actually consist in the fact that He has made Himself accessible, noticeable at maximum as God, through the assumed humanity, through the body that has taken place into the space.” (Stăniloae 2003: 216)

“Above all, the Son of God, by taking our nature in His divine Hypostasis, He can through this nature – more than any man – to be open to the entire mankind, and He can, more than anyone, to gather the entire creation in Himself.” (Stăniloae 2003: 217)

“In Christ the human nature is deified not only through the uncreated divine energies, but also through the divine hypostasis Who bears it, and Who manifests Himself through it. That’s why the divine energies which irradiate out of His human nature, they do not irradiate by starting out of a foreign hypostasis, but out of the own Hypostasis of this nature Who is in the same time the Hypostasis of the divine nature, of Christ Who is in connection with us, as man, through His humanity organically tied to us, and He embraces us also like a God of everybody. The Son of God, by making Himself the Hypostasis of a human nature that is not close in an own human hypostasis, He is some kind of foundation of all the human hypostases. As such, He is, likewise, the foundation of our entire natural and of grace works and us, by being comprised in Him, we embrace together with Him the whole created world.” (Stăniloae 2003: 217-218)

“God is to us in a maximum virtual closeness in Christ, and, if we actualize through faith and through the freedom of passion the union with him, we can unite within Him with all the believers and, in the same time, we will have the whole space caught in the range of the divine-human energies of Christ, which irradiate within us. The distance between us and God, and amongst us the humans, it is thus surpassed.” (Stăniloae 2003: 218)

“In Christ God is next to each human being, not only with His being, but also with his energy, ready to take action. But He doesn’t remove forcedly the distance between Him and us, and amongst people. He asks for our free love for this distance to be removed, better said he asks for the answer to His love’s offer, that was so obviously and so impressive done through embodiment and by accepting the cross for us. Surpassing the distance, it is a matter of liberty and spirituality. And when we do not use the freedom and the spirituality for surpassing the distance towards Christ-God, we do not either use it for surpassing the distance towards our fellow humans, a fact that is damaging to us. This is for the recognition of God in Christ it would mean the recognition of our entire value, shown us by God by the fact that He made Himself man. But Christ doesn’t want to pluck this recognition, from the people, forcedly. By not removing this distance on a daily basis, God accepts in Christ a new kenosis.” (Stăniloae 2003: 219)

“In Christ the mankind is at the peak of its accomplishment, or of its consummation: potentially, before the general resurrection, and after that resurrection it will be in an actual manner. This is because then the mankind will be in a full interiority with God. That’s why God know it in its fullness, we would say, in a full actualized form of it. The human nature being in Christ at the consummate end of knowing God, and therefore also of knowing itself, or beyond any possibility of development, on the maximum level this nature can be known and on which it can know God, and God also know the human nature at this final and maximum end of it. In Christ God know the human nature and the human nature know s God, on a level on which never will anyone of us know God, even if that one loves God on a corresponding level; and God tastes the nature of the human love and therefore he knows this love on its maximum level of accomplishment. And in Christ, God knows everybody's humanity on a maximum level, through its total participation to His life, and God knows this due to His maximum participation to the human life. Maybe in this it consists the communication of the features of Christ, in its real meaning. Of course, the human nature knows God in a human way, and God knows the human nature in a divine way. In Christ it has been accomplished a reciprocal internalization between God and mankind, more than by grace. It is internalization in a hypostasis." (Stăniloae 2003: 249-250)

"In Christ, God knows the human as on Himself, for He is also man, and the human knows God as himself, for the same is also God. Yet, Christ remains both God and man. This is for by knowing as man the divine infinity, that has become His own infinity, this infinity it remains His infinity but it is not characteristic to His human being; and knowing as God the human finitude as being His own, this finitude it remains to Him as uncharacteristic finitude according to his being, but as finitude that is transparent to the divine infinity, for the divine infinity overwhelms the human finitude. Christ becomes infinite as man by the fact that, being God but man too, He knows Himself as man, but the meanings and the roots of the human existence are unveiled to him in the godlike infinity; and as God, he doesn't become finite, by the fact that, being a man, but also God, He knows on Himself as God, but to Him the abyss of the divine existence it is unveiled also through the human transparency." (Stăniloae 2003: 250-251)

"In Christ we are given the possibility to advance towards the degree God knows the man as He knows on Himself, and the man knows God as the man knows on himself. But in order to achieve this we must advance in the union with Christ. Through this we advance towards the level on which each of us will know his neighbor as on himself, for he will love the neighbor as on himself. This is for Christ being the godlike hypostasis of the mankind, he doesn't put any barrier to His love for the whole humanity, humanity He has it as His own; and within him, as hypostasis open to everybody, everybody can know and love as on themselves. It is only necessary that neither us to put such a barrier between us and God. Christ is like a head-hypostasis of ours. But through this we too are given the possibility to advance in knowing Christ-God as on ourselves, as on our head-hypostasis." (Stăniloae 2003: 251)

“What an abyss of wisdom is hidden in the embodiment of the Son of God as man, which opens the perspective of the eternal godlike life, of a eternal and untold glory of the human being! (...) What an abyss of wisdom is hidden in the fact that, through Embodiment, one and the same Person is God too, and man in the same time, bearing and deepening in Himself as also in all of us, to the divine infinity, the spiritual life of the human being! What and abyss of wisdom is hidden in the Cross or in the sufferance the Son of God assumes it for us and he makes it, by renouncing to Himself and through the patience implied by it, the condition of our superior life, namely of the relations between us and God! What an abyss of wisdom is in the perspective of the eternal life, in the perspective of the resurrection opened and given in the Resurrection of Christ! What depths of blessing meaning is given by the wisdom shown in the oikonomia of Christ in the world’s order, an order that remains by itself in a fragment of meaning, with which one cannot reach at anything! In what abyssal increase of meaning God unveils on Himself, to us, as a God Who is Person or the Trinity of Persons and Who enters, as such, by the warmth of the endless communion He is capable of, the relation of love with us as persons (...)!” (Stăniloae 2003: 254-255)

“Only Christ reached as man the whole righteousness.” (Stăniloae 2003: 260)

“The fight against the temptations from the evil ghosts it requires finesse, in order to notice them from the beginning, but also a strained effort and a tireless tenacity, in order not to let us taken in mastery by them. But this fight cannot be fought by the man alone. The power and the success of this fight come to it from the clean body of Christ that is source of cleanness.” (Stăniloae 2003: 484)

“This presence of the divine Logos within world, even in the weakened degree from after the falling, it could form a wider basis for what the Catholic theologian Karl Rahner called “a transcendental Christology”, namely a need for Christ inscribed within the man’s spiritual constitution. The element he sees this “transcendental Christology” in, they can be reckoned as the special form of the presence of the Logos within the human spirit, and as such they can be reckoned as belonging to His general presence within the world, which we have schematically presented above. We are going to enumerate here these elements which are part of the rationality itself as image of the Logos. First, we are mentioning that Rahner himself saw this “transcendental Christology”, or the Christology of the waiting for, as being accomplished in the correspondence between the Person and the work of the historical Christ and a “theology of the conscience, namely a “ontological Christology”, inscribed within existence, in which the historically tested and preached Christology is in accordance to the rationality, or to the human being's need for meaning." (Stăniloae 2006: 7-8)

"The human "historicity" and in the same time the supra-human character of Christ (...) it can be highlighted in many ways on the basis of the Gospel." (Stăniloae 2006: 12)

"Jesus is aware of the fact that only by opening the people's access to God, He will save them. But this access to God isn't opened through a death understood in the sense of the theory of the satisfaction from later. This one lowers the relation between God and man on the level of a justice quantitatively measured. Christ opens us the way of access to God, through a work of His, in a consummate "communication" with us. In this communication, which is a communication of love, His life's and death's directing towards God and towards us, the people, they meet. Christ communicates Himself wholly, to us, the people, through His life and death, but by doing this, He communicates Himself entirely to the will of God. But Jesus couldn't have been able to entirely dedicate His life and death to us, the people, as a simple man." (Stăniloae 2006: 12)

"Explaining the life, the death, and the Resurrection of Christ, through the direction towards God and man of His perfect love, it is characteristic to the Holy Fathers. (...) The Catholic theologians, by surpassing the theory of the satisfaction, they see, today, the salvation into Christ being done on two directions, as coming out of the evangelical image of Christ. This confirms the fact that the Christology of the Holy Fathers was the sole which maintained the integral evangelical image of Christ. But, by following them, we have presented also another direction in the life, in the death, and in the Resurrection of Christ, involved in the other two: a direction of His action as God upon His humanity, which elevates this humanity, and not without this humanity's contribution, on a level no other man's humanity has ever been. This direction starts with the Embodiment and it ends with the Resurrection of Christ. This action makes His humanity as environment of the wonderful deeds of Christ like God and partaker to them. Due to this action, Christ is not only God, but he is also the consummate man, or fully accomplished through the power of God, as there never has been and won't ever be another man. But in this consummation Christ still remains an authentic man, or the man accomplished in the most authentic way. And only the reality itself could give the authors of the New Testament the capacity of describing this so veridical reality, so superiorly authentic reality of Christ. All the features of the humanity of Christ are harmonized to His directing, through life and through death, towards the others and towards God, but also to the fact of His godhead. Only in the consummate humbleness and purity of intentions and of good deeds of Jesus as man, it was possible to be shown the greatness of His godhead. Only in this humbleness, purity, gentleness, impossible to be reached before, by any of us, he could announce with firmness His godhead, without this to seem as a haughty claim, or as a imagining of a person lacking the sense of reality. The Godhead of Christ appears thus as the supreme dimension, impossible to be reached only through our human powers, consisting in the most loving communicativeness, power of enduring, and purity. Without being a result of the humanity, the godhead accomplishes in the same time and it crowns His consummately accomplished humanity. But this humanity manifests, in the humbleness, in the purity, and in its loving communicativeness, a committing of deeds power, which exceeds the power of the humanity which is not united with God in this culminant mode. Jesus showed Himself thus, as a wonderful God, for he showed Himself as the most human being. He appeared, from a certain point of view, as fully framed in the human life's conditions, but on the other hand, He exceeded this life's limits, by committing not only the most human deeds, but also the deeds from above the world. He went hungry, he went thirsty, he needed to sleep, and He suffered physical pains and the misunderstanding of His fellows into humanity. He humbled Himself more than everybody, by hanging around with the publicans, with the oppressed, and with the mocked ones of the society, but he didn't deviate from the perfect love, he didn't envy, he didn't speak against, though He rebuked the unjust ones, the pretenders, the cunning ones, the kidnappers, but without closing their way to salvation, the way of coming back to the true humanity: He prayed for all and he committed and he could whenever commit mighty works above the ones of the nature and of the people. Who could have invented such an authentic man and in so wonderful in the same time? Any fantasy is tempted to develop the image it describes, either on a direction, or on the opposite, and it never is able to present such a pure man, such a totally devoted man, such a man untouched by any shadow from the ones which weaken the full light of the consummate humanity." (Stăniloae 2006: 13-14)

"The image of Christ is a historical image, by the fact that it reconciles in His profound authenticity with the true humanity, but also by the fact that it couldn't have been built up by some fantasy in this true consummation of His." (Stăniloae 2006: 14)

"Through the teaching he gave us, he didn't do else but interpreting His consummate humanity, due to the ontological and spiritual union between His consummate humanity and the godlike nature and, through its formula crystallized in commandments, in His quality as God, He asked the people to follow Him, and He promised them, on this purpose, His help in their efforts: "Learn from Me, for I am meek and humble in My heart" (Mt. 19: 22). His teaching is perfect in all its precepts, from the beginning: nothing can be eliminated from it, neither added to it. This is because Himself as Subject Who interprets Himself through it, he is consummate. But in the same time

His teaching is the unique road proven to be mandatory to be followed by us, the unique road to consummation, but also a road possible to be followed. And this proves again the historicity of Christ, in the same time with His uniqueness. He is proven by this too, as the target of our humanity, but the real, non-fantastist target, corresponding to the real aspirations of the humanity.” (Stăniloae 2006: 14)

“If Christ reveals Himself also as the man who has reached His fulfillment, for He is united with God, and no man is and as nobody will ever be, but only partially by the union with Christ, he must be also our way and helper towards this target. Like the target is real, so it is real the way too. Actually, he is our way for He is our target. In this quality as target, He shows us His perfect love towards us. But just by doing this, He is also our way, for just through it He helps us with understanding to advance towards the target accomplished in Him. Because we haven’t reached the capacity of loving Him, he is far away from us as target, but for His love is in a maximum closeness to us, he is an accessible way to us. And this shows again the historicity and the supra-historicity of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 14)

“This positive use of the affects, of the corruptibility, and of the death, it has been place within them, by God, for God has place within our nature the instinct of preservation. By healthy using this instinct of preservation, and by seeing the eternal ruin the affects are preparing to him, the believer turns back from the sin in order to remove the nourishment that sustains the affects. This struggle is required by the law itself, the law that has been seeded in the man’s nature and by the law positively given by God, a law that corresponds to the one from the nature, that strengthens the law from the nature and that develops it. But the man cannot fulfill this law only by his powers, and neither can he escape the power of the affects, of the sufferings, of the corruptibility, and of the death, because he cannot also escape the mastery of the sin upon him. Only by Christ Who has overcome the sin, the law it has been fulfilled and the nature has escaped from under the power of the affects, of the corruptibility, and of the death. Only through Christ the man no longer stays under the power of the Law, which lasts as long as lasts the unfinished fight against the sin. The man cannot fulfill the law by himself, and he cannot get rid of it and of death, because of the body’s effect being tied to the sin.” (Stăniloae 2006: 41-42)

“If the affects and the death have effectively changed their purpose, they have changed it only in Christ and through Christ Who had no longer the sin tied to them.” (Stăniloae 2006: 42)

“The savior work of Christ can be seen in the three directions it has. But, for these directions aren’t separated from one another, analyzing one or another of them, it can’t be done by making abstraction of the two others. But the savior work of Christ can be analyzed in other three main aspects it has too. His savior work is accomplished through the own sacrifice of His body, through the example He gave in serving other people, and through the power Christ exercises upon nature by doing wonders, as He did upon death by Resurrection and upon people by the commands and by the power He gives it to them for salvation. For He exercises these three kinds of activities, as sides of His savior work, Jesus Christ is considered, from the very beginning of the Church, as being: Hierarch (Hebr. 9: 11), Teacher-Prophet, and Master or Lord or Emperor (Apoc. 11: 15; 12: 10; Mt. 28: 18).” (Stăniloae 2006: 49)

“Christ is the eminent Prophet, for His teaching shows the true road to mankind’s consummation. And in this He doesn’t do else but He interprets, on Himself, Himself being both the road to consummation and the consummation too. Any progress the mankind has achieved in the direction of its consummation, of the true actualizing of the human, it has been achieved on the road and towards the target Christ has indicated. His teaching is truly prophetic, for His Person is prophetic too, by showing, in Himself, the man at his eschatological end. Christ is the “Prophet” and the ultimate “prophecy” in person. He doesn’t represent another target of the road of the mankind towards consummation, except on Himself. He is the ultimate model of the mankind and in union with Him the mankind finds its consummation. Christ is by His Godhead, but also by his deified humanity, the infinite “length and the width”, in which will advance, in the future, the ones who believe in Him.” (Stăniloae 2006: 50)

“In the teaching Christ gives us, He interprets, on Himself, as the final and consummate target of the mankind. He doesn’t give a teaching imagined by the mind, which, from a point of view, it is better than the one who gives it, and from another point of view it doesn’t reveal the whole mystery of the human being and the ultimate real target the human being has reached in Christ, and it can reach by anybody who believe in Christ. Christ doesn’t describe by imagination the inspiring painting of what the man could be but he doesn’t succeed it, but He described what the man has really reached in Him. Christ shows the man in the consummated state from after resurrection, a state that can become the real state of all the ones who believe in Christ. And by the fact Christ is by His life and by His resurrection what the whole mankind is called to actually become, His teaching is realistic and prophetic, having as argument what is Him like man in Whom it has been truly accomplished the humanity, and in Who the humanity it will be accomplished after resurrection. In His teaching one can see like in a mirror His life from before and from after resurrection, namely as the man is called to be like. By this, Christ is Prophet not only by His word, but also by His existence before resurrection and after resurrection. His Person Himself is wholly a prophecy about man, like the man is called to become in actualizing the best and the most characteristic of Christ's potentialities, but only in union with God." (Stăniloae 2006: 50)

"Christ is the Teacher too, through His Person, for we do not meditate at a teaching He has give us like detached from Him, a teaching we strive ourselves to fulfill it. If that had been the case, His teaching would have been another "law". We learn by looking at His person, and we can step on His footprints, by staying in connection with Him. "Learn from Me, for I am gentle and humble in heart and you will find rest to your souls" (Mt. 14: 19). Actually, only by receiving power from the Person of Jesus, the ones who believe in Him they do not strive themselves without any result, but they can become gentle and humble too, and by this they achieve the resting from the passions which torment them and worry them purposelessly." (Stăniloae 2006: 50)

"Christ is the culminant "Teacher" and "Prophet" by His Person Himself, for He isn't only man, but He is also God, and therefore He has within Himself and it irradiates from Him not only the right teaching about God, but also about the true man, like the man is accomplished in Christ, and like the other people have to reach too." (Stăniloae 2006: 50)

"Christ's teaching is the culminant revelation about God and about man, for He is Himself, like Person, this revelation. In Him ends the whole revelation and the whole prophecy. He is the supreme fulfilled prophecy. He is the culminant revelation and the culminant prophecy, for He comprises the whole content about God and about man, a content that is accessible to the man during His earthly life, by the fact that this content is directly communicated by the One Who is God Himself, and the fully accomplished man." (Stăniloae 2006: 50)

"Saint Cyril of Alexandria said that Christ, by what He has brought in Himself, He has unveiled in His Hypostasis the types of the law. Christ has moved in His Hypostasis the types to the truth. The Prophets and the Righteous from the Old Testament, because they weren't the truth in person, namely Christ, they represented Christ as types, or they presented Him in types, because of seeing Him in the remoteness of the future, on the basis of the communications they received from God, or on the basis of a unclear seeing of the Word in His existence impossible to be described with the whole clarity. That's why only in Christ is lighted the law, or the target the law points unclearly. Even Jesus has said that the law has been pointing towards Him: "For if you believed to Moses, You would believe Me. For he wrote about Me" (Jn. 5: 46). "Christ has been ordered, said the same father, to be apostle and hierarch (Hebr. 3: 1) and He liberated us from the overshadowed law and He has brought us to the clear speaking of the evangelical teaching." (Stăniloae 2006: 51)

“The words are absolutely necessary too, in order to explain the work that comes to us out of Christ. By and large, the words and the deeds are the means we always put ourselves in connection to somebody’s person with, and therefore also with the Person of Christ. And this is just what Christ aims. In the case of other persons is harder to put yourself in connection with them through the words they uttered and through the deed they did in the past, because they are no longer present where their words and deeds are remembered, or sometimes they no longer recognize themselves in the state they uttered and they did those words and deeds, for they have grown up to other understandings. But Christ is present where are mentioned, with faith in Him, His words and deeds, for they present Him as remained the same in the moment too His words and deeds are remembered, or His words and deeds represent stages He passed through like man, and which any man must pass through if he wants to reach the level His humanity has reached to; He doesn’t have any reason to retract these stages and He relives these stages together with the ones who are in one or another of these stages, as being this the sole way the people can reach too, where He is like man.” (Stăniloae 2006: 53)

“The permanent central importance of the body of Christ it depends on Him being identified like Hierarch with His quality of Sacrifice. On His quality of High Priest it is tied therefore the position of self-sacrificing. Like the embodied Word is the Word in Person, or speaking, so is Him the sacrifice in Person too, the Sacrifice that Sacrifices, on Himself, “the living Sacrifice”, as we say in a churchly troparion. The simultaneous qualities of Hierarch and Sacrifice, they aren’t accidentally tied to His Person, but they are the expression of His Person Himself, as Son of God embodied for us. Whether the man is made, by and large, to be living sacrifice brought by the man himself to God, the embodied Hypostasis of the Word accomplishes by excellence this quality, by being Him the supreme sacrifice and supreme Hierarch by excellence. Accepting to made, on Himself, man, the Son of God accepted to make, on Himself, the supreme Hierarch of ours and the supreme sacrifice for us, namely he accepted to totally offer His body to God, and by this, to resurrect His body in order to give it as dough of resurrection, to us, the people, through our union with Him. He is not Hierarch in quality as God. This is for the Hierarch serves to God. But He is supreme Hierarch only because He is God too, for He can be thus the fully efficient mediator between people and God, for He makes God cause of the resurrection from His death accepted as sacrifice. And the possibility of His full giving as man to God, it is implied in His quality of Son of God Who is from ever in a filial obedience towards the Father.” (Stăniloae 2006: 57)

“Rejecting the priesthood, it means rejecting the humiliation and the serving before God; the sanctification Christ is imparted with, it refers to His human nature. This is the purification of sin and the filling up with godlike life the body of Christ is imparted with, by Himself as God, for through His mediation to be sanctified all the believers. But this sanctification of the body means either the preparation of the Sacrificer in order to sacrifice, on Himself, to God, or this is an effect of the act of sacrificing. This involves the direction of the sacrifice towards God and towards the One Who sacrifices, on Himself.” (Stăniloae 2006: 57)

“The savior efficacy of Christ as Hierarch it was seen by Leontius of Byzantium, in the fact that Christ is not only man, but he is also God. Like man, He brings His body as sacrifice, but as God He places His body on the right hand of the Father. By this, the sacrificed body is extolled and it can irradiate out of it the deifying power upon all. Here we come across to a new paradox. The body of Christ is forever and ever in the state of sacrifice, infusing us too, with the ghost of sacrifice; but, in the same time, Christ’s body is the place where are dwelling the whole glory and the whole godlike power destined to us. Christ’s body is the body in the permanent actuality of the state of sacrifice, but also of deifying action, or beyond the apparent contradiction between, these states. Only thus He gives us too, the power of sacrifice, but right through this, this power is a true one.” (Stăniloae 2006: 58)

“In the case of Christ, the initiative of God-the Father meets the simultaneous and total answer of the Son before embodiment, and after the embodiment it meets Christ’s answer as man, consummating in a full availability the human aspiration towards priesthood. In the case of Christ, at the initiative of the Father and at the initiative of the Son, as answer to embody, on Himself, and to make, on Himself, full Hierarch, it is added the association of His human nature, which makes the Son’s answer to be a human answer too, which welcomes the initiative of the Father.” (Stăniloae 2006: 59)

“The apparitions of the Resurrected Christ were experienced in a real mode by a string of members of the first Christian community. The traditions about these apparitions are well founded historically and they cannot be explained through a later formulation as legend. Even if fixing in writing these witnesses dates from later, they come from the beginning of the community, for only on the basis of the witnesses some eyewitnesses bore from the very beginning of the Christian community this community could be founded. There wasn’t possible to exist firstly the Christian community and then, after a certain time, to be produces the “myth” about the Resurrection of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 65)

“Explaining in psychological (psychogenic) manner the apparitions of the Resurrected Christ, in the frame of the Judaic Apocalypse which was formed

since the time of the Maccabees, it is groundless, given that that Apocalypse spoke only about a resurrection of all the dead people at the end of the world, and not about the resurrection of only one man in the frame of the present world.” (Stăniloae 2006: 66)

“Accepting a chain psychological reaction, by supposing that the disciples were some people with visionary capabilities, (“the hypothesis of a subjective vision”) it is groundless too, due to the motif that the diverse apparitions of Christ do not happen so close to one another. At least the one of Jacob (I Cor. 15: 5) and of Paul, they are well distanced in time.” (Stăniloae 2006: 66)

“The preaching of the Resurrection couldn’t have taken place in Jerusalem without having had an empty tomb. The Jews couldn’t deny this preaching by referring to the existence of Christ’s body in the tomb, but they employed the version that the body had been stolen.” (Stăniloae 2006: 66)

“One must take in account the fact that the witnesses of Christ’s apparitions were so convinced that those apparitions belonged to the Resurrected Christ, and those apparitions could instill so much trust in the ones who communicated them, so that they were able to not only give a cold declaration, answering some question (even being able to renounce at it, if the interests of their life required that), but they considered as being their duty to permanently confess this fact, out of their own initiative, for they reckoned it as paramount cause of their existence itself, so that almost all of them were able to die as martyrs because of the witness they bore. The “subjective visions” do not give such certitude to the ones who have them. The witnesses of Christ’s apparitions experienced a reality from beyond the objective and the subjective plans, but more intense than any objectivity their subjectivity was shared with.” (Stăniloae 2006: 66)

“The resurrected body wasn’t simply brought back to life, as the Jews at that time thought, but it was “transformed”. The Resurrection, according to Paul, it isn’t either a simple bringing back to life of the old body, or a creation of a new body out of nothing, but it is a radical transformation of the mortal body, through a creator work done upon the old body. We do not see at Paul either an evolutionist thinking, which to see between the dead body and the resurrected body a natural continuity, or – in the resurrected body – , the final point of a natural evolution of the dead body. It isn’t either a Gnostic-dualistic thinking, which would contest any connection between the old corporality and the new one. “We wait for Jesus Christ as Savior Who will transform the image of our body according to the image of the body of His glory” (Phil. 3: 20).” (Stăniloae 2006: 66)

“Christ and His sacrificed body, and through this sanctified, spiritualized, and transparent, forever in front of the Father, it is like a good fragrance

before the Father, showing by this the total surrender of Christ, as man, to the Father, the full communion with the Father into the Holy Ghost. This is the meaning of the expression “sacrifice of scent of good fragrance”, so often employed by Saint Cyril of Alexandria.” (Stăniloae 2006: 73)

“Christ’s state of sacrifice of good fragrance, before the Father, it is the state of total surrender to the Father, as opposed to any possibility of Christ’s Self-affirming as man. It is a state destined to be the source of a resembling state in the other people. That’s why Christ must be permanently in this state. (...) Christ’s wounds aren’t only some memories, but they have a permanent actuality in Christ. But they are also His power irradiating within us. Christ is in a continual surrender to the Father, as source of sacrificial death any man must have towards the sin, as source out of which each man is imparted with the good fragrance of Christ’s sacrifice, in order to present it to the Father, as opposed to the bad smell of the sin, of the affirming an independence in pleasure and pride. (...) But this state of real sacrifice Christ is in it is also a state of real compassion with us, a compassion that penetrates us too.” (Stăniloae 2006: 73)

“As one can see, the holiness as spiritual transparency, or as good fragrance, and as Christ’s surrender as man to the Father, it makes us too partakers to it, and also to the love of the Father for us, by accomplishing our communion with Him. Like the priests and the chiefs of Israel, with Moses and Aaron, went up on the mountain, likewise we are elevated to the Father, with Christ, and reach close to Christ, by being cleaned in His blood (...)” (Stăniloae 2006: 73)

“We have gained this familiarity with the Father for we entered before the familiarity with Christ, His Son.” (Stăniloae 2006: 73-74)

“The ones who are in this intimacy with the Son, they receive through the Ghost a width in their life and knowledge, out of the width of His life as man, advancing towards the spiritual nature of Christ (...). Christ’s life has become our life. The incorruptibility of His resurrected body is working within us in order to resurrect us. Our horizon has been widened in the resurrected Christ it has exceeded the horizon of the physical and psychological phenomena which repeat themselves, ending in death. The law closed our horizon, keeping us outside the communion with God in Christ. (...) With Christ Who has ascended through sacrifice and resurrection, we are ascending too, to the peaks of the knowledge of God and of the godlike life by cleaning ourselves of sins. Now we are looking, with our face uncovered, through the transparency of the body of Christ, at the unlimited and eternal glory the man has been elevated in Christ to. But this, the glory of Christ is being mirrored within us too (II Cor. 3: 18).” (Stăniloae 2006: 74)

“The impulses towards clean deeds and thoughts, they come to us from Christ, but once these ones are conceived and done, we turn them back to Christ. We turn back His gift with our interest rate added to it.” (Stăniloae 2006: 148)

“On the basis of the hypostatic communication, neither a manifestation and work of Jesus Christ is only godlike or human, but all of them are theandric, whereas, if it is done through the human nature, the subject won’t only human but he will also be godlike, and this fact, as we highlighted, it won’t bring only a divine title to a human work, but it will bring a divine effective presence, and, if it is done through the divine nature, the subject won’t be only divine but also human, and that implies an effective human presence.

It is a wonderful thing that this presence of the divine factor into the human work allows itself to be limited by the ontological borders of the human nature, as wonderful it is also that one that the human factor is suffered into the divine work. The godhead makes His presence effective into the human suffering without existentially impropropriating this suffering, and without annulling this suffering, and the humanity is present into almightiness without becoming almighty and without harming the almightiness. This mystery proves the consideration which God honors the human nature with, which He hasn’t created in order to abolish it, but to consummate it through His presence.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“We will see how, into the light of the Orthodox teaching, also His ascension to heaven receives a meaning, like also His second coming, whilst from the Catholic point of view, all of these lose both the interest and the reason.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The Transfiguration of Christ on Mount Tabor gave the Apostles the anticipated proof of Christ’s godhead and resurrection, and of the salvation of all the ones who followed to believe in Him, in order to confirm them the witness bore by Peter at Caesarea Philippi, that He is the Christ, the Son of God, a such a necessary confirmation for, after that confession of Peter, Christ spoke to Apostles about the death he followed to endure, but out of which he was to resurrect, and that caused to Apostles a straying that weakened their conviction regarding His godhead. Christ showed them, thus, that between His godhead and His sacrifice as man for people, there is no contradiction, but just this sacrifice shows the greatness of His godlike love. The higher God is, the more He is capable of a greater humbleness, out of His love, for people.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 203)

“Christ’s humanity has become, through His sacrifice, an environment of the godlike light, shiny, through His face, as the sun, and, through His vestments, white as the snow. It is a light which, though shown through the material human face, it though has a spiritual character, like the light of the kindness is shown on the man's face and especially in the saint's aura.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 204)

Christian Dogmas

"(...) to the Christian, the dogma isn't a narrowing of the free spiritual development of the human being who believes, but, on the opposite, the dogma maintains the human being capable of such a free development." (Stăniloae 2003:

"We have strived in this synthesis (...) to discover the spiritual signification of the dogmatic teachings, to highlight their truth in correspondence to the deep needs of the soul that searched for his salvation and who advances on its road in the most positive communion with his fellow humans, through which he reaches at some experiencing of God, as supreme communion and as source of the communion." (Stăniloae 2003: 5)

"(...) an Orthodox Dogmatic Theology it means an interpretation of the dogmas - in the sense of bringing in plain sight their deep and endlessly rich savior content, namely alive and spiritual (...)" (Stăniloae 2003: 5)

"We have guided ourselves during this endeavor by keeping in mind the way the Holy Fathers understood yore the Church's teaching, but we have taken heed in the present interpretation of the dogmas also the spiritual necessities of the soul searching for his salvation in our times (...). We have strived to understand the Church's teaching in the spirit of the Holy Fathers, but, in the same time, to understand the Church's teaching as we think the Holy Father would have understood it today. For they wouldn't have made abstraction of our time, as they didn't do it either of their time." (Stăniloae 2003: 5-6)

"The most dreadful sadness we can have, it is that of the lack on meaning, namely the lack of an eternal meaning of the life and of our deeds. The necessity of this meaning it is intimately connected to our being. The dogmas of the faith correspond to this necessity of meaning our being has. By offering our being a meaning, the dogmas affirm the complete rationality of the existence." (Stăniloae 2003: 20)

"These points of the faith are some kinds of natural dogmas, having their source in what we call the natural revelation through which God makes Himself known from the fact itself that he created the world and the man and he imprinted in the world and in the man the mentioned meanings. These points of the faith are recognition of the fact that the world culminates in the human person who moves towards the union with the supreme Person. Far from reducing the existence to a locked-up horizon, they open the horizon of the infinite to the world, trying to escape the world from the narrow and monotonous horizon that comes to an end with the death." (Stăniloae 2003: 20)

“The man doesn’t know the possibility of fulfilling the purpose of his life except out of the words and out of the acts of the supra-natural Revelation; only those words and acts show the man that he can escape the nature’s corruption; only those words and acts open to the believer the perspective of not being dissolved in the nature that is submitted to the corruption of all the individual forms, as also the possibility of being saved. Only the dogmas of the faith from the supra-natural Revelation ensures the man the perspective of a freedom from nature, while still being in the earthly life, and a full freedom in the eternal existence.” (Stăniloae 2003: 30)

“The Christian Dogmas are, according to their form, the points of the plan of our salvation and deification, comprised and achieved in the supra-natural godlike Revelation, which culminated in Christ, and the dogmas are preserved, preached, applied, and explained or defined by the Church. As such the dogmas represent truths of faith which are necessary to salvation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 72)

“The Dogmas explain Christ and His work of summarizing everybody in Himself.” (Stăniloae 2003: 73)

“The supra-natural Revelation specifies these ultimate truths of the existence, expressed by dogmas, and it shows concretely the possibility of being these dogmas fulfilled, and even their fulfillment in Christ, and our advancement towards appropriating the dogmas by the help of God descended to us, in Christ and in the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2003: 73)

“God reveals Himself, or He reveals the supra-natural dogmas through an initiative of His, an initiative which is felt by the organs of the Revelation. And this makes the dogmas obvious. The meaning of the dogmas become obvious out of the content this revelation unveils it.” (Stăniloae 2003: 73)

“(…) the supra-natural Revelation is the strongest motif for accepting the Christian dogmas.” (Stăniloae 2003: 74)

“The meaning of the supra-natural Revelation’s dogmas it had a greater clarity than the meaning of the natural dogmas, for it makes God more obvious like Person who has in Himself the full meaning itself and Who gives meaning to everybody. But this is because the organ who receives the Revelation and the one who receives the Revelation from that one, they come in contact with the existence of the Supreme Person, Who is obvious in Himself, and he sees involved in that Supreme Person the ensuring of the fulfillment of everybody’s meaning, of their eternal existence towards which they aspire.” (Stăniloae 2003: 74)

"(...) the preservation, the preaching, and the applying or the fructifying, the explaining and the defining by the Church of the dogmas, this is another ground for the dogmas to be accepted by the Church's members and by the people who open themselves with faith to the dogmas' witness." (Stăniloae 2003: 77)

"The dogmas of the Christian faith specify, in addition, that the man's salvation it will be ensured as an eternal happy existence, only if his relation with the supreme Person is so tight that it will imprint in the man, in an irrevocable manner, the powers and the godlike features, through the so-called deification of the man; for this makes the man as common bearer with God of the godlike features and powers, which totally overwhelm the impulse towards corruption of the human body." (Stăniloae 2003: 78)

"The dogmas are necessary for salvation because they express Christ in His work savior. But Christ saves us only if we open ourselves to Him, if we believe in him. The Christian dogmas express, therefore, the powers of Christ in the savior action, but on the condition that we believe in them." (Stăniloae 2003: 78)

"(...) the Christian dogmas (...) constitute a unitary spiritual whole, composed by several spiritual components, a system that differs from others, being at its turn crossed through by a unitary meaning. (...) the dogma's system isn't composed by abstract principles, but it is the living unity of Christ, the Person in whom it is united and Who unites the creation with God." (Stăniloae 2003: 79)

"(...) through freedom, the system (of the dogmas, o. n.) it is continuously and really open to the new. The system is open to the ones who want to know it, for them to advance on the plan of the spiritual infiniteness, in the eternal life, lived since one enters it, but plenary, in all its complexity, through the communion with God, the infinite Person; the eternal life will be lived in an always new and inexhaustible experience and joy, which isn't immobility, but live above immobility and movement in the meaning we know." (Stăniloae 2003: 79)

"Actually, in Christ is concentrated and integrally accomplished what it is expressed in the Christian dogmas: it is expressed the divine infinity His human nature participates to, and through this common human nature, all the people have the possibility to participate to the divine infinity." (Stăniloae 2003: 80)

"The Christian dogmas aren't a system of teachings, finite in its perspective and which depend on man for being limitedly accomplished, but the dogmas are the interpretation of the reality of Christ, on His way to be extended within people. As such, the dogmas express the most obvious Revelation, because Christ presses, as perfect divine-human reality, with His power and with His love, upon us.” (Stăniloae 2003: 81)

“(…) the Christian dogmas, though many, they are one, for Christ is One, but in Him are given all the conditions and all the means of our deification.” (Stăniloae 2003: 81)

“The dogmas – as doctrinal expression of the salvation and deification plan of the ones who believe, a plan done through the Church by Christ and by the Holy Ghost, or of the “treasures of wisdom” and godlike life put to us at hand in Christ, for us to gradually learn them during our earthly life, and to know them in their totality in the eternal life – they need a continuous highlighting of their endless content. This work is being done by Church through theology.” (Stăniloae 2003: 94)

“The results of the theoretical explaining (of the dogmas, o. n.), they become the teaching of the Church, which is identical to the churchly Tradition in a wider sense, by comprising in it an enriched understanding of the Holy Scripture and of the Apostolic Tradition, put into the service of the preaching and of the sanctifying and pastoral ministration of the Church.” (Stăniloae 2003: 94)

“(…) the dogmas, though defined in their form, they have an infinite content, that requires constantly and increasingly more to be shown, without being ever possible to be entirely presented.” (Stăniloae 2003: 95)

“The infinite character of the dogmatic formulas it doesn’t contradict their infinite content, rather it provides it.” (Stăniloae 2003: 95)

“God and the man are the two fundamental realities defined in the dogmas. And the second one being tied to the first one, it constitutes together a sole dogma. God and the man are defined as fundamental dogmas for they are the fundamental existences, in the same time obvious and not-understood. They are evident, because without them anything has a meaning, and they are full of mystery for they have an inexhaustible content.” (Stăniloae 2003: 95)

“The dogma of the union of the divine nature with the human nature, in a sole Person, without altering and without merging any of the two, it also places a precise, rigorous border between itself and any other affirmation of defining, in the same time uniting two great mysteries, the fundamental mysteries of the existence. Just by defining this union, it is affirmed and preserved the divine unity and the human participation to this infinity. Renouncing to this dogmatic definition it equals to admitting the abolishment either of the divine infinity and absoluteness, or of the human participation to it without the man being suppressed.” (Stăniloae 2003: 95)

“Dogmas are strict definitions or delimitations. But they delimitate the infinity of God from the finite, and the infinite capacity the man has it to advance, or the infinity of God and the capacity of infinite of the finite man, solidary with the infinity of God, and in ceaseless closeness towards it.” (Stăniloae 2003: 97)

“Is has been analyzed the difference between dogmas and theologoumena. The dogmas would be the formula established by the Church, while the theologoumena would be some theological explanations which haven’t been grated yet an official churchly formulation, but the theologoumena still derive from the dogmas. (...) Actually, all the explanations given to the dogmas depend organically on the dogmas. And if they do not remain in the frame of these formulas, they cannot be even reckoned as theologoumena and they cannot aspire to be invested with the character of dogmas, in who know what future.” (Stăniloae 2003: 99)

“(...) the progress in understanding dogmas is possible for the dogmas have an infinite content too, and, as such, their content is apophatic (untold) or impossible to ever be comprised in notions and words which to exhaust that content.” (Stăniloae 2003: 110)

“The dogmatic formula of the unique in being and threefold in Persons Godhead, it is, as any dogmatic formula, the confession of the faith into a reality which saves us, and therefore it gives us a maximum for understanding, given the infinite abyssal of the Godhead. This dogmatic formula delimitates the Christian teaching about God, in comparison to other teachings, only in the sense that such a Godhead is the only one savior, as basis of the loving communion with us in eternity. But is comprises through as much as it gives us, the frame of the true infinity and it opens our perspective of the personal o participation to it forever and ever. This is for the perfect and the eternal community of the three Persons, in which subsists the supra-essence of the Godhead, it is given by the infinity and by the consummation of the loving life of the Trinity and of each Person of the Trinity. And therefore, only through the Trinity’s communion it is ensured our eternal communion with the infinite life of God and the not-confounded life amongst us, as partakers to this infinity. Through this it ensures our persistence and consummation as persons forever. Being in the same time to us revealed and above any understanding, it constitutes the basis, the infinite reserve, the power and the model for our eternal progressive communion, but in the same time urges us to a continuous thinking and to a spiritual growth, helping us to continuously surpass any stage we have reached in our communion as persons, with God and amongst us, and to make efforts for an increasingly deeper understanding of the mystery of the supreme communion.” (Stăniloae 2003: 295)

“The Christian dogmatics isn’t a system of ideas having the character of rigorous precepts, before which the man is left by himself, with his own powers. Such systems cannot express more than the limited man can, and these systems cannot give the man a power from above himself, in order to surpass the state of his insufficiency.” (Stăniloae 2006: 47)

“The Christian dogmatics presents the savior-and-of-eternal-life-giver-work of the godlike Person of Christ Who has become man, as also our free relation with the Person of Christ, and how due to this relation we can receive this endless life. On this Person and on the relation with Him depends the salvation, or the man’s escaping from his inefficiency and mortality. The Christendom doesn’t let us in the frame of our limited powers, neither tells us about imagined impersonal powers which all of us could dispose of, through some techniques, but the Christendom tells us about the real Person, above all the embodied God, as source of the whole life, of the consummate and eternal life, Who has proven His interest in us, through the connection He entered the history with us, in order to remain in this connection forever and ever. That’s why in Christendom one cannot properly speak about a “savior teaching” and we aren’t saved by a law, not even by the law of the Old Testament, but we are saved by the Person of Jesus Christ. He is the end of the law (Rom. 10: 4). That’s why He is called “the Savior”. No other religion founder is called savior, but they are called law-giver or the teacher of that religion.” (Stăniloae 2006: 47)

“In the Ecumenical Synods, the bishops always signed a dogmatic decision based on the faith and of the sacramental life of their Churches, as inherited through tradition. The dogmatic formulas weren’t else but the concise expression of this faith as practiced or lived within Church. That’s why it has been possible to integrate these formulas in the songs and in the prayers of the Church.” (Stăniloae 2006: 104)

“The Church’s faith, by expressing the conviction about this working presence of Christ within Church and in the Church’s limbs, it is not separated from a certain experiencing of this work of Christ. In this experience the dogmas have their unshakable character. And that’s why the Church’s unity is a dogmatic unity, for it is a unity based on the same experiencing of a Christ working through the Holy Ghost, in all the Church’s parts and limbs. Rightly said, The Answer of the Oriental Patriarchs towards the non-juror Anglicans, it declares that the oikonomia practiced by Orthodoxy it never refers to the dogmas.” (Stăniloae 2006: 109-110)

“Actually, if the Church’s dogmas express the experiencing of Christ as present and working within Church, and if the Church’s unity in dogmas it means this unitary experiencing of Christ, disregarding the dogmas it will mean not only weakening the Church, but will also mean reducing the content of the faith to a sum of subjective interpretations about a Christ, about Whom one has heard, and Who remains at distance, and it won’t be their identification to the experiencing of Christ lived in His integral work, through the Holy Ghost. In this case, actually, preaching Christ it isn’t covered by the power of experiencing His power, but it becomes a sum of theoretical, speculative, and emptied of power interpretations. If the dogmas express the experiencing of all Christ’s works within Church, refusing some of the dogmas equals to refusing or to not knowing some of the Christ’s works within Church, namely equals to depriving Christ of the integrity of His efficiency within Church and within the Church’s limbs – the know dogmas no longer representing the experiencing of the Christ’s works, or representing only the experiencing of some of His works – namely, Christ has no longer a full savior efficiency within Church and within the Church’s limbs. The unity in a firm faith, based on the inward experiencing of all the Christ’s works by the entire Church, it is tightly connected with the assuring of the salvation obtained through the Church.” (Stăniloae 2006: 110)

“If the dogmatic belief of the Church and the Church’s unity are the expression of living the fully savior presence of Christ within Church, these dogmas cannot be regarded as object of transaction, as it could be in the case of a faith reckoned as simple interpretation about a distanced Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 111)

“For the dogmas are the expression of the integral savior power of Christ, Who is present in the fullness of His work within Church, the unity of the Church consists also of its unity in Mysteries and in investing the Church with a unitary hierarchy in order to commit all the Mysteries, without differentiations, and which to preach the same dogmatic beliefs. Properly-said, only through the Mysteries committed in a unitary mode by the members of the three levels of the priesthood, Christ as present within Church is a reality experienced in His work, in a unitary and full mode. The full dogmatic faith and the totality of the Mysteries they form a whole. Only together they keep the Church and the believers in the ambience of the savior work and of the endless love of Christ, One of the Trinity, Who has become man. The Church is one by its unity in all the three sides: in dogmas, which express in notions and words the faith in the presence of Christ within Church, in cult that through the Mysteries it comprises it communicates the work of Christ present within Church, and in the work of the hierarchy that commits the Mysteries and that preaches the faith in the working presence of Christ within Church.” (Stăniloae 2006: 111)

“In matters of relations with the diverse Churches, in organizing its action in the various life circumstances of the diverse nations of groups of believers determined by their traditions, the One Church can take the countenance of autocephalous Churches, with own statuses, regulations, and action forms. Only in dogmas, and in Mysteries, in the hierarchy that preaches the dogmas and commits the Mysteries, the Church is one. Only a Church-one in dogmas, in Mysteries, in the hierarchical organizing and communion, it is a truly unitary Church, and only the Church that keeps these three, without flows, it is a unique Church.” (Stăniloae 2006: 111)

“Christ commitment through embodiment, towards the people’s salvation, it was decided by God from eternity, because He foreseen the man’s drama.

This detail, which is clearly announced by the Holy Scripture, it is a great mystery. It hints, without rational understanding, to the problem of God’s liberty and predestination. If God took this decision from eternity, it still can this be a so-called decision? Making a decision it means, in our experience, to have been standing on a moment in which you could have taken another decision. But, if He hadn’t made this decision from eternity, it would have meant that God hadn’t foreseen the fall of the man and he would have committed Himself to a huge and important action of embodiment and sacrifice, at one corner of His existence. An equally difficult to be clarified question, it is this: would the fall of Adam still remain a deliberate act, if it existed from eternity, readymade, the plan for the salvation of the man?

This wide truth is expressed also by the dogma about the God’s eternal decision regarding the embodiment and the salvation. It spares the God’s changelessness, but in the same time relates Him to the world and to the time, though while elevating Him, through the liberty that it recognizes to Him, above it.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The Church has established this amazing deed of love of the Son of God towards us, into a dogmatic formula as concise and as rigid as possible (the elasticity and the prolixity are dangerous when they are at the reach of a big crowd; moreover, the dogma is not destined to be preached in its formula; the formula is only a guidance), so much correct, superhuman and wholly comprehensive. The formula of the Ecumenical Synod from Chalcedon tells us: “We confess the One and the same Son, Lord, Jesus Christ, full God a full man, recognized in two natures united in undivided manner, not separated, unmixed, the difference of the natures not being disbanded because of the union, but each of the two natures keeping its features and flowing together into a Person and into a Hypostasis”. According to this formula, the Subject is one into Jesus Christ and the natures are two. The communion in two natures in Jesus Christ has been called as hypostatic union, through hypostasis being understood, in the first place, the entirety of a reality – in our case the two natures forming a whole – and then the personal principle, because the Three Persons of the Holy Trinity are called as Hypostases.

The question is, what consists in, more precisely, the person unlike the natures? The person is not a part of nature, because the dogma tells us that nothing from the human nature is missing in Jesus Christ, nor the soul, neither the reason, nor the will. Driven by these general indications, Leontius of Byzantium and John Damascene saw the subject, the person, into the godlike Word, into Logos. This One, by having like the godlike nature as His from eternity, He has impropriated the human nature too, by making Himself a subject to it too. The human nature from within Jesus Christ it does not stand by itself, like a whole sufficient to itself and rounded in itself, in which case it would have formed a hypostasis, but, since the moment which it has started to form in, it stays in Logos, having Him like support.

This is the theory of en-hypostatization, mentioned by Leontius from Byzantium⁹¹. The general teaching becomes thus the idea that “the unique subject into Christ is the Logos, which has embodied Himself, namely He has impropriated the human body and everything related to his humanity”⁹².

Two conclusions can be drawn out of this teaching. The first one, is that the subject not only isn't a part of the nature, but, by and large, the subject isn't anything else but the nature's form of standing by itself. The human nature, by not standing in it, but in Logos, it has this form together with Him, together with His nature, by forming together a hypostasis, though before the embodiment the Logos existed exclusively like a divine hypostasis.

This interpretation has the advantage that it really saves the man into Jesus Christ. The difficulty is that it seems not applicable to the Holy Trinity, where the human being stays only one time but though there are Three Hypostases.

Another conclusion which was deducted before, it is that the subject has an own reality, being different from nature, and being something else than the simple self-existence of the nature. This conclusion was drawn by S. Bulgakov. According to him, the subject is that mysterious ghost, which cannot by any means be determined, but like owner and manipulator of all the discernable features and parts which compose the human nature. The cogitation is also nature, the will is the same, because when I am saying: “I cogitate”, “I” is beyond of the cogitation, it is the subject, the owner of cogitation, of what, when I am speaking in the first person, I can put it in the accusative. It is the last unseen agent, from the backstage, of the nature. It is uncreated, while the nature is created. The subject's place into Jesus Christ it has been taken by the Logos, Who, in front of the divine nature He has the same situation like our self in front of the human nature, and by human nature He doesn't differ but gradually, because the human self is a divine speck, while the Logos is a divine Hypostasis. The human nature does not endure any catastrophe through the substitution of the own self with the Logos, for also the divine essence are one and another. It is in the human nature's destiny to be carried out by a divine subject⁹³." (Stăniloae 1993)

⁹¹ OSKAR BENSON, Die Lehre von den Kenose, Leipzig, 1903, p. 12-13.

⁹² In these expressions summarizes, for example K. Jüssen, the doctrine of Hesychios from Jerusalem: “Die dogmatischen Anschauungen des Hesychios von Jerusalem, Münster in West, 1931, p. 127.

"A new look into the depth of truth of the dogma about the hypostatic unity, it is occasioned to us by the lights which it throws towards reality by and large, the thinking of the French philosopher Louis Lavelle. And, according to him, the work (the act, how he called it) it is not brought by the subject, but the subject finds it available to use it how he wants. So, the work is of the Whole which the individual belongs to. "The individuals, he said, although they hold in some measure the initiative, they are, though, the depositaries and the instruments of a power which exceeds them. Will be said then, that the act (the work) it is the inalienable property of the individual conscience and that, instead of confounding everything, we must take heed that the constitutive act of each conscience it is separated from all the others? But, also here we must defend ourselves against an illusion. Every individual takes in possession the act, and he disposes of it through an initiative which is of his own" (De l'Acte, p. 82). "The act, if one may say so, it is capable of everything, but it belongs to our own conscience to make it capable of a certain thing" (p. 83). It is like we are hearing Maximos the Confessor, declaring: "Is not the same thing to want and to want in a certain way". And Lavelle said also: "The act through which I cogitate... it is independent from the content itself which I am giving to it and which it makes out of me a particular individual. It must, without any doubt, to be me the one who fulfills it, but this fulfillment, which makes it my own, it does not change its nature, neither it exhausts it" (p. 86). "Since it is assumed through your or through my initiative, the act produces both our own autonomy and also our differences (which do not result only out of our individual nature, but also from the exercise itself of our own liberty)" (p. 86)." (Stăniloae 1993)

"In order to circumscribe the problem (of the radical kenosis (E. l. t.'s n), it is necessary the better listening to the voice of the Holy Scripture and of the ⁹³ Agnetz Bojii, Ymca Press, Paris, 1933.

Churchly dogma. What the Holy Scripture is telling us? Though it speaks impressively about the real humanity of Jesus Christ, by attributing Him all he toils and the pains of the humanity, it does not less clearly speak about His godhead, and not just through simple affirmation, like about a reality beyond any ascertaining, but also through the certification of the manifestation of many of the features. So that, about a kenosis in the sense given to it by the Protestant theology of the nineteenth century, like renouncement, from the part of the Son of God, to the activation of some of His divine features, there cannot be the case. The churchly dogma declares that the two natures are united in Christ “unchanged”. Though the believers of the kenosis try to get rid of this difficulty, through the affirmation that not the godlike nature was changed through the embodiment of the Logos, but the form of the activations of its features, though, the sense of this lack of change it is stated by the Sixteenth Ecumenical Synod, through the addition that also “the work” of each nature remained unchanged.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“In any other regard, the exercising of the divine power was depending on His will. This is the dogmatic sense of the almightiness, in order to be saved the God’s character as Person. Jesus Christ didn’t used it even in His most tragic moments, and this was due to His will, put into the service of the goal which He was following through His love. Otherwise, in love there is also power. To this we will return a little later. The same are the thing in the case of His supra-temporality and supra-spatiality. These features mean, on one hand, the He isn’t submitted to the time and to the space, and on the other hand that the time and the space obey Him. Therefore, they express the power of God to be independent of time and space, and not His need for staying outside them. The time and the space cannot be considered like being outside the presence of God. This would be a limitation of Him. God enters, if He wants, the time too, without losing by this His situation as superior to the time. Whereas He made Himself subject of the human nature, He entered the time and the space, He has conditioned, voluntarily, His actions on these, but just that was spatial and temporal from His acts, as much as He can transpose through the human nature. But, besides that, His godlike acts reached the super-temporal and the super-spatial, or started from there, being determined in both human and godlike manner⁹⁴. Through His humanity flooded into history the godlike energies, of course, not in a physical form, like the Protestants distort such a belief, but through the human spirit which receives, freely and with faith, the word and the power of the word from Jesus Christ. The form, the visible and verifiable instrument, like any reality from the bosom of our world, through which come these energies, and, in the first place the belief about the presence of God, it is human, but the content, to be experienced in another way than the natural one, it is godlike. Therefore, not the verifiable form or contribution are the godhead, one may say that this remains supra-historical, but, because in this form, through this environment that conveys the godhead, the godhead is present and works, and that descended into history and revealed Himself, influencing the history.” (Stăniloae 1993)

⁹⁴ KARL ADAM, W. c.: “All the human elevated features grow up rather directly from the existentiality and His supra-earthly destination” (p. 207); “His earthly life is only the representation, the prolongation or, rather, the spatial-temporal transparent of this eternal, ultimate reality. His own and deep ground is the kingdom of the unseen, of the supra-earthly, of the godlike, there is the throne of the One old of days. In His person the eternity erupts in time, the supra-historical in the plan of the history, the godlike into the human” (p. 197).

“The communication of the features, understood like that, it is another expression of the dogma about the union of the two natures into a person, without changing themselves, but without being separated.

This dogma sets the right limit to the kenosis of the godlike nature and to the human nature deification.

The communication of the features must be defined like a mediation between two poles. It does not mean modifying the natures, but it is not only a nominal communication of features and works. Neither of the natures gains existentially a feature of another nature. The godlike nature does not become suffering; neither the human nature becomes wonder working. Nevertheless, there is produced a connection between the human nature’s suffering and the godlike nature, like it is produced also a real connection between the wonderworking power of the godlike nature and the human nature. Whereas the two natures form together a single hypostatic center, and this center bears the suffering of the human nature elevating it and purifying it, into a real mode, it can be said that it bears this suffering, like something being existentially foreign, but in the same time being functional, and proper, to the godlike nature too. The new elements which the human suffering penetrates the unique hypostasis with, they come out of the godlike nature. It feels into Jesus Christ that the humanity’s support has a divine character.

But, also the inverse, whereas the wonderworker subject through the godlike nature, He is also a human nature’s expression, through Him it is being felt the presence of this nature in working the miracles, as this nature participating to that work, thereby being possible to rightly attribute the wonderworking also to the human nature.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Determined like so, the sense of the deification, the churchly dogma about the deification of the human nature of God since His life time on earth, it becomes easier to understand. Likewise, it is clarified the thought that also into heaven, with all the godhead brought to maximum, the human nature will have kept its characteristics and, so, we do not need theories like that one of Luther about the ubiquity of the body of God after ascension into heaven, which exceeds the frames of the dogma from Chalcedon about the not- changeability of the natures. All the attempts to imagine and understand the godhead are too loaded with the complexity of the following concepts: space, substance, and direct physical power. The deification would have to be, after these fantasies, a spatial-energetic dilatation towards infinite, which would lead to a breaking of the limits, to an annulment of the human nature.

But it is essential to man to be a subject of intentionality, sustained by a limited spiritual effort. When to the effects of the own effort we feel that there are added much bigger effects due to another center and subject of spiritual power, our nature hasn't been annulled, for we realize continuously what it gives us. The godlike Word from after the embodiment, both in the time until He lived with His human nature on earth, and also after that, forever and ever, He remains aware of the limit of the efforts made through His human nature. But, because to the human work it is associated the godlike work, He is the bearer of unlimited powers." (Stăniloae 1993)

"In the light of these thoughts the dogma of the Church about the contribution which the living ones can bring, namely the descendants, to ease the fate of the dead ones, through prayer and mercy, gain a wider meaning. Through our prayers and mercy for the forefathers, it is amplified and raised our Christian conscience, becoming a factor of determination in the same direction for our descendants and, in the same time, showing like being good the fruits of the influence that our forefathers have had upon us⁹⁵." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Nothing can stand next to God. Foundation dogma cannot be except a teaching occupying itself mainly with God, and formulating His unveiling. A teaching which the image of the man predominated in, elevated to the rank of central dogma, it would mean a man's self-divination. Dogma, in the ⁹⁵ Of course, we do not affirm that the sense of the prayers for the dead ones it is exhausted through this one. Their meaning of compassion of God the merciful, through the showing of our solidarity in love, it still remains. Maybe is more appropriate to mention here the theory of N. Fedorov (1828 – 1903), who, into his writing "The Philosophy of the Common Work", he sustains that we can resurrect our ancestors, but not through prayer and mercy, but through science and technique, because, finally, the science will reach – through the work of the people – the stage to be able to gather the energies of the ancestors from the cosmic space and to concentrate them again into their body. Through science and industry, the mankind can do everything on world, because the science and the industry hasn't been created by God, in some frames, but like a material of all the possibilities. N. Fedorov proves to be more an antecessor of the Bolsheviks, than a Christian thinker. See about him: Prot. G. Florovschi, Puti ruscago Bogoslovია, Paris, 1937, p. 322, and the followings.

undiluted meaning of the term it is a mirror which nothing is not allowed in, to be seen in the foreground, except God.

It is true that in this heavenly mirror the man can see himself too, but as it is due when he looks at himself in the report with God: not as self-standing, not on the foreground, not in the glory wanted by his haughty phantasy, but in dependency on God, by receiving the whole his being, the whole his meaning, and the whole his light from God.” (Stăniloae 2005: 49)

“The man cannot be seen in his true life except nigh to God. The one who tried to see only God, that one simply no longer would see Him as man. And in this meaning, the Ecumenical Synods’ dogmas about God, they include also a teaching about man.” (Stăniloae 2005: 49-50)

“The East have received from God the grace and the mission of laying down the dogmas as foundation of the human existence, and the East has preserved them as such until today, and now the East is able to instill to the world a new trust in God and in man, as indisputable, imperishable, and supreme realities and values.” (Stăniloae 2005: 50)

“The Christians dogmas were founded and they are kept until today in our East, with the center of their irradiation in the imperial stronghold of the Byzantium.” (Stăniloae 2005: 50)

“When in the year 842, Patriarch Methodius and Empress Theodora decided to chose the First Sunday from the Easter Lent as celebration day of the triumph against the mockers of the icons, and they decided to call this Sunday as the Sunday of the Orthodoxy, they didn’t think at making of it an occasion for celebratory reconfirming only of the dogma of the Seventh Ecumenical Synod, but also of the entire dogmatic edifice erected in the Ecumenical Synods, as a remembrance and a praising occasion of them too. The Sunday of the Orthodoxy was back then the Church’s holiday for the completion of the formulation of the frame of the revealed faith and for the Church’s victory upon all heresies.” (Stăniloae 2005: 50-51)

“Although honoring the holy icons doesn’t constitute the unique criterion of the Orthodoxy, and the dogmas regarding this it was the last formulated, it still consists one of the Orthodoxy’s criteria and values.” (Stăniloae 2005: 51)

“The dogma about the holy icons it still is a teaching about God, s0o that it still is a dogma in the full meaning of the word. This dogma doesn’t mean, at is seem to some people, the elevation of some part of the nature on a godlike level, namely idolatrizing the seen things.

This opinion was presented also by the iconoclasts of the VIII-IX Centuries, who were strongly affirming that the Godhead cannot be suggested through the lines and the colors of a drawn or painted image. They avoided the icon because of fearing that through icon the pagan idolatry could be introduced in Christendom. But against the icon, in Christendom, there no longer can be brought valid motifs related to the images of the deities.” (Stăniloae 2005: 51)

“The dogma established by the Church, which any heresy stumbles upon, it is that not only the godlike being is uncreated, but also the things related to the godlike being are uncreated, for instance the hypostases, the relations amongst hypostases, and the hypostatical features.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 72)

“The Christian dogmas are the only assurances that the world and the human person aren’t submitted to some meaningless laws, which to lead all the things towards their definitive death; the Christian dogmas show all the things as able to increase in meaning and in light, through the love from God, free of such fatal and inexplicable laws.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 157)

“The dogmas refer to the spiritual plan of the existence, which isn’t submitted to some repeatable laws in a uniform manner, as the processes on the material plan are. The spiritual plan of the life is upheld through acts of free choice, through free chosen relations and developed by persons through acts, attitudes which are, to some extent, free from the material plan.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 157)

“The freedom of our faith in Christ it shows its power and its positive effect in our life also through the fact that it makes us masters upon our soul’s passions which otherwise can enslave us, and it helps us to increase our spiritual qualities in harmony with our fellow humans and with the infinite life of God. The Christian dogmas are shown in this too, as being expressions of our spiritual power and true freedom, upheld by the freedom of God.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 164)

“The Christian dogmas open an endlessly elevating horizon, in the eternally upheld generosity of our life, contrary to its locking up in the so-called “rationality” which doesn’t know except the narrow, egotistic, and passing living into the seen materiality, a materiality submitted to some blind and totally inexplicable laws – if it isn’t admitted that there is above those laws a conscious and free existence.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 164)

“The Christian dogmas are the light of the love offered by God to the people, being shown through Apostles and through their descendants, who were at their turn luminous lights too, able to eternally grow up as state of love.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 164-165)

“They say, that sometimes we must go above the dogmas established by the ecumenical synods on the basis of the Gospel, and to formulate new teachings, in order to answer the contemporary man. But what moral height can we be elevated at, more than the humbleness and the love for people going even to death, which the Son of God has elevated us at, by making Himself man and by receiving the cross for people? By this, the Christian dogmas comprise in themselves, in the same time, the urge towards the most glorious deeds, towards the most noble humanity accomplished in the eternal communion of love with the Son as our Brother and with the Father as our Father.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 172)

“The Christian dogmas represent the real good as supreme level of the existence which the dogmas want to elevate the man at, and the dogmas are, in the same time, the Truth, for there cannot be, above all things, only some blind laws, leading all the creatures to death. But at this Truth, the conscious creatures aren’t elevated without also an effort made by them, as expression of their freedom.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 172)

Church

“The Church is the dialogue of God with the believers through Christ into the Holy Ghost. The dialogue previously had with the Word, from distance, it reached to be an intimate dialogue through the Embodiment of the Son of God as man, and it starts to be extended through the Church. Thus, the Church is the supra-natural revelation, ended into Christ, in its efficiency upon us over time, through the Holy Ghost; the Church is the Christ united into the Holy Ghost with the ones who believe, upon whom it has been extended and through whom it is being extended His action of attracting them, through the dialogue with them, in the process of likeness with Him. The believers, through the sensitiveness produced in them by the Holy Ghost in the Church, they become aware of the power of Christ in which the whole Revelation is fulfilled, and they become aware of the action this power has within them. But they don’t discover a new Revelation or a plus of Revelation in addition to that achieved in Christ. The Revelation continues to be active through the Holy Ghost into the world, in and through the Church, but it doesn’t continue to be completed with new parts. The Revelation is whole into Christ and out of Him the Revelation works in and through the Church upon the conscious beings who believe and who receive the faith.” (Stăniloae 2003: 50-51)

“The Church is Christ as full Revelation in the continuation of His efficiency. Out of Him the Revelation continues to lighten and to warm, through the Holy Ghost, integrally – not only to the end of the time but also in eternity, in and through the Church from earth and from heavens, out of His body as form of communion between Him and them, and amongst them too – the ones who believe.” (Stăniloae 2003: 51)

“The Church has, therefore, through the Holy Ghost, the mission of making efficient not regardless which revelation, but that Revelation fulfilled into Christ, or on Christ as incorporation of the full Revelation and in the real prophetic tension implied in him. The Church has therefore also the mission to preserve through the Holy Ghost the Revelation fulfilled into Christ Who makes the Church able to discern the authenticity of the revelation, in the Revelation’s fullness and in the Revelation’s tension towards the final and true target. The Holy Ghost maintains the Church as adequate actualization means and witness to the authentic revelation and, through this, as means of achieving the human existence into Christ.” (Stăniloae 2003: 51)

“(…) the Church, through the Holy Scripture and through the Holy Tradition, it maintains in its true meaning the Revelation in action. The Church’s action is nothing else but putting in work the Revelation preserved within the Church in its entirety, as also preparing the believers for the Revelation’s work or for the work of Christ interpreted in the Holy Scripture and communicated through the Holy Tradition.” (Stăniloae 2003: 51-52)

“If the Scripture and the Revelation have their full concretizing into Christ, the Church cannot renounce to them by affirming that the Church has Christ Himself. This is because they are the authentic expression of Christ and there cannot be found any authentic fuller expressions of Christ, and the Church neither can remain with an unexpressed Christ. This is because an unexpressed Christ cannot manifest His efficiency. But by having Christ working in Church through the Holy Ghost, the Church is the only capable of authentically understanding and interpreting the Scripture (...)” (Stăniloae 2003: 52)

“(...) the Church isn’t only the sole to understand the Scripture and the Tradition as living and dynamic expression of the power of Christ – our final target -, but the Church is also the only one to put in actuality this power, or the warmth of this power, through the inter-human sensitiveness produced by the Holy Ghost.” Stăniloae 2003: 52)

“The living dialogue of the Church with Christ it takes place, mainly, through the Holy Scripture and through the Holy Tradition.” (Stăniloae 2003: 53)

“Christ Who works within us through the Holy Ghost, by communicating Himself as we can find out in the Scripture, He is in the Church. The Church is the body of Christ within which he works over times. The Church is full of Christ in His savior work. But if He is working within Church, the Scripture describing Him, when the Scripture is working, the Scripture must be in the Church too.” (Stăniloae 2003: 58)

“Therefore, the Church keeps the Scripture, applied through Tradition, always new but always the same. The Church keeps the Scripture in this way, through the hierarchical-sacramental structures, appointed by Apostle like being means of passing the content of the Revelation or of Christ in the people’s life.” (Stăniloae 2003: 58)

“The Whole sanctifying work of the Church, by calling a receiving the Holy Ghost, and by the Church’s doxology, and the whole moral and spiritual life of the believers: all of them are based on the savior acts of Christ, on the power our humanity has reached at into Christ, as also on the example of the help granted by God in so many cases during the Revelation, and on the trust in the fact that the love of God becomes permanent, into Christ, for the people, love manifested in those acts, and on the trust that Christ has remained, in His resurrected state, close to us.” (Stăniloae 2003: 63)

“(...) the Church is the subject of the Tradition, the subject that applies the revelation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 65)

“The Church starts with the Tradition, and the Tradition starts with the Church.” (Stăniloae 2003: 65)

“Without Church, as its subject, the Tradition wouldn’t have come to existence and it would cease to be practiced and conveyed. At its turn, the Church would have come to existence, and it wouldn’t exist, without Tradition.” (Stăniloae 2003: 66)

“The Tradition, as continuous applying of the content of the Scripture, or better said of the Revelation, it is an attribute of the Church.” (Stăniloae 2003: 66)

“The Church too needs the Scripture, in order to be reinvigorated through it, in order to increase in the knowledge and in the living of Christ, in order to make increasingly richer the Scripture’s applying in its live through Tradition.” (Stăniloae 2003: 66-67)

“The Church has its origin in the direct work of the Apostles guided and animated by the Holy Ghost in the first applying of the Revelation and of the Apostolic Tradition. The Church hasn’t been founded by the mediation of the scripture. The Scripture came to existence within the Church’s bosom, and towards the Church’s profit, as written fixing of a part of the Apostolic Tradition, of a part of the Revelation, in order to nourish the Church out of, and to maintain the Church into the authentic Christ conveyed through the whole Tradition.” (Stăniloae 2003: 67)

“The Apostolic Tradition appears in the same time with the Church and the Church appears in the same time with the Apostolic Tradition, as practical applying of the Revelation. That’s why one cannot say which one is at the base of another, and we can only theoretically distinguish between them. But the Scripture was not born in the same time with the Church, but later, within Church. The Church had been bearing witness since the beginning, about Scripture as authentic part of the Tradition. Therefore, the Church protects the Scripture, as it also protects the Tradition, giving guarantee for it. But then the Church nourishes itself out of Scripture, as it feeds itself out of its whole Tradition.” (Stăniloae 2003: 67)

“The Church itself, as an incorporated Revelation, which is lived by a community of people, it is a part of the Revelation; namely, it is that end where it is finalized and the Revelation it starts bringing forth fruits. It was necessary that the Son of God to reach the end of His work of saving and revealing, to His resurrection and ascension as man, in order to send His Ghost through Whom He communicates this final state of revealing to the people, founding, since the Ghost’s descent within people, the Church. If the descend to the Ghost of Christ - as manifestation of the irradiated efficiency the human, fully saved into Christ, it has it – it is the last act of the Revelation, or of the work of salvation of the humanity in Christ, namely the concrete birth of the Church as beginning of extending the efficiency of the human fully save in Christ, it also depends on the last act of the salvation in Christ.” (Stăniloae 2003: 68-69)

“The Revelation gives birth to the Church, which is a concrete and continuous environment the humanity saved in Christ it extends through.” (Stăniloae 2003: 69)

“The Church if founded by Christ, in Whom culminated and it was concentrated the Revelation through acts and words.” (Stăniloae 2003: 69)

“(…) the Church remains the environment the Revelation is being applied within, to the end of time, the environment through which the savior power of Christ is given, through the Holy Ghost, as environment within which some people as and receive Christ and they grow up in Him, and they conform to him as their Model.” (Stăniloae 2003: 69)

“The act of bringing the Church to existence, through the Holy Ghost, and specifying the Church’s structures by Apostles, it differs from Revelation as full kindness of God for us, put at our disposition in Christ. Bringing the Church to existence and organizing its structures, they make possible to us, the believers, the conveying of the good things of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2003: 69)

“The Church moves within the Revelation, namely within the Scripture and the Tradition; the Scripture unveils its content within Church and Tradition; the Tradition is alive within Church.” (Stăniloae 2003: 70)

“The Church understands in an infallible way the meaning of the Revelation, because the Church itself is the work of the Revelation or of the Holy Ghost, and because the Church moves inside the Revelation by being organically united with the Revelation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 71)

“The Church understands the authentic meaning of the Revelation, for the Ghost maintains within Church the evidence of the lived plenitude of the Revelation, concretized in Christ. There cannot be a full Church without having the evidence of the divine-human fullness of Christ, a fullness which is in the Church, and the evidence of this fullness cannot be shown or activated except within Church and it is activated by the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2003: 71)

“The beginning of the Church it was, at its turn, a fact of the Revelation (...)” (Stăniloae 2003: 76)

“At Pentecost, the act of the Revelation doesn’t transform a collectivity in a religious national community, but it is about putting in the spiritual sight of a heteroclite assembly, the whole signification of Christ as embodied, resurrected and ascended God, for the salvation of everybody through a common faith, by attracting them to a common faith in Him.” (Stăniloae 2003: 76)

“(...) at Pentecost, the universal Church comes to existence through an act of revealing which puts in the spiritual sight of the assembly of the people present there, the savior presence of Christ amidst that assembly, and amidst their descendants, towards the salvation of everybody who will adhere to it.” (Stăniloae 2003: 76-77)

“The Church had, during the whole apostolic time, the conscience of the unseen presence, of the efficient presence of Christ within it, as a pressure equal to the one the Revelation exercised upon the Church as community. This conscience, the Church has been having it continuously, and the Church has it even after that time. But the Church no longer experiences the pressure of the Revelation as a string of acts through which things essentially new are communicated to the Church, but the Church experiences that pressure as a continuous act through which the Same Christ is ceaselessly present, with all His treasures of grace and truth. This is a sensitiveness maintained within Church by the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 2003: 77)

“The Holy Ghost gave the Church concrete existence, by putting, in the spiritual sight of the first people who believed and adhered to Christ, the savior presence of Christ. The Holy Ghost maintains the Church by continuously maintaining the same working presence of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2003: 77)

“The Church lives the working presence of Christ, like the organs of the revelation and the people of Israel lived the pressure of the revealing acts of God. The difference is that by this pressure, they aren’t always being communicated something essentially new, but the endless richness of the Same Christ in Whom is concentrated and in Whom is ended the whole Revelation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 77)

“The Revelation remains efficient through the Church; the Church is the environment the Revelation in its efficiency persists in. The Church maintains the Revelation alive; the Revelation maintains the Church alive. The Revelation receives thus a churchly aspect; the Revelation’s expression or dogmas, they become the expressions or the dogmas of the Church.” (Stăniloae 2003: 77-78)

“The Churchly teaching has authority of Churchly Tradition if entered in the general use of the Church, but it hasn’t the same authority had by the dogmatic definition and the points of the faith, the local synods expressed upon, in a consensus. Namely, it has churchly authority in its general content, but it hasn’t that authority of dogmatic formulas.” (Stăniloae 2003: 100)

“The new, accessible, and active presence of God into Christ, it extends its actualization also for people, within Church. It tends to become out of virtual omnipresence, and actual omnipresence. On the eschatological plan it will become an obvious actual omnipresence. Now it is an actual presence within Church, for the Church’s members recognize by faith that Christ is in maximum objective closeness to the people, and due to the Church, it can become, through their faith, an actual presence to them. But this presence increases in intensity, in each one, on the measure of his effort or spiritual sensitization.” (Stăniloae 2003: 220)

“By considering that our salvation is being accomplished by Christ, through the “punishment” to the very end, the Catholic theology has formulated the theory that the Church has been fully founded under the cross. But the Church hasn’t been founded in a juridical manner, but the Church ontologically flows out of the body of Christ, which, though it is sanctified on the cross, it is not yet filled with the whole godlike power except through Resurrection and Ascent. The Church has been actualized through all these acts, though it has been virtually given since the embodiment. The Church, if considered like being actualized only under the cross, after paying the whole satisfaction, it is a church exclusively understood as an earthly society of the ones who have quenched their conflict with God, through Christ. But the Church is the eschatological community, or the first fruit of the eschatological community, extended out of the resurrected body of Christ. The theory that everything has been solved by paying for sin, on cross, and not by deifying Christ’s body as source of our deification, it considers the Resurrection only as a recompense given to Christ for accepting the cross, and it doesn’t consider the Resurrection as the point that ends the whole work of the salvation and of the deification of the body, as basis of the salvation and of the deification of the people.” (Stăniloae 2006: 63)

“The result of this work of Christ within the hearts, through the Holy Ghost, it is the Church; or, this work’s fruit is the Church. One cannot separate between Christ’s work and the Church.” (Stăniloae 2006: 79)

“Through the embodiment, the life of obedience, the Crucifixion, the Resurrection, and the Ascent of the Son of God as man, it has been set, in the first fruit of our nature assumed by Him, the foundation of our salvation. But our salvation as such, it is done only by Christ’s dwelling inside us, with the body he wears, resurrected and ascended and fully spiritualized, or filled up with the Holy Ghost, and become, by this, transparent. This dwelling produces the Church. The Church is the finalizing of the savior action started by embodiment. The Church is the fifth act of this salvation work, given the fact that Embodiment, the Crucifixion, the Resurrection, and the Ascent are the first four acts. In this fifth act, all the ones who believe they receive the Word as fundamental Hypostasis, through His body extended in us. Through this, it is being seeded into the believers too, the sanctification and the beginning of the resurrection, which are in the body of Christ, sanctification and beginning of resurrection which are developed by the believers’ collaboration with Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 82)

“The descent of the Holy Ghost it is the ones which gives the Church its real existence, by laying down the beginning of the deified body of Christ in the other human beings and, by this, laying down the beginning of the Church.” (Stăniloae 2006: 82)

“The descent of the Holy Ghost it is thus the act of crossing from the savior work of Christ in His humanity as Person, to the extending of this work to all the other human beings. Through embodiment, Crucifixions, Resurrection, and Ascent, Christ has laid down the foundation of the Church into His body. Through those ones the Church has virtually come to existence. But the Son of God hasn’t made, on himself, man, for Himself, but in order to extend the salvation from His body within us, as godlike life. This godlike life, extended out of His body within the believers, it is the Church. This godlike life irradiated out of His body elevated to the full state of spiritualization through Ascent and through Christ’s sitting on the right hand of the Father, in the supreme intimacy of the infinity of the life and of the love which God directs towards the people.” (Stăniloae 2006: 82)

“The Church, virtually being within Christ’s body, it comes thus actually to existence through the irradiation of the Holy Ghost out of Christ’s body within the other human beings, a fact that starts on Pentecost, when the Holy Ghost descends upon apostles, making them the first limbs of the Church, the first believers within which the power of the spiritualized body of Christ extended. Without Church, the salvation work of Christ couldn’t have been accomplished.” (Stăniloae 2006: 82-83)

“But the Ghost remains forever in this irradiation. The expression “The Holy Ghost remains within Church” doesn’t oppose to this irradiation. The expression is true only in the sense that the Lord Himself, by being as man on the godlike throne, together with the Father, He is, in the same time, in the hearts of the ones who believe, and in communion amongst them, namely within Church, and so, the Holy Ghost by irradiating out of Christ, the Ghost also irradiates out of Church where Christ is dwelling. But, given the fact that Christ is on the godlike throne too, and Christ comes also from there in the ones who receive the faith or who have the faith and develop it through deeds, and He comes richer in the ones who advance in their faith, the Ghost comes, though, from beyond the Church too, or from beyond the intimacy of the believers' communion. That's why, on one hand the Church has the Holy Ghost continuously, though, on the other hand, the Church continuously asks for Him. For the Church has the Holy Ghost, the Church asks for Him, for the Ghost gives the Church power to ask for Him in prayer, in order to come even more (Rom. 8: 26)" (Stăniloae 2006: 85)

"Thus, the Church came to existence and it is being maintained in Christ by the holy Ghost Who descended on Pentecost and Who has remained within Church, but Who also is continuously coming within Church, by being asked for through prayer and through avoiding the sins, likewise Christ remains and increases within Church, through believers' prayer and sins avoidance too. Being the One Who remains, the Ghost isn't static though; neither Christ is static too, being the One Who remains. One cannot say that only in their coming is their movement shown and it is shown the Church's being elevated more fully in Them. Where the Holy Ghost and Christ are, there isn't lack of life. The Holy Ghost and Christ always urge the hearts to ask for Them to come more. The embraced ones aren't static in their embracing, but just in the embracing there is the impulse to embrace one another even tighter. Only where somebody no longer lives his faith, the remaining of the Ghost and of Christ it has a static character. But in this case the remaining is rather virtuality than a living and actual fact." (Stăniloae 2006: 85)

"The Ghost and Christ Who remain within Church and within believers, and They aren't static for the reason too that they aren't impersonal powers, but They are Persons. The Persons are always in movement, and They always want to communicate more, on Themselves. The godlike Persons are coming, since the beginning, by Their will, and They are remaining and They are coming in the same time, in order to maintain the living communion and in order to increase this communion, for which They must prepare and open, on themselves, also the ones the godlike Person are coming to, and who must ask for and want an increased coming of Theirs. Even the first coming of the Ghost, His "descent" by excellence, happened upon the Apostles who were persevering in prayer (Acts 1: 14), of course on the basis too of a partial possession of the Ghost Who, by remaining within the Apostles, he was urging them to ask for Him even more. Thus, the Church is essentially tied both to the initial descent of the Holy Ghost, and to the continuous descending of the Holy Ghost as Hypostasis within the human beings. And through the presence of the Ghost as Hypostasis, we understand, as we said before, an especially intense, obvious, and rich presence of the Ghost; Christ is present too, equally obvious, intense, and rich, namely hypostatically.” (Stăniloae 2006: 85-86)

“The Ghost has descended and has given existence to the Church, and He remains within the Church, maintaining the Church, for our human nature has been elevated on the godlike throne, or it has totally penetrated and made transparent by the Hypostasis of the Logos. As such, the Church has been filled up with the Ghost as Hypostasis consequently to the death endured by Christ and to His Resurrection; and through these two ones, the Church has become especially penetrating within our being.” (Stăniloae 2006: 86)

“The salvation work of which foundation had been laid down in the human nature of Christ, it is being brought to fulfillment in the form of the Church, which is our form of union with God and amongst us. Only in the harmony amongst the human beings into God, it is shown the fact that the human being has deserted the egotism as general image of the sin, or of the limitation in themselves as narrow monads. That’s why the salvation state equals with the churchly appurtenance, or to the concentrating of the saved ones within Church, with the common participation to the Christ’s body, for His body has been elevated above any preoccupation with the Self through the permanent state of sacrifice in Him. On the basis of His divine Hypostasis and of His state of sacrifice, Christ wants and He can gather everybody, by extending Himself within them through the Holy Ghost Who imprints to the people the same sacrificial disposition out of the body of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 87)

“The fact that the Holy Ghost appeared in flames of fire upon all the Apostles, it shows that the ghost isn’t really present except in the Church’s community, or where the Church is.” (Stăniloae 2006: 87)

“But the Holy Ghost didn’t descent only as flames of fire, but also accompanied “by a storm roar, which filled up the whole house the Apostles were staying in” (Acts 2: 2), “together with the women, with Mary, the mother of Jesus, and with His brothers” (Acts 1: 4). Through this it is indicated the power the first members of the Church were filled up with. Then a new reality was given birth within world. And as any new reality if born out of a new reality it bears within, the Church was coming to existence out of a new power from heavens, out of the infinite power of the godlike love, which the Church has been bearing it ever since, or out of which the Church has been sipping without exhausting it, and the Church has been communicating that heavenly power to the world. Those days was established a human community having the embodied Son of God as its foundation, through Whom the world is being communicated the endless love of God; it was coming to existence the reality of a communion which has never exhausted its powers for it has always sipping those powers from the infinity of God, through the human body of the divine Hypostasis. It was a reality or a communion which represented “the heavens on earth”, the embodied Word dwelling within Church with His continuously deifying and unifying power.” (Stăniloae 2006: 87)

“The Church is the union of everything that exists, or it is destined to comprise all that exists: God and creation. The Church is the accomplishing of the eternal plan of God: the all-unity. Within Church is the eternal and the temporal - the last one is destined to be overwhelmed by eternity; within Church is the uncreated and the created - the last one is destined to be overwhelmed by the uncreated, namely to be deified; within Church is the spiritual of all categories and the matter - the last one is destined to be spiritualized; within Church is the heaven and the earth penetrated by heavens; within Church is the spatial and the not-spatial; within Church is me and you, me and us, us and you, united in a divine “You”, or in direct dialogical relation with Him. *The Church is a human communitarian me in Christ as You, but, in the same time, the Church’s Me is Christ. The Church is the I of the prayer of all the conscious beings: terrestrials, angels, and saints, the prayer having in this sense a unifying role. In Church, in me and for me, all the members pray for me and I pray for all of them. Within Church all the things are united but not-confounded in this union. The Church is the body of Christ and as such it is united with Him and distinct from Him. The Church is the immanent having in itself the transcendent, namely the Trinitarian community of Persons full of endless love towards the world, maintaining within world a continuous movement of self-transcending by love.” (Stăniloae 2006: 87)

“The Church has a theandric constitution. The Church’s content consists of Christ, the One united, according to His godlike nature, with the Father and with the Holy Ghost, and united, according to His human nature, with us. Being comprised in the embodied Hypostasis of Christ, the Church can be called Christ, meaning the Christ extended in humanity.” (Stăniloae 2006: 87)

“The two factors, Christ and the humanity, they are so united within Church, so that within Church one of them cannot be seen without another and one cannot speak about one without speaking about another. About Christ we say that He is the Head of the Church, and about Church we say that is body to Christ. Christ has within Church the position as head, as foundation, as source of infinite life. Any speaking about one implies the speaking about another, and vice versa. We still speak about one of them at the time, when we try to highlight the special position each of the two factors has in this unity. The special position Christ has within Church, it mainly consists in His quality as head, of factor Who unites the believers in Himself as they would be a body, and in His quality as model and as source of power according to which the Church orients itself and is being filled up with Him and it is imprinted with Him, the Church becoming in Christ's image." (Stăniloae 2006: 88)

"Christ has become the Head of the Church by the fact that the divine Hypostasis has assumed the human image, the first fruit of our nature, by taking as man a central position amongst people. But this position becomes efficient only for He can communicate, through the Ghost, in human form, the godlike power, and He can make us to be imprinted by Him as by the true man's model, as by the deified man. But Christ is Head of the Church also by the fact that He has elevated this first fruit to the state of sacrifice, a state superior to any egotistic preoccupation, and to the state of Resurrection, making possible to exist by this the two state imprinted in a combined mode in His body, in order to communicate us too, the power of impropriate them, or to elevate our humanity to those two states. And this means elevating our humanity in the union with the infinity of God as Person, because only through sacrifice, by surrendering, on ourselves, to God, we tear down the walls which close us in our limitation and we enter the full communion with God and with our fellow humans." (Stăniloae 2006: 88)

"Saint Apostle Paul directly called Christ as Head of the Church: "Christ is the head of the Church's body" (I Col. 1: 24, 18). "He submitted everything under His feet, and He has given Him, above all, as Head to the Church, which is His body, the fulfillment of the One Who fulfills everything in everybody" (Ephes. 1: 22-23). Or: "Let's increase in all things in Him Who is the Head of the Church, in Christ, out of Whom every well composed and well finished and nourished through all the connection, it does, by the work fitted to any limb, its growing up as body" (Ephes. 4: 15-16). Or: "The man is head to the woman as also Christ is Head to the Church, His body, whom He is savior" (Ephes. 5: 23). In the Epistle towards Colossians (Col. 2: 18-19), Saint Apostles Paul urges the Christians not to let themselves deceived by the ones who draw them towards enslaving inferior powers: "instead of belonging powerfully to the Head from Whom each body is being nourished and well composed and it makes his growing up from God", to the Head they receive from, the power of growing up in freedom and union. In other places, the same Saint Paul, without directly naming Christ "Head" of the Church, he said this indirectly through the fact that he calls the Church as "the body of Christ"(Rom. 12: 4-8; I Cor. 6: 15-16, 10-17; 12: 12-27; Ephes. 1: 22-23; 4: 15-16; 5: 23; Col. 18-19). By naming Christ as "Head of the Church", Saint Apostle Paul specifies by this that the body is being fulfilled, it is being nourished in its growing up and harmonization, and it is saved in Christ. (...) In “Christ as Head” it is open the horizon of the infinity of God and, through Him, the Church’s body receives power of life and of unifying love out of this infinity.” (Stăniloae 2006: 88)

“Saint Apostle Paul shows Christ to us as Head of the Church by the fact that through Christ, the Church is being structured as a harmonious whole, within which, each limb accomplishes the work that corresponds to him (Ephes. 4: 15-16; Col. 2: 18-19; Ephes. 2: 21).” (Stăniloae 2006: 89)

“The Holy Fathers developed the teaching that Christ is the Head of the Church, by founding this teaching on the fact that through embodiment He has assumed the first fruit of our human nature; then, this teaching if founded on the fact that Christ has accepted the state of sacrifice and He has overcome the death, being able to communicate us, out of His state of sacrifice, the power to overcome the egotism from within us and to virtually be imparted with His Resurrection, liberating us, even from now, from the limitation of the egotism and of the corruptibility laws, and by placing us in connection with the infinite and free life being in the body of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 89)

“The effort of the human nature in Christ makes our effort within Church possible, and it is exemplary to it. It is the same effort towards liberty in the infinite life of the free relation with God, for getting out from the slavery of the corruption brought by passions. And only by this, Christ can actualize the whole His efficiency as Head of the Church, as Head of ours, Who leads us towards the life of free relation in union with the infinite God.” (Stăniloae 2006: 92)

“Our sacrifice, as renunciation to sins – which are the various forms of the egotism -, it takes the form of the virtues. That’s why the Church is the place the virtues are cultivated in, as openings towards God, in the likeness of Christ Who is the “being of the virtues”, according to Saint Maximos the Confessor.” (Stăniloae 2006: 93)

“The Church is a communion of love bathed in the relations of the infinite Trinitarian love. The Church lives in the threefold subjective ocean of the Trinitarian Persons, in this inexhaustible ocean, of this love and life, or in connection with this infinite ocean, giving us to drink out of it... By being virtually gathered into the Son, on the virtue of the fact that He has embodied, on Himself, for His love for people, we are even more gathered through His sacrifice which gives us power for our own sacrifice, for getting out of the limitation of our egotism, and for entering the endless loving relation with God and with our fellow humans. The ones who sanctify, on themselves, by more and fully sacrificing, on themselves, they are closer, in the Christ's body, to His mind and heart; they are more intimately introduced in the infinity of life and power that moves within His body, carried by one of the hypostases of the infinite Trinitarian life and love. By this, they are also more loved by the Father, and they live in their conscience in a more sensed manner the waves of life and of love of the Father, which are overflowed towards the Son and out of the Son, through the Holy Ghost, within our hearts." (Stăniloae 2006: 93)

"Within Ghost there blows the Ghost of the love between the Father and the Son, the Son bringing and seeding within people the filial love towards the Father and the feeling of the Father's love towards the Son and, through the Son, towards the ones who are united with the Son within the Church's body. The blowing of this love, brought within us by the Ghost, it has created the world and its blowing recreates the world as Church." (Stăniloae 2006: 93)

"The Ghost of the sacrificed Christ is one with the Ghost of the resurrected Christ, and by receiving Christ's Ghost in our present life, we receive, in the same time with the power of self-sacrificing, the earnest of the resurrection too. That's why the Ghost of the sacrificed and resurrected Christ, He brings the ones who appropriate Him, to resurrection. Through the life of sacrifice, upheld by the power of the Ghost of the sacrificed Christ, the believers advance towards their resurrection. Thus, the Church is the "place" where one advances towards resurrection: it is the "laboratory" of the resurrection. The Church has as its main aspect the eschatological aspect. By advancing on the road of the sacrifice, or of the death into Christ, the soul is being filled up with an increasingly greater power upon the body, a power that is going to be manifested in the body's resurrection. This means that the Church's members advance towards their spiritualization and by doing this, they advance on the road towards the resurrection with Christ." (Stăniloae 2006: 95)

"Being within Church - or into Christ - the believers do not remain, through death, forever on earth, but the Church leads them to the eternal life. Dying, they still remain into Christ. For their death neither is full nor definitive, but they remain with their soul for the future life, and there are going to be resurrected with their body, into Christ, given the fact that their souls in the life to come are into the resurrected with the body Christ. That's why the Church's members do not live like ones who have no hope (I Thess. 4: 13), for Christ, as the godlike Hypostasis of the Church, embodied and resurrected, He doesn't carry the Church in Himself in order to let the Church's limbs on earth at the end of their lives; but Christ brings them firstly with their souls, and then with their bodies, to the eternal life, to the communion of the endless Trinitarian life, within which there is Christ Himself as man. Christ, the embodied, crucified, and resurrected Son of God, He is the eternal Hypostasis of the ones who travel into Him – or into Church -, on earth, through faith and through virtues, the road He walked Himself, during His life of earth. And they know they are going to be resurrected, and they even anticipatorily participate in their soul and body, as limb of the Christ's resurrected body, to the resurrection and to the eternal life into Christ. Christ makes Himself transparent to them; He partially gives Himself to them, as the resurrected Christ, just through the Cross they bear during this life, together with Him." (Stăniloae 2006: 95-96)

"This earnest consists in the beginning of the believers' spiritualization, which isn't done without Cross, but neither without the Ghost; In the beginning of accomplishing a transparency through which the believers see the Christ's infinite life, and they are imparted with this life. This comes out of the resurrected, spiritualized, and totally become subject body of the Savior, out of the relation with Christ which has reached a great intensity due to this accentuate manner in which their bodies have been spiritualized and have become subjects. Only for the Church is such a body composed of such limbs on their way to spiritualization, the resurrected Christ deigns to inhabit the Church, or He does this only in order this spiritualization to take place - and the Church is to Him an adequate dwelling place, or a dwelling place on the way to become adequate to Him. This is for only through such a body the presence and the glory of Christ can become transparent." (Stăniloae 2006: 96)

"The Church, and within the Church each limb of it, it is thus the burning pyre, but not-consumed by the inexhaustible fire of the love brought to the people, in the Christ's humanity. This is for the resurrected Christ illuminated out of Church and He sets the Church endlessly in fire, but this fire doesn't consume it, as it does with His nature too. (...) Christ shines with the gentle rays of the love, giving us courage to come close to Him, to enter the relation of love with Him, despite this love being endless – or might be just because of that." (Stăniloae 2006: 96)

"Carried by Christ, the community of the ones who are united with Him, it lives in the warmth of His love and light, in the light of His love for the believers who are into Him, and in the light of their love for Him and for each other. This is a life from on another plan, on the plan of the endless and all-luminous godlike life." (Stăniloae 2006: 96)

"Who denies the objective seen character of the Church and the unseen godlike work within the Church, he denies the Church itself, and he places the salvation in the uncertainty of a pure subjectivity." (Stăniloae 2006: 105-106)

“The Nicaea-Constantinopolitan Symbol of Faith presents the Church as being: One, Holy, Congregational, and Apostolic. These features come from the theandric constitution of the church, as body of the One and Holy Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 106)

“The unity belongs to the Church’s constitution, as extended body of the embodied Word. This is for the Lord has embodied Himself, He was crucified, and He resurrected as man, in order to gather all the divided ones into Himself, in the infinity of His love towards the Father and of the Father towards Him. This unification of everybody in Christ it constitutes the essence of the salvation itself. This is for this salvation means unity in the all-blessed and eternal God. Besides, outside God there is not possible the unity, and therefore neither is the salvation possible. Christ extends Himself with His sacrifice and resurrected body within us, in order to unite us and to make us like Him, by filling us up with the same love of His towards the Father and of the Father towards Him, a love which is within Him. But this is the Church. And the Church, filled up with this love, it means the loving unity amongst its members too.” (Stăniloae 2006: 106-107)

“Therefore, the Church, only for it is one, it represents the place and the effect of the savior work of Christ, or the effective fruition of this work. “For through Himself (He deigned) to reconcile all the things with Himself, either the ones from earth, or the ones from heavens, making peace through Himself, through the blood of His cross” (Col. 1: 20), namely through His unlimited love through which He has wholly given Himself to the Father and to us. “And He has placed all the things under His feet and above all he has given Christ as Head of the Church, which is Christ’s body, the accomplishing of the One Who accomplished all the things into everybody” (Ephes. 1: 22-23). This is for within Church it is fulfilled the desire of Christ to unite all of us with Himself, and it is fulfilled the desire of having in Him the love of the entire mankind towards the Father, of having the rationalities of the entire actualized creation, turned back within Him. Himself wants “all to be one” (Jn. 17: 21), one in love with Him and with the Father, and on in the love for one another. Saint Maximos the Confessor identified the Church to the union of everybody in the embodied Word Who is also at the Father, but Who is also within us, “as dough of the entire kneading”. All of us are called to gather ourselves in Him “as the body’s limbs with the head”, through the architect work of the Ghost of the One Who accomplishes all the things in everybody.” (Stăniloae 2006: 107)

“The one who has Christ in him, he feels himself in the deep and not at the surface of his being, namely in the foundation of his being, but by this he feels himself as being in his being’s common foundation with the others, namely in the godlike Logos. He feels in the Church as being founded on Christ as on “the corner stone”. He feels in Christ as together built up with all the ones who believe in Christ, as in a dwelling place crossed through by Christ, and dwelled by Christ. The one who doesn't feel himself as united with the other into Christ, he too is not in Christ. "Therefore, you are no longer strangers and temporary inhabitants, but you are together citizens with the saints and you are household of God (in full intimacy with God, o. n.), built up on the foundation of the Apostles and of the Prophets, where Christ Himself is the corner stone. Into Him the whole well-made building grows up in order to reach to be a holy dwelling place into the Lord. Into Him you too are together built towards being dwelling place to God into the Ghost" (Ephes. 2: 19-22)." (Stăniloae 2006: 107)

"The Creator and the upholder of the Church he is the Church's founder and helmsman." (Stăniloae 2006: 108)

"The Holy Fathers saw the foundation of the Church's unity in the presence of the same sacrificed and resurrected body, and therefore a body filled up with the infinity of the godlike love, in all the Church's limbs." (Stăniloae 2006: 108)

"For the Christ's body is filled up with Holy Ghost Who irradiates out of Himself as a unifying and life-giver energy of holiness, contrary to the separatist egotism, the second foundation of the Church's unity, according to the Holy Fathers, is the Holy Ghost. Properly-said, the Holy Fathers considered the body of Christ and the Holy Ghost as a not-separated duality, producing and upholding and promoting the Church's unity. The unity between Church and Christ within Church, it is being nourished out of the unity between the Son and the Father: "For all to be one, as You, Father, into Me, and I into You, for they too, to be into Us" (Jn. 17: 24). The Church lives in the ocean of love from amongst the Persons of the Holy Trinity. Like the Three Persons cannot be separated, neither the Church's believer members cannot be separated from one another, in the profoundness of their being." (Stăniloae 2006: 108)

"The Church is the place where Christ brings all the time Himself to the Father, as sacrifice of good fragrance, and through Him He brings us too, by the fact that we are imparted with Him." (Stăniloae 2006: 108)

"The Eucharist isn't the sole Mystery the Church's unity is strengthened and upheld through. Through it the unity amongst the Church's members is being consummated. But the believers cannot approach the Eucharist from the beginning, but they must advance towards it, as on a ladder, through the other Mysteries, namely through Baptism and through Anointment, and if they have fallen into sins, through the Mystery of the Repentance. Through all these Mysteries, the man is gradually united with Christ, the One from Within Church. Through Baptism, the person is received within Church, for he is united, for the first time, with Christ, the One Who died for all of us and Who is like the One Who dies to Himself and overcomes the death within Church, for the Church's members too, to die to themselves, namely to die to their egotism, and to overcome, by doing so, the death as consequence of the weakening of the spirit's life through egotism. "Christ sacrificed Himself for us and He was the Same in death and above death." (I Pt. 3: 18) ... (...) Namely, through Baptism, we enter the union with Christ and through Him with the Father, but we haven't reached yet, the fullness of this union. Although, as ones who entered the dwelling place of God through Christ, we have entered the Church even though we haven't advanced to the most inner places. We have entered, by and large, the House of God, namely the Church." (Stăniloae 2006: 109)

"The Church's holiness stays in close connection with its unity. For, the more the Church is united with Christ and therefore within itself, the more the Church is united with its holy Head, the more the Church is holier in its quality as Christ's body. The sin, of the contrary of the holiness, it is actually a sin against the unity. The holiness of the Church and of the Church's members comes out of union of the Lord's body sanctified through obedience and sacrifice. The holiness of the Church and of its members it is the form their tight union with Christ is shown in – with Christ Who sanctified Himself through His sacrifice for us, He being already without sin on the basis of the hypostatical union." (Stăniloae 2006: 112)

"With the Pentecost it has started a new era in the social life of the mankind. Generally, the Church's members are preoccupied with the forgiveness of their sins, with removing the divisions and the differences amongst people, with increasing the love, and they ascend towards the Kingdom of Heavens." (Stăniloae 2006: 116)

"This various paint of the strivings from within Church it explains why the Church cannot strictly separate the saints from the sinners, and it also explains which the Church do not deprive the sinners of its communion except the ones who contest the Church's teaching - this teaching being the norm itself of the efforts towards holiness. One would never know whether a sinner will leave his idleness and he will commit himself to climbing the ladder, by repenting himself of his sinful life. Anyway, the Church wants to keep available for the sinner the Christ's reserve of power and love from within Church; the Church doesn't want to deprive the sinner of a communion, even being an external communion, and occasion of deepening that external communion in an internal communion." (Stăniloae 2006: 116)

"Here is to discern between Church and its members, though, on the other hand, the Church comprises all of them: the Church is composed out of the ones who transcend and out of what it is being reached by continuous transcending. The Church has, in this case, the meaning of what is reached by transcending. The Church is, in its deep being, the holy spring for its members, having the holy Christ imprinted in it. The Church is the Bethesda well of healing water, that heals the sick ones, but it isn't infected with their microbes, but it dissolves those microbes." (Stăniloae 2006: 117)

"The Slav translators of the Nicaea-Constantinopolitan Creed rendered the Greek term "catoliki" through "sobornuiu" because of their resentment towards the Western Church, but probably also because the meaning of "universal" given by the Rome's Church to the word "catoliki" it doesn't faithfully render the meaning of the original word. The Romanian translation has adopted, for the same reasons, the Slav term, calling the Church as "sobornicească" (Stăniloae 2006: 117)

"The term "catholicity" in the Orthodox Church, it expresses the synodal mode of preserving the church's teaching at Episcopal level, but also the general communitarian mode of practicing the teaching. The whole Church is a permanent Synod, a communion, a convergence, and a permanent co-working of all the Church's members, for only in this state the Church's spiritual goods are preserves and valued. In our time, this general synodality it is rendered through the idea of communion, which implies the idea of complementarity." (Stăniloae 2006: 117)

"The feature of the unity simply affirms that the Church is One, while the feature of the catholicity shows us what the nature of this unity is. It is a unity accomplished and maintained by the convergence, by the communion, and by the unanimous complementarity of the Church's members, but not by simply putting them together or by a merging of all of them in a uniform whole. So, the synodality of the catholicity implies the meaning of the Church as an organic-spiritual whole, and by this it comes closer to the true meaning of the term "Catholic", but without directly expressing it. Namely, the synodality or the catholicity expresses the position and the complementary work of the Church's members, as in a true body, and not the cause of this position and work, as the term "Catholic" does it." (Stăniloae 2006: 118)

"A direct rendering of the term "catholicity" it would be offered by the terms: "entirety" or "plenitude". The Church is an organic whole, an organism, or a spiritual body, a plenitude that has everything, and this whole, this plenitude is present and efficient in each of the Church's: limbs, acts, and parts. This Church's meaning specifies its meaning as "body" of Christ. These meanings correspond to the definition Saint Apostle Paul gave it to the Church as: "the fulfilling (the fullness) of the One Who fulfills everything in everybody" (Ephes. 1: 23)

“The Church has Christ whole, with all His savior and deifier gifts, and each local Church and even each believer has Christ whole, but only by remaining in the “whole” of the body. As in every cell of the body there is the whole body with its work, with its specificity, so is the Church in each of its limbs or part – and through this Christ whole – but only for the respective limb of the respective part remains within Church. The limbs aren’t made uniform by this, but they remain complementary, due to the fact that the entire body’s life, or Christ Himself through the Holy Ghost, He is actively present in all of them.” (Stăniloae 2006: 118)

“The Holy Ghost Who animates the Church’s prayer, He prays within me and so the Church itself prays together with me and in me. It prays together with me not only the Church of the ones who are on earth, but the saints, the angels, and the Mother of the Lord too. “Cherubs with faces of fire, Seraphim with many eyes, Chairs and Masteries, Principalities and Angels and all the Archangels and holy Dominions, together with the blessed Forerunner, with the Prophets and the Apostles, with the pious Hierarchs, with all the righteous ones, all of you, pray for us to be saved! (Canon towards all the saints).” (...) Each believer is accompanied by the unanimity of the Church. No one is by himself, but he is in this unanimity. This is a perfect unanimity of persons, and each person is preserved not-annulled in, receiving power from the entire body and contributing with his specificity to the life of the entire body.” (Stăniloae 2006: 118)

“The Holy Fathers clarified the idea of the Church’s presence in each of its limbs, developing the vision of Saint Apostle Paul about the diverse gifts of the limbs in the Christ’s body, gifts coming from and upheld by the same Ghost. In each believer, though, besides his special gifts, there is the same savior grace, the same dwelling of Christ through the Holy Ghost, but only for the believer is in connection with his parish. In the parish all the grace of the believers and all their gifts develop in solidarity, but only in connection with the bishop and with his eparchy, and this in connection with the whole Church.” (Stăniloae 2006: 118)

“The more intimately Christ is present with the Ghost within Church, the more real becomes this efficacy of the entire Church in all its limbs, and the more is capable of giving the possibility of spiritual growth to the limbs as persons, differentiated, out of the endless unitary richness of Christ, which is spiritually communicated by the Ghost within the differentiated and unitary body of the Church; so, the Church doesn’t make its members uniform as in the case of a unity sustained by an external authority, a non-synodal authority lacking the character of a body.” (Stăniloae 2006: 119)

“The Church’s wholeness understood like this, it has God Himself, or Christ, as its foundation and as its source Who dwells within Church and Who works within Church, through the Holy Ghost, as the feature of the unity and of the holiness. The Church's wholeness stays in tight connection with the feature of the unity, not being but the specification of the unity's mode. But, also with the feature of the holiness. This is for if the holiness consists in a self-renunciation of the believer humanity for God and of each believer for God and for his fellow humans, the holiness is a premise for the complementarity that makes the believers a body of Christ with many limbs." (Stăniloae 2006: 119-120)

"The Wholeness or the plenitude of Christ within Church through the Holy Ghost, it has also a dynamic and differentiated character, as the holiness and the unity have too. Some of the Church's members live in higher degrees the wholeness or the plenitude of Christ within them, and their integration in the Church's plenitude. And the Church in totality, it advances towards a fullness of integrally experiencing God within it, and of Church's total integration in God, towards the state God will be "everything in all things" in (I Cor. 15: 28). Properly-said, this is the Church's destination. This integration in plenitude must become characteristic to the whole creation." (Stăniloae 2006: 120)

"The Church is the wholeness, it is whole, and it is the plenitude for it has Christ Who is everything in all things. The Church is the plenitude, for now in some virtual state, but in movement towards its full actualizing in eschatology. That's why the Church has the entire savior grace which leads the creation to deification; the Church has the whole teaching, which includes in it the whole knowledge necessary for salvation. The Orthodox Church is the Church of the plenitude (...) The Orthodox Church has the entire capability towards the right fructifying, towards the believers' consummation." (Stăniloae 2006: 120)

"Like through all the other three features, one can see Christ as the ultimate foundation and source of the Church, so it is seen also through apostolicity. The Apostles were the first group of people who believed in Christ, and they bore witness about His Resurrection and therefore about His godhead. The same Apostles were that group of people by which Christ has made Himself known - to all the generations which followed and which will follow - as He was: embodied God, crucified and resurrected for our salvation and deification. The Apostles confessed about Him, and they didn't speak about themselves. They didn't take from themselves this ministration, but Christ gave it to them. On their faith, on their witness, on their speaking about Christ, on their being's total consecration to the work of making know and communicating Christ, it has been founded and it is being prolonged the Church." (Stăniloae 2006: 121)

“The Church is apostolic in all the times, for it has the same faith as the Apostles had, and for the Church stays on the content and on the form that Christ has given to it. Although, the successive generations of the believers they didn’t inherit also the quality as Apostles, because they didn’t inherit the Apostles’ position too, as being the first ones in the faith in Christ and the first interpreters of His teaching and deeds.” (Stăniloae 2006: 123)

“In this quality of witnesses and of initial interpreters of Christ’s Revelation – which implies the fact that they stayed next to Jesus for three years, and that they saw Him resurrected and that they received His Ghost in an unmediated manner -, it is included also their quality as organs of finalizing the Revelation in Christ and of completing this Revelation.” (Stăniloae 2006: 123)

“Thus, the Church is apostolic through by inheriting the faith, the teaching, and the grace from Apostles, as the first ones who received them from Christ through the Holy Ghost. The Church’s apostolicity unites the history with the present. In conveying the Christ’s grace and teaching, each generation contributes through its faith. In conveying them, each generation, spiritualized through the mediation of the previous one, it contributes to spiritualizing the blood of the successor generation.” (Stăniloae 2006: 124)

“Apostolicity means connecting the generations in the whole tradition that comes from Apostles, for it is the whole Revelation, but also in the grace and in the spirituality which come in an uninterrupted manner from the Christ’s Ghost through them. But this doesn’t mean that the Church looks only at the past, that Christ belongs to the history, and that the Apostles interpose themselves between Christ and us, or that the grace comes only from the past. We enter a connection with the living Christ now too. The Ghost of Christ or His grace is being descending now too, from above, at every baptism, in a continuous Pentecost.” (Stăniloae 2006: 124)

“Advancing towards an increasingly fuller likeness to Christ, it cannot be done except within Church, for through the Church one can see “the diverse wisdom of God, according to His decision from ever, which he has unveiled it in Christ Jesus, our Lord” (Ephes. 3: 10-11). And this is for within Church it is being actualized - in the multitudes of the teachings, of the prayers, and of the Church’s members – the multitude of powers, of works, and of forms of the love of God, and each one learns and is urged out of this multiplicity.” (Stăniloae 2006: 143)

“All the things can be seen within Church in a non-static manner and not in an exterior mimicking, but Christ Himself continuously relives all of them within the Church, by imprinting Himself in the Church and in the Church’s believers like in the limbs of His body, and imprinting them, by this, the mode of relieving the states which He has elevated His assumed human nature through. The Church is the human communitarian environment within which Christ relives, together with this environment, His savior action, the environment within which each limb of His is on other stage of his ascension, but in the same Christ, Who has descended on each one's level. Being One and the Same, Christ keeps them all in unity and communion, but each one lives Him on another height, even though all the stages are expressed in the same word of the teaching, in the same sanctifying acts, in the same good deeds, and in the same prayers. Each one takes power for his ascension from all the others, some of them receiving knowledge from their superiors, others exercising themselves in the communion in ministration and humbleness. This is for no one reckons himself as reached at the target and he reckons the difference of levels as insignificant in comparison to the infinite height of the target." (Stăniloae 2006: 144)

"All these show from which depths of wisdom it was produced the Descent of Son of God within history, in order to work, from it and through it, to the mankind salvation in its solidarity, for He wasn't satisfied with working from the sky, not incarnated, upon each human being taken individually. God does not want the individualism of the monads, in a Protestant sense, but he wants historical solidarity. Otherwise, the history would not have any meaning. It would be completely devalued. The Church, also, it would have been impossible, if there hadn't existed except a personal report between the individual and God. What sense will make in this case, even the sparks lightened by God in each soul individually, if they have no effect upon the historical life of the human being, except of showing him the impossibility of any effect? The human being would be imparted with this Revelation only in the future life, when it takes place - into a Protestant conception - the actual salvation." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The Church established by God, the one close to the people, it is the kingdom of the divine grace, which the man is elevated in to the communication with God and, by this, he is destined to an eternal and happy life. Any man elevated into the frame of this history, he was saved from the inutility of a life ended into death, like one lived only on the plan of the physical and social legality. The embodied Son of God, and ascended on the right hand of the Father, He leads this elevation of the people onto the plan of the Church, of the salvation through communion with Him. This is the true goal of the history. And this work of Jesus it is the proper leading of the world. At this one participates our humanity assumed by the Son of God, and we are all of us participating to it through our liberty and through the power of Jesus Christ from within us. For the efficacy of this work, it has been instituted the new method at the rudder of the world, on the godlike throne." (Stăniloae 1993)

“So, the Church is the goal of the history. The absorption one after another of the people into history, in order to pass them into the eternity of the happy communion, it is the goal of the entire earthly life. This does not mean that the state is not necessary. But it is necessary like a precondition for the Church. The Church won’t ever deny the legitimacy of the State and won’t fight against the State as such, but the Church will try to make each citizen a member of it of such a behavior and spiritual ascent, so that to fulfill like an internal commandment, minimal for him, everything the state legislates for the good cohabitation of the citizens. In this way, in a certain sense, the Church is necessary to the State and it raises up the best citizens of the State. Of course, neither the State must forget about its role to be a precondition for the salvation of the people, so not to impede them to search their salvation through the faith in God and not to hinder the church in its savior work.

The Church won’t ever say a word against the State, in principle. But it will try to raise any man at such a condition, that to him the State to be somehow surpassed, so that he to fulfill without being forced by the State, like a minimum, everything the State can ask him.

When all the people reach this condition, becoming the consummate members of the Church, totally purified of sin and with a full capacity of communion with God and amongst themselves, the State would disappear by itself, not by being abolished through propaganda or external combat, but by being absorbed with its being, which is the equitable order, into the being of the Church.

But on earth won’t never be reached such a state. Even if all the people became Christians, themselves the Christians, like earthly people, they would traverse diverse phases of life, which prove their imperfection. We all need the State, even if we are into Church. Both this order of life helps us; the State helps us by force, the Church by divine grace, in order to maintain ourselves and to progress towards perfection.

In the light of the goal represented into history by the Church, we can understand the history only if we watch at it not only like an area into which every generation can gain its salvation, but also like a whole which realizes like such a certain sense. The question: why the history continues and until when? - it can be answered now by saying something else than God hadn’t finish bringing all the faces to existence, and the history would have ended when God had finished pouring into world all the people whom He decided to create.”
(Stăniloae 1993)

“In the service of the spiritual progress of the believers there stays the hierarchy of persons, for only the persons are capable, out of love, of helping other persons. That’s why the hierarchy is essential to the Church (the heavenly hierarchy somehow belongs to the Church too, and it upholds the ascendant movement of the churchly hierarchy). The man’s ascension it takes place by the help and in the frame of the Church. The ultimate target of the entire hierarchy is the deification of the ones who are saved.” (Stăniloae 1992: 45)

“The spiritual ascension, even if leads someone to the immediate closeness to God in heavens, it is an ascension within Church, on the spiritual levels from within the Church on earth, and on the levels from within the Church from heavens. There is no other ladder towards God, than through the interior of the Church! This is for along this ladder there is stretched full of attraction the grace of Christ, the power of Christ: namely of the “Way”. And for in the highest end of this ladder and only there, as top of the entire hierarchy, there is Christ.” (Stăniloae 1992: 48-49)

“The churchly character of the spiritual life it is identified to the Church’s Christ-centric character. Even the one who has been elevated to the state of “pure mind” and of “contemplation without symbols, he still hasn’t left the hierarchical frame of the Church in broad sense, and he hasn’t jumped beyond Jesus. This is for Jesus is the all-divine and above existence mind. Christ stays on the top of any hierarchy as an attraction force, for anyone who ascends its levels.” (Stăniloae 1992: 49)

“The hierarchical levels do not replace Christ, but because of us not being able to see Him from the beginning and to understand Him in an unveiled manner, without the mediation of the symbols and without the explanation we are given by the hierarchical levels, He takes in account this weakness of ours and he communicates Himself, to us, through the hierarchical levels. But, on the measure we progress with the help of the angelic hierarchy and of the angels, we too see God and we feel God increasingly clearer, and we get increasingly closer to His unveiled light, namely we are being deified.” (Stăniloae 1992: 49)

“It is important to mention that the happy Kingdom of the eternity of the communion with God in Trinity, into Christ, it depends also on our will of appropriating this life of communion amongst ourselves too, following the example of Christ Who went to the sacrifice on the cross for us. We could say that this constitutes a fourth dogma, commanded by Christ, a dogma requesting the people to appropriate freely the good that has been brought by Christ, a good which we see fulfilled from ever, into the Holy Trinity. Christ asked us for our contribution by telling us: “Love on one another, as I loved you” (Jn. 13: 14). Only by observing this word of His, he and His Father will come to us and They will make within us a dwelling place for Themselves (Jn. 14: 23). And this love of ours, amongst ourselves, it is the Church. Within Church all of us must be one with Christ and amongst ourselves, as the Son is one with the Father and with the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 170)

“The Church is the union of the ones who believe in The One and True Christ.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 213)

“The Church is the spiritual kingdom, One, Holy, Apostolic, and Universal, where Emperor Christ is always present with His power, warming up and enlightening the Church’s members as on a pyre and as on a candlestick composed by the united believers, without confounding them, as some branches or as some candles of the same fire or of the same light of the love of Christ and for Christ.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 216-217)

“The burning pyre seen by Moses it represents the Mother of the Lord and any saint full with the fire of the love for Christ. But the all-comprising pyre it is the Church which the fire of the love unites within, with Christ, through love, not only singular persons, but also together all the persons who believe in Christ.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 216-217)

“From the state of simple existence which are brought to, by being born out of our parents, the children must enter the fully free existence reborn in Christ, or the dialogue with God, through a birth which they actively and personally decide for, masters on themselves, and free servants of Christ. This doesn’t mean that the children born out of Christian parents, they cannot be baptized when being little children, for the tight union of their souls with the mature Christians’ souls gives the warranty that they will impropriate by their own decision the birth out of the Holy Ghost of the freedom, through Baptism, or that they will actualize the dialogue with God, which they virtually entered through Baptism. By and large, all the ones who receive Christ in Baptism, they can be imparted with His body and with His blood, which are free of any egotism’s slavery, by this getting closer to the Virgin, though not as ones giving Him birth according to the body. By this, the constitute the mysterious body of Christ, namely the Church.” (Stăniloae 1995: 175)

“Due to the fact that all the Church’s members bring this sacrifice out of Christ’s power, or in the community of all of them with God, or due to the fact that the Church itself does that, the Church lives in the relations of the infinite love of the Trinitarian Persons. The Church has Christ as Head – through Whom the Church is brought to and it advances into that life; the Church has the Holy Ghost as animator soul; and the Church brings, on itself, sacrifice to the Father, in a transcending towards this ultimate source, source of the endless life and love, as Person, of Church’s existence, for the Father is source of the other two godlike Persons and He is source of the will of creating and saving the world.” (Stăniloae 2006: 93)

“If the Orthodox spirituality has a Christ-centric character and if this Christ-centrism is accentuated by the Mysteries’ role of means which Christ dwells Himself within man through, namely as sources of indispensable power for the ascetic efforts and in order to live the mysterious union with Christ, there will follow that the Orthodox spirituality has a pneumatological-churchly character. This is for where Christ is through Mysteries, there the Church is full of the Ghost of the communion with Christ, of the Church imparts Christ, as being His Body, through the mediation of the Mysteries. One cannot become or remain limb of Christ except he integrates himself and he becomes part of His mysterious Body – which is the Church – as a well-ordered ensemble of many limbs. The faith, as power of the spiritual growth, it come within man from Christ, but through Church, of through His body, which is full of the communion Ghost, by growing up from the faith of the churchly assembly, in which Christ is working through His Ghost. Through baptism, the man enters the bond with Christ, but he also enters the atmosphere of faith which animates as a divine power the churchly assembly. If not continuously animated and urged by the faith from the churchly assembly, nobody will be able to remain in faith and to grow up in faith and in faith’s fruits. If somebody progresses in the virtues which grow up out of faith and which culminate in love, it means that he manifests his working love towards his fellow humans and that he strives for increasing the same faith in them; it means that he increases in the communion with all of them, in Christ, through the Ghost. But this is the same with working to strengthening the Church, out of a responsibility for the Church.” (Stăniloae 1992: 44-45)

Commandments

“By analyzing our faith, we find that it comprises elements for which the prophetic origin is not sufficient. The faith of the prophets it consisted only in the certitude about God`s existence and of some commandments which He communicated to people, through prophets. The prophets confessed about a God who remains at distance from people, making His will be known through intermediaries and setting the law like a sign of a link with them, from distance. The prophets knew themselves like intermediaries of the law, they asked for the fulfillment of the law, and they put the man in report with God through the law - namely they sustained a report which, in the same time, it is a distance.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The prophets gave the man the faith, as certitude about the existence of God, and they communicated the will of God. The man had felt God being interested in his destiny also for He sent His commandments. But the fact that God sent His commandments, but He didn’t give any power to fulfill them, it showed the man the distance which God kept from him. The prophet, by the fact that he was a man who spoke about God like about something different from him, and by the fact that the prophet was simply transmitting the commandments of God, without being able to help the man to fulfill these commandments, he contributed, also, to the confirmation of the conscience that God it is faraway. God appeared to the man like One Who, by keeping Himself at distance, He sends His commandments, saying to him: you fulfill them. The man felt himself alone and left to his own powers, which were insufficient to the pretensions of God. Even if he could fulfill the commandments, he still wouldn’t have had God closer. In reality, he can fulfill certain commandments of civilian nature, juridical and moral, but the main commandment, namely to enter the communion with God and, by this, with his fellow humans, he couldn’t fulfill it without the descent of God to him. The laws which the man can fulfill are the crumbs, the external shells, the surrogates of the big law of the communion. Through them it is sketched the necessity of the communion, it is expressed the desire for it, but it is not realized. A man asks to the other one, when he is not in communion with him, to fulfill some deeds like they would be in communion, but himself cannot achieve that until descends himself to that man. All the more it cannot be realized the communion with God until He does not descend to the man. The communion is accomplished through the descent of the one who is superior in spirit, in loving power, in understanding, to the inferior one, and not through the ascent of the inferior to the superior one. By the fact that the superior one still gives some commandments to the inferior one, like a surrogate of the communion, like an insufficient substitution of it, that one shows that he does not want to break any connection with the man, but he aims to reestablish it. Those commandments are another grace, they are a benevolence. The law deficiently kept the place of the communion, until its accomplishment. The Law was the shadow, it was the foreshadowing of what was to come. The law created a waiting regime, a tension towards completeness, and it was in the same time a promise. The father will be severe with his child after the child has made serious mistakes. So severe, that it will seem to the child that his father treats him like a servant. This report has something from the severity of the report master-servant. The communion from before is no longer there. But the present severity is provisionally, the child feels it like a passing stage towards the new filial communion and, therefore, he endures it waiting for that one⁹⁶. Through the Law, God didn't let the man to totally decay, forsaken in the bondage of Egypt, but He carried the man through the hardships of the desert towards the promised communion of Canaan. By giving the law, God made a Covenant with the people from before Christ, the Covenant of the Promise. The ones from under the Law walked into the hope of the things from the future. The commandments are the exterior faces of the real communion - the future one. (Stăniloae 1993)

"The man needs for his salvation that God to come as close as possible to him, not to only be sending commandments which he cannot fulfill, but to enter the communion with him, and the Holy Trinity wants to reestablish the communion with the people and among people, a mission which especially falls to the Son due to the place He has into the Holy Trinity like a hypostatic intentionality for communion, and carried by the joy of obligation, of the serving, first towards the Father and, therefore - in order to please the Father - towards people, for bringing them again in the state of His sons." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The moral conscience, in all its functions - like a commandment to do the good and to avoid the evil, like thank for the first one and like a reprimand for the second one -, the imagination about the chaos which would have been born if these moral differences had been blunted into the reports amongst people, it shows us that the moral order is upheld by this fundamental law of the reward of the good through good and of the evil through evil. This law is the one who distinguishes the good from the bad. The moral order stays, after all, in this distinction and in its supreme seriousness. The blunting of this distinction it would cause the same collapse into the spiritual sphere of the life, that the one which would be caused by shutting off the gravitation in the physical sphere. All the people tend towards this blunting. There must be somebody who to have the power ⁹⁶ Through Jesus Christ, God unveils again His parental face towards people. The man becomes again the son of God; the man, who was deprived of his good Father, he is now again the son of God, and God is again his Father, said Saint Gregory of Nyssa, P. G. 45, 889 A-H, Cf. J. Aufhauser, W. c. p. 116.

and the will to reestablish the distinction, namely the prestige of the good in front of the evil.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“In the light of the Orthodox spirituality, the Christian morals no longer appears as a simple fulfilling of some duties imposed by God’s commandments, duties bringing the Christian nowhere in this life, but it only provides him with the salvation as external rewards in the future life. The Christian grows up in God still from this life, for the fulfilling of these commandments performs a gradual transformation of his being, of a filling up of his, increasingly more, with the working presence of God.” (Stăniloae 1992: 5)

“The Lord is hidden in His commandments and in the striving for achieving the virtues, not only as norm, or as role-model divided in principles of behavior, but He is also as personal power working in them, for only a superior person gives commandments. The commandments, anyway, they have an attraction too, and who puts them at his heart he feels Christ’s helping look always directed upon him, for the Lord not only that he has given us commandments once and for all, but He gives us these commandments on each instant. So, in the individual endeavor to fulfill the commandments there is the help from Christ too.” (Stăniloae 1992: 41)

“If through the commandments the Lord offers Himself to us, so-saying from outside us, hidden but present in these analytical features of His image, in the virtues which show our bond to the commandments and the progress in this living synthesis between us and commandments, the Lord manifests Himself within us too. In commandments, considered in themselves, the Lord hides Himself as personal and attractive power; in the endeavor of working through virtues, the Lord is hidden as personal active power. This is for the Lord is hidden since baptism in the inner sanctuary of our being, urging us towards fulfilling the commandments, by what we imprint on our spiritual cheek as Lord’s features. Thus, these features gradually clarify under the impulse of His commanding force that works from inside out, and which is not but Jesus Christ Himself, the One dwelling in our deep, and Who is not obviously notice in the beginning. The presence of Christ it becomes to us increasingly obvious inside us, by manifesting increasingly luminous also in our external behavior, in our virtues.” (Stăniloae 1992: 41-42)

“If in the beginning Christ is, to say so, buried in commandments and within us, on the measure we attach ourselves to commandments, with His power that is inside us, achieving out of this collaboration the virtues as living features, which mirror the Lord's image, Christ raises Himself increasingly luminous from under these veils. That's why Origen and Saint Maximos the Confessor considered the road of the pious Christian, from working the commandments to knowledge, as a mysterious road of the Lord within us, from His descending on earth in a humble countenance as servant, until His ascent of the Tabor Mountain, where the godhead showed Himself in all His glory. The ascension from the ascetic efforts to the mysterious contemplation of Christ, we are undertaking it through Christ, towards Christ. During this ascension we aren't alone even for a moment, or going out of this "Way" and tending towards another target. Christ's life on earth is thus a permanent actuality, being repeated with each of us, like a teacher, he crosses, with each growing up child, all the phases of his teaching. Each of us is contemporary to Christ with the whole our life, or better said, He makes Himself contemporary to each of us, and even more than contemporary, namely partaker to the entire trajectory of our life, by imprinting Himself within each of us." (Stăniloae 1992: 41-42)

"Christ showed His supreme authority by giving us commandments, but these are commandments of love, a love firstly manifested by Him like nobody else could. He commands us to love one another as He loves us. And by this, he asks us to understand one another and to grant to one another the highest cherishing, as Himself understands us and as Himself grants us this cherishing. But the love makes us, in the same time, free from ourselves and from all the things, and it requires the freedom as love's condition." (Stăniloae 1995: 185)

"Christ asks us to be humble and to be gentle, but he also gives us the power for that, through His example. He asks us to take up His yoke, but this is the yoke of His humbleness and of His gentleness, upheld by our freedom, that is strengthened by Him. And to an accentuated conscience, there is not yoke to spring out more responsibility than the yoke of the free humbleness and gentleness. He doesn't ask us to be and to do, except what He is and what He does. There is no stronger commandment than that one fulfilled by the One Who gives it. He asks us to liberate ourselves from our passions, which we are our own slaves through, and which we enslave other through, but He does this through the example of His freedom's strength, affirmed through His patience and restraint. And by this He gives us the power to liberate ourselves too, and it is removed from any justification of not doing that. Thus, it is manifested the authority of the One Who wants us too, to participate to His power and freedom through love and humbleness. In Him is accomplished the interweaving of the most extreme contrasts: of the godhead with the creation, or with the man consisting of body and soul, who is so weak. Christ has taken an image submitted to the acts of the exterior enemies, in order to feel the pains of His brothers and to be crucified for His brothers. But He unites with this state of theirs as voluntary object, His absolutely free feeling as Subject, accepting to bring on Himself as sacrifice and to endure the pains and the death, in order to defeat them, by giving us too, this power.” (Stăniloae 1995: 185-186)

Communication of Features between the Two Natures of Christ

“The union of the two natures in Christ, it doesn’t mean either confusion between the divine nature and the human nature, nor is the human nature united with the divine nature of each divine Person. If that had been the case, it wouldn’t have been given the man the possibility to be, as man, in communion with God as Son of God, as it is because the Son of God has become the Son of man; each divine Person would have been in the same time also a human person.” (Stăniloae 2003: 83)

“Christ’s hypostasis is the basis for maximal union of two different natures, like the human nature is the common bridge for union amongst persons of the same nature.” (Stăniloae 2003: 83-84)

“The union of the human nature with the divine nature in a hypostasis, it is the maximal form of the union of the two natures. In a way, we can say that all of us are united, through our nature, in the Hypostasis of the Word. For this maximum union, God has made His Son a man, as His Son rests as God in the loving bosom of the Father (Jn. 1: 18), to rest also like man in the Father and, to be all the people gathered in the communion with the Son, resting, together with the Son, in the Father.” (Stăniloae 2003: 85)

“(…) it must be mentioned that this dogma (of the two natures in Christ, o. n.), it affirms the obvious fact that, by participating to the divine infinite existence, the man is ensured as own existence, not only towards nothing, but also towards God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 96)

“The hypostatic union of the two natures in Christ (...) it is the eternal fortifying of the relative (of the created) through absolute.” (Stăniloae 2003: 107)

“He (Christ, t. n.) no longer dialogue with the human person as a partner from on another plan; His reality as Person no longer remains a mysterious fact from on another plan, noticed through an exceptional experience only by some of the human persons, on the basis of a special Revelation. Now the divine Person of the Son of God or of the Word enters the plan of the common experience of the ones who believe in Him, as a person from amongst the human persons, who, in the same time, though, gives the human persons the possibility of noticing Him as godlike Person. Before the Embodiment, the two natures were “separated”, says Nicholas Kabasilas “for God was only Him, and the human nature was only itself”. (Stăniloae 2006: 17)

“The person is a unitary “who”, who is and who knows on himself the subject of a nature or of a complex background of features, out of which he always pulls out always new acts, and in which he endures and received the acts of the other personal and impersonal factors. The unitary “who” of the person, he reconciles himself with the complexity of this background of features he manifests it in own acts and in which he receives foreign acts. Seen like unity, the complexity is person. Seen like a complexity of features, the person is nature. But this complexity of features cannot be seen as standing by itself. This complexity of features it subsists in a unitary “who” or as a unitary “who”. If the nature cannot really exist except in or as “somebody”, in or as a person, the supreme reality will have at its turn a personal character too. Only in it can be the nature contemplated. Therefore, the reality is hypostatical, is a person, or it subsists in a person. The unity of this “who”, which is simultaneous to his complexity, it is expressed, regarding Christ, by Leontius from Byzantium, by considering, on one hand, as hypostasis of the human nature, the same God-the Word Who is also the eternal hypostasis of His godlike nature; on the other hand, by calling Him as composed, as One Who unites in Himself the two natures. It is to be mentioned that the hypostasis mustn’t be understood as a basis differing from natures, but a mode of concrete existence which, by unifying the natures, he penetrates them in all their aspects through the hypostatic character.” (Stăniloae 2006: 17-18)

“The union of the natures, according to hypostasis, it has been done by the Son of God, as Person of the human nature, but without annulling this human nature. This hasn’t meant that after the union it hasn’t been accomplished also a union more than through the relation with the other people. By the fact He has made Himself man, the Son of God has entered a union according to the human being, with the other people; and this has meant a fuller relation with the other people, than the relation was before the Embodiment. In the frame of a union according to the being, through the human nature, it has taken place a direct relation by work or by grace. The New Adam has brought in the frame of the humanity – which He belongs by His human nature to – another efficiency of His godhead, which is characteristic to Him as Person.” (Stăniloae 2006: 21)

“Only the human spirit is window, of door, through which the nature enters the plan of the godlike infinity and of the godlike liberty. Only through man, as person, the supreme reality as Person can descend in the order of the created nature, in order to fully integrate the created nature to the human person and, by doing that, to fully integrate the created nature to the godhead as Person. That’s why, the whole seen creation, unified in the embodied Word, it is concentrated, actually, in two natures: in Christ’s godlike nature and in His human nature. These are the two parts of the embodied Hypostasis Who comprises all the other things and gives them their godlike and human qualification, not-separated and unmixed. Christ sees all the things and He makes them – in godlike and human mode in the same time – in a united but not-confounded mode. And the human nature’s parts constitute an organic unity, so that the divine Hypostasis cannot see, He cannot feel, He cannot think and He cannot work as Man, only through a part of his humanity, separated from His entire humanity. That's why one must speak about a human nature in Christ, different from His godlike nature, and not to speak about a sole composed divine-human nature, as the Pre-Chalcedonians did, neither to speak about several parts and natures of His, like those ones deduced that one should speak about in case one spoke about the two natures. (...) Nothing can live like human being, only through a part of the human nature, but everything is being lived through the entire human nature." (Stăniloae 2006: 22)

"We have spoken before about the conciliation of the complexity of the Hypostasis's content and of His consummate unity; also, we have spoken about the fulfillment of the nature and of the human persons by the fact that the Logos has become the direct hypostasis of the human nature and the ultimate hypostasis of the human persons. Both these ones have their corollary in the fact that the two natures are united in Him undividedly, not-separately, not-changed, and unmixed. Amongst these adverbs and attributes, the adverb "undividedly" directly refers to the Person of Christ, but it refers the natures in His Person. This adverb wants to tell us that the one Hypostases of Christ, the Same born from the Father before the ages, and out of Virgin Mary in time, He is not divided because of having two natures, but He remains undivided, despite the fact that the remained intact natures, they are not confounded and they aren't being changed in their definition, and therefore no one of the natures ceases to be what it is, in Him. The other adverb and the two attributes directly refer to the natures, but they are justified by the unity of the Person. The natures are not-separated not in the sense of a simple external connection, but in the sense of interpenetration for eternity, due to the Hypostasis's unity. But, in the same time, the interpenetration and the imprinting of one by another, they do not change their essence, and they don't confound them." (Stăniloae 2006: 23)

"The not-confounded unity in the One Hypostasis it is so consummate, that the two natures cannot be separated, and not even really discerned, except by cogitation. But this doesn't mean, at all, that the two natures cease to exist in the One Christ: they persist in an unchanged mode. Being discerned only by cogitation it removes the Nestorian heresy concerning Christ; their persistency removes the Monophysitism. Thus, being discerned only by cogitation, it implies also the not-separation and the not-changing of the natures. As such, being them discerned only by cogitation it implies the deification of the human nature and the not-changing of the natures." (Stăniloae 2006: 23)

“For Christ, God-the Word, He is the Hypostasis of both natures, and for in this unique Hypostasis really subsist and are activate the features and the powers of both natures, through This Hypostasis it is being established a real communication between the features and the works of these two natures. Due to the common Hypostasis, are therefore maintained both the essential not-modifying of the two natures and their real communication, through which their separation is being avoided. If this communication hadn’t taken place, the Hypostasis would have manifested Himself sometimes as purely godlike, and sometimes as purely human. Through the human words wouldn’t have spoken God-the Word; in the human deeds and sufferings nothing godlike would have been manifested, and in the wonders of Christ His humanity wouldn’t have had except the role of an external and passive organ. The people wouldn’t have met God-the Word Himself through the human means accessible to them. The direct dialogue between God-the Word and the people it wouldn’t have been done and it would have been taking place in continuation. God wouldn’t have humanized on Himself. God wouldn’t have descended and He wouldn’t have been really descending to us. The order of the persons from on the two plans wouldn’t have been united in order to comprise everything. In transcendent it would have remained the order of the Trinitarian Persons, and on earth it would have remained the order of the human persons.” (Stăniloae 2006: 26)

“The Person of Christ Who belongs to both natures, He irradiated, through the works done with the human nature, the godlike love, and also through His Person He imprinted His human nature in the deeds He did with His godlike nature. That’s why we can attribute to this Person human works, while we regard Him as God, for these deeds do not belong to God as separated from humanity and His Person isn’t only the subject of the godlike acts; and while we regard the Same Person as man and we can call Him man, we can attribute to Him the godlike works, for these works do not belong only to the subject of the human acts. We must proceed alike with the attributes too.” (Stăniloae 2006: 26)

“Through the common Person, each nature really participates, by giving and by receiving; likewise, the other nature does too. But by Person we mean the basis of the oikonomia, which is the work of the will, and not the basis of the necessity. Through Person a nature communicates to another its works (energies), but they aren’t identified to one another. But they do not communicate their works as from person to person, but within the same Person – and therefore, on a degree the condition of the not-confounding allows it. This is for, in a person and through the one subject, to any act, everything in that person contributes to.” (Stăniloae 2006: 26)

“Everywhere, the factor producing the descent of God and the elevation of the human nature, it is the Person of God-the Word, with the accord of the human nature that has become Person in Him, or of the human nature existing in His Person.” (Stăniloae 2006: 26)

“In short, the communication of the features means not only the nominally attributing of the human features and works to Christ as God, and of the godlike features and works to Christ as man, by the fact that he is the One and the Same Subject of both kinds of features and works, but the real imprinting of the human features and works by the godlike ones, and vice versa, through Him as Subject they are activated unitarily, without confounding, both ones and others.” (Stăniloae 2006: 28)

“The communication of the features highlights even more the Mystery of the Embodiment, or the wonderful fact that the Son of God as Person of the human nature, He unites with Himself and through Himself His godlike nature with His human nature.” (Stăniloae 2006: 28)

“The Son of God overwhelms His human nature with the powers and with the divine gifts of His godlike nature, not in order to abolish it, but in order to consummate it.”

“Like our body, due to the soul penetrating it, it is not only a material composition, and it cannot be separated from the soul, likewise is in the case of the human nature hypostatized in God-the Word. Through this, the Son of God opens the road towards our consummation, through the connection with Him. Thus, He starts His salvation work through what He does with His human nature itself. He hasn’t assumed the unity only in order to be our juridical representative, in order to pay or to suffer instead of us, for the offense brought to God, as the Occidental theology affirms.” (Stăniloae 2006: 28)

“It is obvious that in Christ, a unique Person, the communication through energies differs from the communication through energies between two persons bearer of different natures (between God and man), or of a common nature (between man and man). In the case of Christ it is about a reciprocal communication of the energies of the two differing natures which are united in a sole Person; in any work done or endured by the Person through a nature, it is being felt also the frame of the other nature the Persons represents it, like even in the pointing up of a finger, or in the feeling that a finger hurts, it participates, in some extent, the whole man’s nature, body and soul, each of them by bringing its corresponding contribution, and by making whole the movement or the suffering of another and by shaping it up, but without abolishing the other one’s rationality. It is here about communication of the natures which inhabit together in a unique person; it is a kind of their interpretation that has as consequence the communication of the powers from one to another.” (Stăniloae 2006: 40)

“There does not exist Jesus in Himself like man, who then to receive later the attribute of a revelator too, but this Jesus is God Himself like a subject of the Revelation and like an object of it too⁹⁷.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The man sees, inwardly, his own self, like being above time, though unfolds his contents in time. Jesus too, He was seeing, inwardly, increasingly clear, His godlike self; and not through a conscience parallel to the human one, but just through this. “The human hypostasis of Jesus, the «son of the carpenter», by having earthly relatives, He is the hypostasis of the Logos and these are: the mystery and the depth which gradually and ceaselessly are unveiled into His human conscience, together with the growth of his human conscience, like His godlike conscience and His filiation. But this seeing of the mystery of His godlike filiation, this conscience of God, it doesn’t suppress into Christ His temporarily and human conscience through which and into which it illuminates in time, like an inwardly sun which lights the window of the empiric conscience”.

“The self-conscience of the God-the Word’s hypostasis, by raising up out of the preconscious state and by gradually developing and specifying Himself, He differs, surely, and essentially, from the conscience of the common man. Though, after the type of the development, the divine-human hypostasis does not differ by the human one and the God-the Man is truly a man. In reality, also the human hypostatic ghost is partaker to eternity and sees Himself not into the form of becoming, but like supra-temporal existence... In the same way, also the human person of Jesus Christ Has the conscience of His hypostatic godhead, of His hypostasis not separated from the Father and from the Holy Ghost, but this conscience He gains it not only through timeless sight, but also as human, discursively... This conscience through which He knows Himself like Logos through the human point of view and through the human life, not outside of it or above it, it is not only a human conscience or only a godlike conscience, but it is a divine-human one. In brief, Jesus Christ it is God-the Man not only in the meaning that in Him are united, into one, the hypostasis of two natures, godlike and human, but also this hypostasis himself is, after such a union, a divine-human one: the union of the two natures permeates to His own core” (p. 261-2).” (Stăniloae 1993)

⁹⁷ KARL BARTH, Die kirchliche Dogmatik, I. Band: Die Lehre vom Wort Goettles, I. Halbbad, München, 1932, p. 433: „Es gibt keinen Jesus an sich, der dann vielleicht auch das Prädikat eines Trägers jener Offenbarung... bekommen konnte“.

“The synods IV from Chalcedon and VI from Constantinople, they affirmed not only that the natures are preserved and have their own “work” in Jesus Christ, but even they are even united “undividedly”. This will help us to specify somewhat the sense of the kenosis.

After embodiment, the Logos has no longer a godlike life separated from the human one. This would be Nestorianism. But neither the human life is separated from the godlike one. All His acts are theandric: divine-human.

Let’s take, for example, the act of healing of a blind man through mud glued on his eyelid by Jesus Christ. This act is a whole which consists of a work done by the human nature and of one done by the godlike one. The movement of the hand after mud, the gluing on the eyes, they are the work of human nature, but the flux of power which through the hand flooded the eyes of the blind man, it is the work of godlike nature. Here is not about a mixing of the works; neither the human work or the godlike one, lose their character⁹⁸.

The mixture or the fusion takes place when the two parts lose their character by giving something new or by being lost at least one, like, for example, into the mixing of the Hydrogen with the Oxygen. A kenosis in the sense of the renouncing, on all the line, to the activation of godlike features doesn’t either take place, because then Jesus could not heal the blind man in the wonderful manner. S. Bulgakov, in order to get rid of this difficulty, he affirms that all the wonders were done by Jesus not because He was God too, so with self-power, but like One Who was receiving, like a prophet, power from God like from an external subject⁹⁹. It is right that everything the Son does, He does it in connection with the Father, like receiving it from the Father. This is His hypostatic character. On this way He works in heaven. But Jesus says that this power He has it not because He is man, 98 Saint John of Damascus says: “His human activity wasn’t deprived of the godlike activity and His Godlike activity wasn’t deprived of His human activity, but each of them is considered together with the other one”. The Dogmatic, translated in Romanian language by Dr. D. Fecioru, Bucharest, 1928, Chapter. XIX, p. 216. “The Godhead was doing the wonders, but wasn’t doing them without body; the body, the humble one, but not without godhead”, Chapter XVI, p. 199. “Though, by no means we mix the ones which He has done in undivided manner, but we know out of the quality of the deeds to which nature belonged every deed”, Chapter XVI, p. 200. “The power of doing wonders it was the activity of His godhead; but the work with the hands, to want, to say: «I want», «clean you of», it was the activity of his humanity”. “Because like we know the natures are united, and they have interpenetration one into another and we do not deny their difference, but we count them and we know that they are inseparable, likewise we know also the union of the wills and of the activities, but after resurrection and after His glorification («it has been given to me all the power into the heaven and on the earth»)", Chapter XV, p. 193.

99 “The character and the content of the wonders of the prophets it is the same with the one of the wonders of Jesus Christ, though into a more reduced degree. The prophets worked wonders through the power of the prayer and of the Holy Ghost Who was resting upon them. This was their preaching, exercised not through word, but through deed, the proof of the godlike power upon them... into the wonders of Christ from the days of His earthly service it doesn’t manifest the «imperial» power upon the world, of which He disrobed Himself by entering the world, and by only receiving it only after His ascent and extolling”, W. c. p. 363.

but because He is One with the Father (Jo. 10, 11), like God. “Everything the Father does, also the Son does likewise” (Jo. 5, 19), just because He is Son. The Son affirms very explicitly that He has inside Him, like Son of God, the power to forgive the sins¹⁰⁰.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Jesus wasn’t wobbling in His knowledge like the people are; it was not observed at Him a progress or a rectification in what He speaks. Everything He said it is ultimate and clear truth, it is absolute certitude, from the first moment of His apparition in the public arena. It is a godlike vision and knowledge, caught into the human shapes of knowledge and expression. These shapes are the ones which progress with the age: the capacity of the human nature to catch and express the divine wisdom¹⁰¹. The works of both natures they meet into a whole, without the light of the godlike nature to remove the human organ of knowing and its work.

If only the human shapes of the knowledge grow up, but a divine vision still persists from the beginning, the self-conscience of His theandric nature Jesus had it in a sure conviction, but not poured into precise shapes from the beginning. When Jesus says about something that He does not know, it is probably that, His human shapes of knowledge weren’t enough, or He 100 KARL ADAM, Jesus Christus, Augsburg, 1933: “We have also many records on many wonders done by the prophets. But all of these deeds of power were produced with the invocation and in the name of the Almighty. Right this, it misses to Jesus: that His wonders are not presenting like results of praying, but like natural irradiations of His own being. Not from the Father, but from Him it starts the work with its effect: «I will, be you clean» (Mk. 1, 41). Not empowerment, but almightiness is here” (p. 213). This thing is affirmed, otherwise, explicitly, also by the Anathemas IX of Saint Cyril from Alexandria: “If somebody says that the One Lord Jesus Christ was glorified by the Holy Ghost, using His power like an external power and that from the Holy Ghost He took the power to work against the unclean ghosts, and the fulfillment of the wonders among people, and that one doesn’t say that, a contrary, also the Holy Ghost through Him worked the wonders as His own: let that one be anathema”. In conformity with dr. Olimp N. Căciulă, The Anathemas of Saint Cyril of Alexandria (“Romanian Orthodox Church”, March-April 1937, p. 236).

101 Almost all church fathers, except the ones from the Antioch school, they reject the idea of any error or real ignorance in Jesus Christ. Though, almost all of them admit a progress of the knowledge after the human nature. “Mit Ausnahme der Antiochener gaben nur wenige Väter einen Irrtum oder rein wirkliches Nichtwissen in Christus zu“, says Dr. Johann Lenz (Jesus Christus nach der Lehre des hl. Gregor von Nyssa, Trier, 1925, p. 81). But Gregory of Nyssa says that the same one who admits a progress of the human nature also in what concerns the knowledge, but, because, by and large, into the person of Jesus there is also the divine knowledge, that progress refers to the human shapes of comprising and expressing of the divine vision: “Er stellt nur sinnen allgemeinen Fortschritt im Leben Jesu muss sich finden; den wenn er eine vernünftige menschliche Seele halte, so musste sie ihre Kräfte betätigen können; das gehört zur Vollkommenheit der Seele... Dass er dort (Luke 2, 52) unter Fortschritt einen inhaltlichen Verstande kann man nicht beweisen. Es genügt ein der Wissensform nach neues Wissen oder eine zunehmende Kundgebung der schon vorhandenen Weisheit anzunehmen” (p. 83). Reminding about the evangelical places, in which Jesus says that He doesn’t know about the day of judgment or where Jesus went towards the fig tree while not knowing that it hadn’t any fruits, Saint Gregory of Nyssa finds in fact a nescience of Christ. (Wir haben hier tatsächlich eine Schwäche Christi, nämlich einen menschlichen Natur zu zusprechen und es ist zu zugeben, dass die Natur Gottes, in der Vereinigung mit den menschlichen παθήματα unveränderlich und leidenschaftslos geblieben ist“. Migne, G. P. 45, 1173 C., Lenz, p. 83).

didn't wanted to humanly catch a divine and deep knowledge which He actually had it. The kenosis of the knowledge would be thus a bearing of the human mind weakness, which develops gradually.

We cannot claim to know and understand the depths which lead to the supra-temporal from within the existence of Jesus Christ. But we know what He was showing to the people, as much as He was showing to them¹⁰². Towards people went out in plain sight especially the aspect of the kenosis, of the humbleness of the Son of God. To the people the almightiness of Jesus it wasn't shown directly, because this would have put a too large distance between God and they and it couldn't have been accomplished the goal of their salvation. His godhead must be approached by Jesus into the man's countenance, into an interweaving with the human nature, with the emerge of it on foreground, in order to be able to show them the love. The people can't bear the uncovered sight of God. Because of their helplessness and in order to enter the communion with them, He subjected Himself to the kenosis. The Son of God shrouded His almightiness into Its manifestation towards people, into the bearable means of the human shapes, like it is shrouded a too much powerful light into a fabric which tempers its intensity, though inside it is activated in fullness.

If all the existence of Jesus consists into an interweaving of the work of the divine nature with the one of the human nature, then only into us will stay the cause that we see more the human nature's part into the whole that Jesus Christ is. It was a benevolence of God that He interweaved His godlike work with the human nature. Into this it stays the objective side of the kenosis. But the objective kenosis is projected into our subjectivity, which is not able to see, but very little, the godhead of Jesus Christ, into features even more intense." (Stăniloae 1993)

"A more familiar analogy of the union of the two natures into Jesus Christ, without a real kenosis of the godlike nature, it is offered also by the union of the soul with the body into a unique person. We do not renounce to the activation of our soul's features by the fact that the soul is united, at us, with the body. The depth of the soul beyond space, beyond time and beyond expression, it can coexist with the limitations of the body worn by the same subject." (Stăniloae 1993)

¹⁰² It is a profound truth into the words of Saint Athanasius that we know God only because He revealed us Himself, and from there further He is covered by the wings of the Cherubim. According to: D. Karl Bornhausen, Das Wirken des Christus durch Taten und Worte, Güterschloh, 1924, p. 223.

“Out of the union of the two natures into the Person of the God—the Word, there turn out some consequences which express in more details the same fact. The first consequence of the hypostatic union is the features communication, which takes places from a nature to the other one into the unity of the person. Through the fact that Jesus Christ is a single person in two natures and the person is the bearer of the features and of the subject of all acts and sufferings, we can call this person sometime through His godlike side, by attributing it to the human features and acts and, vice versa, we can call Him through His human side, by attributing it the godlike features and acts. It can be said: “The Son of God has shed His blood on the Cross” or “Man Jesus is from before eternity”.

There doesn't take place any direct communication from the godlike nature to the human one. It can't be said that the godhead of Jesus suffered on cross, or that His godhead hungered, or that the humanity is present everywhere.

Through subject, thus, it is established a real, a functional connection, between each nature from within the subject, and the features and the works of the other nature. Due to the common hypostasis is maintained, therefore, both the unchanging of the two natures, and their real communication which the isolation is being avoided through. The hypostasis saves both the union and the non-mixing of the natures, without the hypostasis being something existentially different from the two natures.

For the most conclusive illustration of the features communication, a real features communication but without annulling the two natures, we are repeating here a quote from Saint Maximos the Confessor, used also when we talked about the problem of the kenosis:

“No nature of the ones which He was hypostasis to, it separately activated the other nature. Each one made the other obvious. By really being in both natures, like God He moved the humanity, and like man He was unveiling His own godhead. He was godlike suffering, so to speak, for He was suffering voluntarily, for He was not a simple man and He was working wonders as man, for He was working the wonders through his human body, and for He wasn't a unveiled God, so that the sufferings are wonderful and renewed through the human power of the natures of the One Who was suffering, and the wonders suffered, being fulfilled through the suffering power of the body of the One who was doing them”¹⁰³.

When one speaks about the features communication, the hypostasis has not to be considered like something detached by the natures from which is formed, thereby, attributing to the hypostasis named from the godlike side the features of the human nature, do not be understood something else but the bearer of them brings also the title, but the only the title: the divine one. The hypostasis is the faces of the two natures in Jesus Christ full of the whole their presence. Thereby, through any human act of Jesus Christ, we see His godlike face, like divine hypostasis bearer of that act and, together with that face, we see the presence of the divine nature. The divine nature of Jesus, without launching from itself the divine features and works – into this it consists the unchanging of the natures – by the fact that they are center of the hypostatic center, like is face to the human nature, and this thing is also the face of the godlike nature, the last one is, through the one common face, the bearer of the human features and acts. In all the human appearances and manifestations of Jesus, we see not only the man, but we also see God with His nature and in all His divine manifestations He is not only God, but also the man, and not only like a holder subject, but with His entire active human nature.

¹⁰³ G. P. 91, 105 B.

When, on the basis of the features communication, we attribute the human features and works to the divine nature, we have in Jesus, especially the aspect of the divine nature`s kenosis. And when the human nature is, through the hypostasis considered from the human side, the bearer of the divine features and works, we especially have the aspect of the human nature deification. The kenosis shows us the Son of God suffering, and the deification shows us the Son of Man almighty. Into a wider sense, however, also the kenosis is a deification of the human nature, for the human nature`s manifestations carried by God the Word are elevated, in one respect, over the level of the human ones. The suffering of the Word it is a sanctified suffering, unlike that one suffered by any mortal.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“This retention - we can also say - is not something only negative, but, because the Logos, like unique subject of both natures, through one of them He was persisting in suffering, and through the another He was retaining Himself from the annulling of sufferance influence, we have a voluntarily acceptance of the suffering from the part of the Son of God, namely a manifestation in this form of the divine love, into which are included all the godlike features. The retention of the divine-human subject through His godlike nature from the annulling of the suffering, it is actually a will of His, to suffer, it is an intensification of His love in report with the man. This retention does not mean a separation of the work of the two natures, but into the suffering of Jesus Christ through His body we have again the natures’ collaboration, each of them giving what was appropriate to its character.

The human nature of Jesus Christ has gathered both the state anterior to the fall, and the state from after the fall, but it wasn’t fully identical to neither of them.” (Stăniloae 1993)

Communion

"(...) the man, as conscious and free person, he aspires to find the fulfillment of his rationality and of his purpose not in his abolishment within an essence higher than the whole material and spiritual order, but in the same time subjected to monotony and immanent limitation, but in a communion with a transcendent and free Person. This is because the being superior to the man cannot be except a being having a personal character." (Stăniloae 2003: 17-18)

"If the superior relationship between persons it is accomplished in communion, our eternal and fully satisfying relationship it must be a communion with a being who has a personal character, endowed with infinity and freedom. Only a being who is transcendent in this sense, he can be always new and life giver in this communion with the man." (Stăniloae 2003: 18)

"The man can realize a communion only with other persons who, neither they – as nor him – are lowered to the state of object of external knowledge and of always identical usage, but they grow up as inexhaustible sources of warmth and of always new thoughts, maintained and born just by their reciprocal and always creative love, being always in searching for other manifestations of it." (Stăniloae 2003: 19)

"Only the eternity of a personal communion with a personal source of absolute life it offers all the human persons the fulfillment of their meaning, and it grants them, in the same time, the possibility of an eternal and perfect communion between themselves." (Stăniloae 2003: 20)

"The universe wears the mark given by its origin in the rational creator supreme Person, and given also by its destination to be the means of an interpersonal dialogue between that Person and the human persons, in order to make them eternal in that happiness of the communion between them. The whole universe wears the mark of a personal rationality destined to make the human persons eternal." (Stăniloae 2003: 21)

"Only in the eternal participation to the infinity of this supreme Person, our being considers to see his meaning being fulfilled. In this it consists the meaning of the Christian Orthodox doctrine about our being's deification through participation to God by grace." (Stăniloae 2003: 21)

"(...) our being reckons that his meaning, and with this the meaning of the entire reality, it will be fulfilled only through the fact that between our person and the supreme or godlike Person there is no room for an intermediary existence; the man, after God, it is somehow immediate, being able to impart himself in an unmediated manner of all God has as state of the supreme existence, but the human person still remains man.” (Stăniloae 2003: 21)

“(…) not only we are ascending to the communion with the Supreme Person, but that Person too descends Himself, to us. This is for the love requires the movement of each one who are in love with each other, towards the other one. God gives Himself through everything to the man, and the man gives himself to God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 21)

“The person of my fellow human reveals to me some meanings of his own, but recognizing those meanings it depends, on the other hand, on my freedom. Accepting those meanings freely it supposes the faith. This acceptance by faith it is characteristic to the domain of the relationship between the human person and the divine Person, and to this relation’s consummation on the plan of the eternity as meaning of the existence.” (Stăniloae 2003: 23)

Through the supra-natural revelation (o. n.): “(…) the infinite and eternal Person enters, out of own initiative, in communication with the man, giving through that also a foundation to our communion with our fellow humans.” (Stăniloae 2003: 24)

“If the first man’s sin hadn’t intervened, the man’s nature and with it the world itself, they would have been advanced naturally towards the target of eternal consummation into God, being strengthened in the communion with Him while still being on earth. (Stăniloae 2003: 24)

“For this union with the supreme Person and with the person of his fellow humans, the man must accept even death, which he cannot escape, but he can only postpone it.” (Stăniloae 2003: 26)

“(…) the supra-natural Revelation specifies the target of the natural Revelation and the modalities of being, the natural revelation, accomplished. The Christians see in the light of the supra-natural Revelation how God, both through things and happenings, through good and bad happenings in their life, through the voice of their conscience or through their ideas, to increasingly more communion with Him. But they know that this communion it is fully accomplished into Christ, who descended in a real mode to us, they know that into Christ it has been put the sure base of the full union between God and the man who believed in Him, and that the man will become eternal into God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 33)

“(…) God enters the direct and obvious communion with the believers, a fact that convinces the believer about the existence of God, and it satisfied the man’s thirst for the communion with the infinite Person, assuring the man, in the same time, that he isn't left in the hands of some blind forces leading him towards disappearing, but he is elevated to the connection with the supreme Person, and the Supreme Person leads the man toward becoming eternal in a full communion with the supreme Person." (Stăniloae 2003: 34)

"(...) this union (between man and God, o. n.) won't be accomplished and isn't being prepared in an isolated manner, but in each one's solidarity with his fellow humans (...) God wants to save through the supra-natural Revelation not isolated individuals, but the great multitude of the believers in a reciprocal and common responsibility, because all of them must help each other in advancing towards the target of the consummation and of the eternal life and to strengthen their communion which is based on the communion with God." (Stăniloae 2003: 35)

"Both by surpassing the laws of a fallen into sin nature, and by the fact that on this way He leads to fully actualizing the true human nature created for being – by being spiritualized – in a communion with God the Person, an absolute and not-submitted to the nature's automatism Person, Christ made to be Himself beginning to all the ones who believe in Him." (Stăniloae 2003: 37)

"God comes close to us in His state of communion, in order to imprint to us too, this state and this impulse of the communion." (Stăniloae 2003: 42)

"He (Christ, o. n.) is not a human person united with the divine Person; if that was the case, he could be any man, because He wouldn't be the human center which is also God. In this case, through the communion with Christ it wouldn't be achieved the communion with God Himself, to which our being aspires." (Stăniloae 2003: 50)

"Christ is the divine Person, Who, Himself, being a man too, he makes possible, through the accessible communion with Him as man, everybody's communion with God Himself, or with the Absolute Person. He is the center and the foundation of the action of extending the salvation and the deification to all the ones who believe. In Him, the salvation plan had been accomplished as in a foundation." (Stăniloae 2003: 50)

"Through the Holy Ghost, the believers are not tied in isolation to Christ, but together. The one who reached the faith in Christ he reaches there through the faith or through the sensitiveness of another person. The interpersonal sensitiveness of the faith in which the Holy Ghost manifests Himself, it connects the ones who believe in the communion of the faith or in the Church." (Stăniloae 2003: 52)

“The sensitiveness of the joy for the communion with the Absolute Person of Christ it is being extended in the joy of the communion and of the deeds of communion with others, in the participation of the others to the Absolute Person of God Who came on the level of the communion with them in Christ.” (Stăniloae 2003: 52)

“Actually, we are conveyed the Ghost from another person, through the word of the Scripture that person believed it, and the enrichment of my faith by reading the Scripture or by meditating upon the Scripture’s content – this being done in communion with other, in the community of the Church.” (Stăniloae 2003: 52)

“The all-comprising truth is, more properly said, the Holy Trinity, the communion of the Supreme Persons; but the Holy Trinity works the salvation through the Son of God, the divine Hypostasis Who unites in Himself the Godhead and the humanity, wanting to bring everything within Him.” (Stăniloae 2003: 72)

“The Christian dogmas (...) founded the spiritual development of the one who believes, in freedom, for they are the expression of the man’s communion, as person, with God. And the interpersonal communion is, by excellence, the domain of the liberty, though it is in the same time the domain of the faith.” (Stăniloae 2003: 79)

“This opening towards the not-passing and infinite life, it is being done through the man’s resurrection into Christ Who is God, the One Who made Himself man, in order to come close to us, and Who resurrected, as man, for all of us to be able to resurrect to an eternal communion with him as God, through His humanity common to ours.” (Stăniloae 2003: 79-80)

“(...) through the reality of the Person of Christ Who has come in the on the human accessible plan, and therefore is pressing with His evidence upon us, there is pressing of there is fully revealing Himself the Trinity Himself. Christ shows, through Himself, the Father and the Ghost, by committing together with Them the work of elevating the mankind to the eternal communion with the Holy Trinity Who is Himself the structure of the perfect communion.” (Stăniloae 2003: 81)

“The Person of Christ as embodied Son of God, and therefore also His work, He starts out of Trinity in order to bring the people back into communion with the Trinity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 81)

“The Son of God didn’t unite Himself with a man. If that had been the case, in Christ, the man would have been somebody else than God, a fact that would have left the people outside the full communion with the divine

Persons and, consequently, outside the communion with the other Trinitarian Persons.” (Stăniloae 2003: 83)

“Christ doesn’t become a new species, for he remains full god and full man and, through this, he is the real Mediator of our communion with God. He enters through embodiment the perfect communion with God as man and He enters the perfect communion with the people as God. In the communion with Him every person is in perfect communion with all the Trinitarian Persons. In communion with Him, each person, become son of the Father by grace, rejoices the full love of the Father of Christ, and the Father can rejoice Himself the perfect love of man Christ, become His Son, love that I united in the love of everybody who believe in Him.” (Stăniloae 2003: 84)

“The eternal communion we aspire to, it has its origin in the eternal consubstantiality of the divine Trinitarian Persons. Of course, the not-confounded unity between the divine Persons it is ensured by the community of nature, while the community between God and the ones who believe in him it is ensured by their participation to the divine nature, by grace, or to the energies irradiating out of the common nature of the three divine Persons, namely in their loving community.” (Stăniloae 2003: 85)

“The Embodiment of the Word being the manifestation of the love of the Holy trinity for people, it lays a foundation to our eternal communion with the Holy Trinity. But to this eternal communion of ours with the Holy Trinity it is reached through Resurrection. In Christ’s Resurrection there is active and revealed again, in an even more obvious mode, the entire Trinity, remaining thus unveiled forever and ever, for a full communion with us.” (Stăniloae 2003: 86-87)

“The Resurrection cannot be explained without the Holy Trinity. The whole oikonomia of the salvation done by the Holy Trinity it comes to an end in Resurrection. On the other hand, through Resurrection, it is communicated the godlike eternal life common to the Three Persons, and through this, the ones who believe are received in the interior of the Trinitarian communion.” (Stăniloae 2003: 87)

“It is difficult to say if we enter the eternal communion with the Persons of the Holy Trinity, and amongst us, because we receive the incorruptibility and the immortality, or the godlike life, or whether we receive this life because we enter the communion with the Trinity’s Persons.” (Stăniloae 2003: 87)

“The godlike incorruptible life is being communicated through the Persons of the Holy Trinity, by receiving the ones who believe in the communion with the Trinitarian Persons. This life doesn’t really subsist outside the Trinitarian Persons. The communion amongst persons it isn't a non-substantial relation and the being doesn't subsist except in the persons who are in communion." (Stăniloae 2003: 87)

"The Resurrection is a together work of the Holy Trinity, for though communion the human nature is communicated the incorruptible life, but this life is communicated by each divine Person in union with the other Two divine Persons." (Stăniloae 2003: 88)

"The Holy Ghost communicates to the human nature the power to resurrect by overcoming again the nature's laws. The Ghost communicates this spiritual power for He is the Ghost of the communion, and the full communion isn't except where the twoness is has been overcome." (Stăniloae 2003: 89)

"Christ lives in this full communion with the Father and with the Holy Ghost even in His body, and through this, His body it being filled up with the godlike incorruptible life and it becomes environment of His godlike powers." (Stăniloae 2003: 90)

"A body lacking any spirituality, it isn't capable of any communion, or it impedes any aspiration towards communion that his soul still has it; and through this, that body is incapable of liberating itself, in some measure, from the nature's laws which are automatically repeating." (Stăniloae 2003: 90-91)

"(...) the elevation of the ones who believe, to the communion with God in trinity, it is done only when a divine Person reflects in his work both the community with another divine Person and the community with the Two others. That's why, a divine Person is always sent by the Others Two, in their unmerged unity." (Stăniloae 2003: 93)

"The mystery of the communion between persons it is characterized just by this paradox: the union and the preservation of the persons through it." (Stăniloae 2003: 96)

"The man is autonomous but yet he cannot have a life and he cannot accomplish himself except in communion with others." (Stăniloae 2003: 98)

"Our firmness, as hypostases of an essence in the image of the divine supra-essence, it makes us able for an inexhaustible, and therefore eternal, communion with the threefold divine Hypostasis." (Stăniloae 2003: 165)

"The person of a limited essence is, at his turn, limited, because his spirit moves in the frame of some finite powers, and it is tied to the finite reality of a worlds of objects. Even the communion amongst created persons, though it widens a lot the life content of each of those persons, it still is finite.” (Stăniloae 2003: 168)

“Without identifying ourselves to God, we will be elevated in the His maximum relation with us, a relation represented by infinity, by surpassing the human pole of this relation which is represented by limitation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 169)

“Our elevation in the divine infinity by grace, or by the benevolence of God Who enters the direct communication with us, it actually means a maximum communication with Him as subject, beyond the cogitation that is accustomed to treat all the things as objects, namely by crossing from a side to another. In the intimate relation with a subject, generally, you always remain within him. The more is this in the relation with the divine subject. This means a simple experience, but a plenary experience, of the infinite life of the divine subject, better said an experience of His direct manifestation through this relation for the sake of His communion with us.” (Stăniloae 2003: 169)

“The infinity is the ambience of God, through which He makes Himself accessible, or He communicates Himself to the creatures reached to the union with Him as supreme Subject. God, as supreme Subject, or as Trinitarian communion of Subjects, he is above infinity for He is the support and the source of the infinity. Only by being of the divine Person, or of the community of divine Persons, the infinity isn’t an ambiguous, monotonous infinity, of which the human person will be able to have enough, as in the Platonic-Origenistic theory. Only the divine Person or the community of divine Persons is truly inexhaustible and it offers the human person the possibility of enjoying His inexhaustible richness. Only in communion with God as Person or as community of Persons, is our being able to appropriate the experience of the infinity of God, an experience partially accomplished in the interpersonal communion, without the human being to lose its border according to the nature. By in himself absorbing the ambience of the divine infinity, this infinity irradiates out of the human person too. The human person stretches himself, through the work that becomes his own, beyond his borders, in infinite.” (Stăniloae 2003: 170)

“Even during the earthly life, the believer can foretaste the experience of the luminous communion with God, in which he sees no limit, but he neither has the feeling monotony or of boredom, but he feels continuously as at the beginning.” (Stăniloae 2003: 170)

“In Christ, after Resurrection, His humanity has been elevated to the supreme participation to the divine infinity, by understanding the above understanding godlike and fully rejoicing of godhead's energies imprinted in the human energies. And in union with Christ, all the ones believing in Him are elevated to this participation to the divine infinity." (Stăniloae 2003: 171)

"In this teaching it is being expressed, actually, the faith in the eternal perfect communion of our multi-personal subjectivity with the divine subjectivity in Three Persons. In this communion the whole universe of the objects it will be made subjective. We won't feel any separation between our person and objects, and between our person and the other human persons. The things accentuate their separation in report with the person when a person opposes, by using the things, to other persons, or when those things are forcedly taken away from him by the other persons." (Stăniloae 2003: 176-177)

"But there is no true life where is no communion. The plenitude of the life cannot subsist except in the perfect communion amongst perfect subjects." (Stăniloae 2003: 179)

"Only in the consummate communion amongst the inexhaustible subjects and in the reciprocal interiority of their infinity, only there it is the inexhaustible, unlimited, and eternal life. And the ones who participate to such a divine interpersonal communion, they receive, at their turn, the eternal life." (Stăniloae 2003: 180)

"The godlike life isn't a without beginning and endless petrification, but it is a living communion amongst the supreme Subjects. God is above any mode of determined existence, and any determined existence shows just because of that, that it hasn't everything in itself." (Stăniloae 2003: 180-181)

"The time doesn't exist in the perfect communion of the supreme Persons, but it is explained out of this communion, for the Holy trinity wants to attract in this communion also other persons who do not exist from eternity, persons who are created on this purpose. Over time, it is manifested the freedom and the capacity of ambivalent decision, towards the communion with other persons and, in the final analysis, towards the communion with the supreme Persons, or towards the definitive closing in itself of the created conscious being. The time ceases to exist in the consummate communion with the supreme Persons, namely in the infinite plenitude of the communion, either in the sinking of the own void. These are the two eternities, or stops of the time. In the eternity of the consummate communion there is the full freedom and a unique and supreme meaning for all the things and a movement above movement; in the solipsist eternity there is the incapacity of any movement, and therefore of any freedom." (Stăniloae 2003: 195-196)

“The historical time forms a whole, an unfolding eon, within which people are influenced by other in good or in evil. That’s why we are going to be judged as a whole, by taking in to account for judging each one of us, the influences he suffered from others or he exercised upon others, upon the whole.” (Stăniloae 2003: 200)

“It is paradoxical that, the more time somebody has for others, the more he overcomes both the time and the space.” (Stăniloae 2003: 209)

“Trying to overcome the time in an exterior manner, through speed, we remain locked up in time, we remain in the empty of communion duration. Even if the moments of the duration are quickly spent, the duration’s plan isn’t surpassed. If we quickly traveled the road to the intended target, we always find other targets, or we remain in the tormenting duration of the loneliness. The external speed can take us quickly to somebody, but if we haven’t overcome the internal distance, we quickly slide by the person we have reached at.” (Stăniloae 2003: 210)

“We are given the time and the space as an inevitable road towards the eternity and the infinity of the life in God, and therefore we cannot get rid of them because they are gifts from God. In the moments of total communion, in the loving contemplation that absorbs the other one, a mystery above space, indefinite and inexhaustible, the space is overwhelmed, it is swallowed, and it remains behind.” (Stăniloae 2003: 210)

“The space receives its full meaning only when we see it as communion environment of God with us. Our human communion needs space, but it wasn’t able to create the space, though it can transfigure the space, it can make the space subject. But this means that only a communion of supreme Persons could create the space, and not for Them, but for us, for we are made in the image of the supreme communion. And an obvious making subjective of the space it cannot be done except in the full communion with the supreme communion.” (Stăniloae 2003: 212)

“God has given existence to the space out of an internal possibility included in the Trinitarian life, in order to be the space to us, a communion environment between Him and us, and amongst us, in the image of the Trinitarian communion, a communion we are going to increase within. God has placed the space as interval to be surpassed, between His without interval communion and our communion amongst ourselves and with him, a communion that, because it still not is perfect, it still has an interval within it, and between it and the Trinitarian communion.” (Stăniloae 2003: 212)

“The space is the kind of our communion in movement towards the target of the perfect communion, towards surpassing the interval the space is representing. Through this environment we must ascend in the direction of the perfect communion with God and amongst us, in the likeness of the Trinitarian communion. But we cannot do this without the descending, by grace, of the Trinitarian communion to us. God is omnipresent in space as loving Trinity, and as source of our love for Him and amongst us, by increasing our union with Him and amongst us, but without being confounded as persons. Through the omnipresence of the God in Trinity, it is given from the beginning an ontological unity of all the things in diversity, in the same diversified space, and in the diverse unity of our beings which tend towards increasingly more unity. Like the time will be overwhelmed in the interiority of the reciprocal and perfect communion, so it will be overwhelmed the space too in the interiority of the same reciprocal and perfect communion, in the perfect human inter-subjectivity, by being elevated in the divine inter-subjectivity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 212-213)

“Our ascension towards the perfect communion has multiple stages. The God in Trinity is descended each time, through His energies, on the level the conscious being reached at in the communion amongst them and with God. God wants to lead us to the target of the full communion, through this descending to us; He wants to lead us to the target of the surpassing of the time and of the space, that separates us from the full communion, through the various descending to each of us, for we are at different distances from one another. God comes at diverse temporal and spatial distances through each human being. And each human being is at another temporal and spatial distance from Him. Once we have reached the target of the perfect communion between Him and us, there will no longer be a variety of distances, but God will be equally close to us, equally intimate, wherever and whenever, so that, properly-said, there won't be any difference between here and there, between then and now, but we will simply be in the divine eternity and infinity, lacking the past and the future, or here and there.” (Stăniloae 2003: 213)

“All the power acts of God, directed towards outside Himself, being conform to His being - to the good -, like interpersonal communion, these acts are extended also as a foundation and as a consummation of the communion of other persons with Him, and amongst those persons, like the communion amongst the Trinitarian Persons. This extension of the good as communion amongst persons, it cannot consist into a multiplying of the godlike Persons. The godlike persons cannot become, over time, more than three. On a contrary case, they wouldn't be godlike persons. And a multitude of eternal persons, produced on the basis of an internal necessity, it would be countless, and this would make impossible the perfection of the communion amongst those persons. And if God wouldn't be able to bring to existence also persons who aren't godlike but who still are capable of communion, God would be locked up in Himself and He wouldn't be able to voluntarily manifest His almightiness." (Stăniloae 2003: 224-225)

"We must ask God for justice through asking prayers and we must thank Him for justice through thanking prayers. From here comes the fact that us, praying God to makes us partakers to His happiness, we must pray to Him to make others partaker to his happiness too. The man's desire for justice for himself, based on the conviction that God is righteous, it must be connected with the desire for equal justice for others too, by not forgetting that God, being merciful and righteous, He has made those too, to enjoy the happiness, according to the justice." (Stăniloae 2003: 258)

"The full communion is accomplished only amongst the persons who are and who make themselves fully transparent as pure subjects. The more they are and the more they are proven as subjects, the more the reports amongst them are of a greater and or a freer communicativeness and communion, of a more accentuated conscious reciprocal interiority and interpenetration, by realizing thus an even greater inter-subjectivity." (2003: 312-313)

"The aspiration, and partially the accomplished capacity of the human self to be a simple unity and in the same time to comprise everything and to be in ontological and dialogical relation with the other selves, therefore to have them in this sense as subjects within himself, it is the reality consummately accomplished in God from ever, because of otherwise it couldn't be explained the mentioned mode of the irreducibility and of the ontological unity or of the dialogical relationship of the human selves." (2003: 315-316)

"The world serves to elevate us to our ultimate sense, or to obtaining our plenitude in the communion with God as person, through its fixed or contingent rationality, through the senses the man can pursuit through it. All of these impose us a new responsibility towards God and towards the world itself, a responsibility which, by exercising it, we increase in the community with God and with the fellow humans, by humanizing or consummating ourselves." (2003: 354)

"The goods given us by God as gifts, they serve as connection of love amongst persons; by being so, the things do not become separation walls between persons. Therefore, the goods can serve towards the consummation or towards the corruption of the people. The goods as gifts are meant to serve the interpersonal communion and to be surpasses for this communion. The road towards God crosses through our humanization. And one can advance in this humanization only being in the human communion. It consists in accomplishing a deep inter-human communion. That's why the things aren't given to us only for practicing a lonely dialogue of each one with God, but also for practicing a dialogue amongst people and of the people in common with God, or of a dialogue amongst them being aware of the fact that the things are given them by God in order to be used as gifts amongst them, in the name, for the commandment, and out of His richness, as signs of His love, for this love to be extended amongst us too. The limitation of the things, highlighted especially in our times, it shows that the giving, the sacrifice, the cross, and the conscience of the insufficiencies, are not only a condition of the spiritual growing up for the eternal life, but they even are a condition of the people's surviving on earth." (2003: 359-360)

"On bringing to light, and on valuing constantly higher the nature's rationality, it depends therefore the noticing and the using of the nature through a conscious subject, and the fact that this subject can discover in this rationality meanings which serve to his spiritual growing up. The rationality of the world it unveils one of its meanings by the fact that it is being completed with the rationality of the human subject, a rationality that is aware of an inexhaustible richness too, and that isn't a monotonous repeating. It is a rationality that discovers, that chooses, and that pursuits increasingly higher targets, towards which the man advances by using the nature itself, not in a monotonous repetition, but with a continuously new understanding of the things, and by freely choosing the thing and other modes, out of the increasingly many new ones, by new ways of applying the natural laws, and by pursuing increasingly useful results. Through the enriched thought and through common work and through increasingly accentuated responsibility the nature's laws are applied with, the people elevate themselves on increasingly higher stages of understanding and of communion." (2003: 361)

"The people discover they must behave in a certain manner to the things, for the things to promote the communion amongst the people and not to impede it. This doesn't mean that the people must let themselves to be dominated by things, by forgetting about their spiritual needs, but it means that the people must use the things with some temperance, to get used to make the things occasion of practicing a reciprocal attention and generosity, to see the endless superiority of his fellow humans' persons in comparison to the things, to see their transparency. The things unveil thus their meaning of people's means of spiritual growth." (2003: 370)

"The man increases in diverse forms of spiritual strength, or virtues, through a certain report of superiority detached from things, by the fact that he doesn't let himself to be egotistically dominated by things. Only for the things gain some transparency or relativity in report with the interpersonal communion, they unveil their increasingly more profound meaning and their importance in the spiritual forming of the man." (2003: 370)

“If the communion with the fellow humans makes the things transparent and it imposes a certain restraint and cleanness in the reports with them, the more the things will be given such a transparence, and it imposes a restraint and a cleanness, in the reports with the things, the dialogue with god and the progress in the communion with Him, for he aims to lead us through things to the full communion with Himself. On the other hand, God asks us for a certain respect for the things, and on the other hand, for certain temperance in the reports we have with the things. Between these two attitudes there is, actually, a tight connection. And through both of them it is being fortified and it is being ennobled our spirit, but are also promoted the reports of justice, of respect, and of love amongst people and between them and God, given the fact that the greediness is the one bringing unbalance and conflict in the reports amongst people, as also the getting far from God. The things, as images of the divine rationalities, they mustn't be lowered through a dirty and strife producing usage of them. But we can to this when we do not enslave ourselves to the things in a passionate manner, but we see in them their divine meaning that promotes communion. Their rationality itself, rationality we haven't created, it makes transparent to us the meaning of their divine origin and their purpose, in order to elevate us towards God. And their meaning itself asks us for the good fruition of the things.” (2003: 372-373)

“When the people are elevated to the understanding of the meaning of the human brotherhood and of their reciprocal responsibility, this makes them to discover in the possibilities of the rationality or of the nature, what serves in a fuller mode to this brotherhood and responsibility, and this gives birth to the technique too, which can bring people closer to each other, and it can satisfy everybody's needs in a fuller mode.” (2003: 379)

“The contingency of the nature's rationality it serves to the man accomplishing, or to man's humanization, given the fact that the humanization is tied the increasingly deeper communion amongst people. The nature's contingency is anthropocentric.” (2003: 379)

“Surpassing any unilateral image and all of them together, it is done out of intuiting a consummation that is above everything, in which the images have their source and towards which they tend, being helped by that final target itself. The forms and the stages of the humanization itself, which the people want and surpass under the impulse of other images of the world, they have their origin in the communion of a supreme interpersonal love, and they advance towards a perfect communion out of the source's power and according to the source's likeness. Thus, the nature's rationality finds its supreme fulfillment in accomplishing the ultimate meaning of the human existence, which consists in uniting the human existence to God, Who is the supreme meaning or rationality, above any rationality, as Saint Maximos the Confessor says (Answers towards Thalassius).” (2003: 380)

“We must constantly specify that the ocean of the infinity of God it hasn’t an impersonal character. That’s why Saint Maximos affirms that God as Person, in Whose bosom the creature will rest, it is above any infinity. Thus, the eternal ‘rest’ of the man it will always keep its character of communion. In the communion with God as Person, there is more infinity and joy than in any sinking in some ocean of the infinity, for it is resting in the love of the infinite Person. A sinking in an impersonal ocean it would have been a merging of the human person to that ocean.” (2003: 414)

“The true communion is being developed by paying attention to other people, and to the world as work of God, associated with a restraining of the passions as endless impulses towards finite, and by cultivating the virtues which culminate in the love for persons, for God as Person, therefore as true absolute. This opens the way towards the contemplation, in the same time sober and dizzying, of the profoundness of the fellow humans and of the world’s meanings, a contemplation which is potentially infinite, for the fellow humans and the world’s meanings have, through their rationalities which are gradually and endlessly revealed, their common roots in the infinity and in the borderless love of God, the One in Trinity. The awoken rationality and the impulse of the loving self-exceeding, they are united in a unique method in accomplishing the human ascension, for the rationality distinguishes not only the infinite from finite, but also the luminous road in infinity from the darkened and full of enslaving passions road.” (2003: 418)

“If towards the endless communion with God and towards the spiritual growing up in Him, we are attracted only by the mysterious participation of the image from within us to its model and the active functions of the godlike energies,, towards the endless communion with our fellow humans into God, without which we cannot increase either in the communion with God, we are attracted not only by the common participation to the communion life of the Trinity and the richness of the energies which communicate everybody this life of communion, but also we are attracted by our common nature, or by the fact that the same nature subsists in many hypostases.” (2003: 422)

“The Holy Fathers do not make, by and large, any difference of content between person and nature. The person isn’t but the nature in real existence and in the normal state all the persons comprise in common the whole nature, by giving it and by receiving it reciprocally, as in the Holy Trinity. Just because of that, this state, which is an ontological state and a state of love in the same time, the people cannot reach it except by the power of the communion of nature and of supreme love, of the Holy Trinity, in culminant communion, if not of nature, then surely of grace, or of uncreated energy of love, with the Holy Trinity.” (2003: 424)

“The Holy Fathers saw the unity of the Creation in the fact that the angels were created in order to serve the plan of people’s salvation, a plan that is thought by God from ever. Of course, this doesn’t mean that the angels aren’t created also for their own happiness, as the people are. But both ones and others reach their happiness in a communion of all of them. And in this communion, the angels as superior beings, they have a certain role of helping us. But through this, although they are superior to the people from a certain point of view, they are servants of the people’s salvation and by this, they are helpers of the people’s mission of spiritualizing the seen creation. If the human subject is enriched on the measure he is in relationship with several human subjects and on the measure these subjects are on levels of higher spirituality, of course he will be even more enriched if he has a relation also with a great multitude of angelic subjects from superior spiritual levels.” (2003: 444)

“Within Church it is accomplished not only a communion amongst the Church’s seen members, but also with the angels. The catholicity of the Church includes also the angels.” (2003: 459)

“By renouncing to the communion with God and with the fellow humans, the man has narrowed his knowledge to knowing the world as an object. The man weakened in knowing the divine Subject superior to the world, because knowing the divine subject is it accomplished in communion with Him, and it doesn’t give the man the possibility to be sovereign upon Him. By wanting to fully know everything, or only rationally, the man limits his knowledge only to the aspect of object of the world and of the human body. BY remaining with the strictly rational knowledge of the nature and of his fellow humans, the man has separated the knowledge from the understanding of the creation as gift of God and from the love of God as continuous giver of this love, and of the fellow humans as partners in a dialogue of love.” (2003: 497)

“Knowing the world exclusively rationally through separations, limitations, and generalizations, to which the man has reduced himself, it doesn’t give the man the knowledge of the entire existence and it doesn’t provide the man the entire spiritual life, because it leaves the man outside the communion with the supreme Subject and with the subjects of his fellow humans. It leaves the man lacking the eternal life and lacking the knowledge perspectives of an eternally new reality, which are provided by the communion with that Subject and with the others.” (2003: 497)

“The true good for each person is in communion; a good experienced in individual isolation it doesn’t exist, or it doesn’t last for long. The good is the answer of another to your need for love and your answer to his need for love. The good is the continuous exercise and in concrete relation, of the man’s responsibility for his fellow humans. The good is the result of a true knowledge. And the true knowledge is the knowledge in communion. The true rationality is in the same time: word, communion, participation to reality – and the highest reality it is that of the person. The solipsist reality isn’t but a speck of rationality. It becomes the instrument of all the sophistications, for the profit of the egotistic impulses and the means of justifying any evil.” (2003: 501)

“(…) the Person Himself of Christ unveils all His dimensions only after His resurrection. Even if they had reckoned Christ, uninterruptedly and unshakably, as embodied God, if he hadn’t resurrected, namely His disciples hadn’t had the experience of His Resurrection and of His real efficiency from after Resurrection, His godhead would have remained to them mainly a close, hidden and not-illuminated reality. Only with the eye of this faith, founded on the communion with Him after Resurrection, the disciples were able to understand Christ in the real fullness of His Person. The experience of the Resurrection of Christ, founded on the communion with Him after Resurrection, it is the “historical” basis that gave the disciples the possibility of recognizing His “historicity” as God-Man, and to describe it as such. A theological theory about Jesus, which overlooks this “historical” experiencing of the Resurrection of Christ, it will deny the godhead of His Person, even in case of admitting His historicity. Of course, this historicity won’t be a full one, because it lacks His Resurrection, as one of the fundamental events of His “history”. Such a theology will eliminate from the life of Christ everything that surpasses the possibility of an average man.” (Stăniloae 2006: 11)

“In Christ it is being fulfilled also our profound aspiration after the communion with God and amongst us and, by this, for the eternal life into happiness, which cannot be but a life in the consummate love.” (Stăniloae 2006: 13)

“The idea of sacrifice shows in itself a transparent mode of communion. Christ’s entering as man, at the Father, conditioned by the state of clean sacrifice, which can be understood also like opening of the man for the entrance of the Father, it is the reestablishing of the communion between Christ, as man, and God. But Christ has accomplished His state of sacrifice for us, like a conclusion and like a strengthening of his communion with us, or as basis of our communion with Him. This is for He enters at the Father as clean sacrifice, or He reestablishes His communion with the Father, in order to introduce us too, in the communion with the Father. But by this we enter the communion with Christ too, as God, for we enter the communion with His Father, Who becomes, thus, our Father too. The sacrifice is necessary for communion. The sacrifice is animated by the tendency towards communion; the sacrifice is renouncing to the self for the sake of another; the sacrifice is forgetting about the self out of the love for another. Thus, the communion is the result of the sacrifice. Somehow, itself the kenosis of the Son of God, by assuming our nature and by accepting the death, it is an initiative of His for reestablishing His communion, as God, with us, but also towards reestablishing His communion, as man, with the Father, and through this, reestablishing the communion between us and God. This is not a sacrifice for satisfying the honor of God, but this is for opening the communion with Him, by renouncing to ourselves and by seeing Him in the whole His glory. The Father sent Christ in body, in order to bring this sacrifice necessary to the communion, but not in order to exclusively solve a conflict between Him as God and Us, but in order to make of the sacrifice of His Son the power and the incentive of our sacrifice. That's why Christ makes, on Himself, Hierarchy and Sacrifice for us. He is, thus, the accomplisher of our communion with God, and amongst us." (Stăniloae 2006: 58)

"The sanctification meant to prepare for sacrifice, and the sanctification of the sacrifice or of the sacrificed one, they appear as initiative of God and as answer of the man for being accepted in and for entering the communion with God. Christ is sanctified and he sanctifies, on Himself, in order to bring, on Himself, as sacrifice, ever since he has made, on Himself, a man. This is for since then it has been accomplished the beginning of the communion with God. But Christ is sanctified as brought sacrifice too, for by sacrifice He has entered, as man, the full communion with the Father." (Stăniloae 2006: 59)

"The sanctification of the One Who wants to sacrifice, on Himself, and the sanctification of His sacrifice brought once, it has not a worthy of God meaning, except by being understood as manifestation of the will of communion from the part of the Father and of acceptance from the part of Christ-the man, or as beginning of accomplishing the communion and as accomplishing the communion. Otherwise, the sacrifice remains the attaching of a "physical" quality to the sanctified One and to His sacrifice." (Stăniloae 2006: 59)

Understood in this uniquely possible way, the death of Christ no longer appears as the bringing of a substitutive satisfaction for the offended honor of God, on behalf of the people, or as expiation of a substitutive punishment, instead of them, from the same reason." (Stăniloae 2006: 59)

“The Father sees all the ones who believe in Christ, in the face of Christ, for on Christ’s face it is reflected the thought of Christ at each believer, and the Father sees Christ as imprinted on the face of each believer. The Father sees Christ as progressing in transforming each believer in His image until bringing the believers to His state of resurrection. In this it stays the progressive communion of the Father with all the ones who believe in His Son. Thus, by uniting us with Himself, Christ unites us with the Father.” (Stăniloae 2006: 75)

“Through the priest ministration, or of altar mediator, which a fellow human of ours is invested with, and through the importance the Church receives it through this in its quality or divine-human objective reality, or of body of Christ which cannot be reduced to our subjectivity, our fellow human and the communion with them receive a great significance in our salvation. And this is on the basis that the Son of God has made Himself our fellow human, in order to bring us the salvation of the infinity of the godlike love. But only through this the importance of our person is valued too.” (Stăniloae 2006: 106)

“Being reduced to pure changing and capricious subjectivity, myself I am no longer sure of me, since I no longer mean anything for another too. I know that I exist and that I receive the surety of the salvation for the eternal life by the fact that the Son of God has made Himself man, or a fellow human of mine, and that he unites me with Himself not individually, not by working within my purely subjective inside, but in the “body” of the believer humanity consisting of souls dressed up in bodies. Christ places thus, me too, in a new light, and He gives my reality a sure consistency, composed of soul and body, and activated and accomplished in the relation acts with the other people. And we are real together, for everybody is real in Him, for we are real together. And we are real together, for: some of us are priests or mediators of the embodied Word and the Mediator as such, for some of us are the chosen ones of God in order to unite us through them with the Word of God – Who has made Himself man -, Who is the supreme “Mediator” between us and God, for He has remained God too.” (Stăniloae 2006: 106)

“Although we are limbs with diverse ministrations and gifts, for we have all of these from the Holy Ghost and for we are living in the same Ghost and in the same organic whole of the Church, we have a common sensitiveness, or the sensitiveness of the whole is being lived by each one of us. The Ghost of Christ doesn’t dress up each one of Church’s limbs with all His gifts, in isolation, likewise at the creation weren’t given all the qualities to every man, in isolation. If that had been the case, there wouldn’t have been communion. But each of us receives everything but in the frame of the whole, so that each of us rejoices of everything, but in communion. The communion, far from reducing the personal life, it enriches the personal life. And through this it enriches the life of the whole. The communion and the plenitude, these are the two meanings of the Church's features expresses through the term "catholic"." (Stăniloae 2006: 119)

"Given the spiritual interpenetration between the spiritual guide and the penitent in the Mystery of the Confession, interpenetration where Christ Himself is present in, during the penitent's confession and during his advising by the spiritual guide, one can consider that this intimate encounter is the matter which the Holy Ghost works through in this Mystery, as Ghost of the communion, as the Ghost Who unites the two persons in one, by seeding Himself as a sole Ghost within them, due to the warm openness each one of the two has it for another one. The priest's hand and epitrachelion, placed on the penitent's head, they could be the seen expression and the coronation of this spiritual communion that has been accomplished between them, a communion which the priest is the organ the Ghost of Christ comes through, and the penitent is the one which the Ghost of Christ penetrates into. By and large, the Mystery is shown here also a unity formed by two or more in Christ. Mystery is also the unity of the two persons in marriage, through the Holy Ghost called upon them by the priest. This is for only in God many can be one." (Stăniloae 1997: 95-96)

"By entering the communion with Christ – God-the man – we are suddenly elevated in the horizon of light and of infinite life, which we can possibly fully enter in after death, without being necessary to search for it through an endless climbing on the ladder of the law of a order infinite in several aspects, or relative, from which one can never cross into absolute." (Stăniloae 1997: 171)

"The Christendom gets out both from the impersonal vision of the evolution in the eternal relativity, as also from the juridical vision of a personalism weakened by the law of the impersonal principles, of the intercalation between persons of an order of the things, of the deeds committed according to some laws. The Christendom, and especially the Orthodox one, it explains the hell and the paradise, namely both the eternal unhappiness and the eternal happiness, from the communion's point of view. For the attitude to communion, it is a matter of freedom, the matter of the paradise and of the hell it a problem of freedom too, and, as such, beyond the possibility of being rationalized." (Stăniloae 1997: 174-175)

"The saints' and the angels' interest in the salvation of each soul who has strived to live according to Christ's will, or who manifested at the end of his life repentance and longing for the communion with everybody in Christ, it must have as source also the plus of joy which this new soul brings it in the universal communion." (Stăniloae 1997: 202)

“The Abraham’s bosom, the tents of the righteous, being under the same light of Christ, being warmed up by the same love of His, they indicate the union of everybody in the love of Christ. Who loves Christ, he no longer lives Christ as an object, but as another subject, for He is the subject who irradiates the endless love, the source of each love. But to live the other one as subject in yourself it means living him within yourself, as subject of your own subject, moving your subject. In this sense says Saint Paul: “I am no longer living, but Christ lives within me” (Gal. 2: 20). But this happens in any love. All the ones whom I love, they are subjects within me, without being confounded to one another, and without I being confounded within them. But, amongst all the ones who are living like subjects within me, the central leading, and springing out of endless will towards communion, is Christ. He, with His great love for me, he makes me living all the people as subjects in me, for he lives them as subjects in Himself. Through the culminant intensity of Christ’s presence within me, I can live the presence of all others within me as subjects. And by living another in whom Christ is felt through faith, as subject, with the whole intensity, I can live Christ through that one, within me, as subject. But the One Who makes Christ as subject within me, or Who opens me as subject to Christ, and Who unites everybody with Christ within me, He is the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 1997: 202)

“One could say that everybody will resurrect, through the unity of their human nature with the one of Christ. But not all of them will resurrect to happiness, for the happiness is a matter of personal decision of each person for the communion with Christ. Christ doesn’t have in Himself all the human person, but the whole human nature. If Christ had had in Himself all the human persons, He would have been a plurality of persons and a plurality of liberties. But then there wouldn’t have been human person outside Christ. In the unity of nature with Christ we have a basis for the easy communion with Him, but we do not have our salvation without being decided by us. Even the sinners will resurrect on the ground of the unity of nature with Christ, in order to be able to contemplate eternally the possibility which they had had to be saved, but which they didn’t use, because of their freedom to refuse the communion which basis they had been given with.” (Stăniloae 1997: 289)

“Only that will of the another, expressed by word, it helps us to intensely experience, clearly and durably, his subject, which we feel that it does not follow a selfish goal, a narrowing of our subject to the state of an object, but it seeks our communion, our understanding, and our love. Only the other’s word, which asks us also for a word, an answer to the query, the word which moves between us it gives birth to my and to your subject, but this is not a monologue word²⁰. Only then a human person becomes a real you to us when he makes also out of us a real *me*¹⁰⁴, fully loaded by the subject's character, of the me-you report.

It is power from another but yet it is a sentiment of own power. In the light of this report, we understand how between grace and liberty there is no antagonism, but the liberty grows by grace. The grace is neither predestination nor the abolition of my person; and the liberty is not the pride with own "justice"¹⁰⁵. But, even if into the other's word it manifests the willingness for communion and not an egocentric will, we still will be able remain deaf to his appeal. He flashes for an instance in front of our conscience, and then we no longer hear except sounds of words. The he has fallen off his quality as man for us, namely of you, of subject who searches for communion, in order him to remain an object with a precise and modest place among the other objects¹⁰⁶. The other's subject, his willingness for communion, what we are calling as you, he does not impose itself forcibly to our knowledge, like the world of objects, like the sound of the word, like logical meanings¹⁰⁷. It is required from our part an effort to experience the other. The grace, still requires us, for we aren't imparted with the grace without our personal effort. John Cullberg says that we get to the other subject by faith¹⁰⁸. We must believe the word of whom we talk to, a word which he tells us through, about his willing to be in communion with us, for only on this way, only through word, we can ascertain the existence of this will. We can add that this faith is brought together or prepared by the restraint of egocentrism, by the appeasement of the noise made by our egocentric inclinations, which prevent us from paying attention at the other words, so through them to hear his subject." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The reality of another as a subject, it is not different, though, from the reality of the objects only by not imposing itself as a given thing, but it

104 FERDINAND EBNER, das Wort und die geistigen Realitäten: „Weil das ich und Du immer nur im Verhältnis zueinander existieren, gibt es ebenso wenig ein absolut doloses Ich, als ein ich loses Du zu denken wäre. Das Wort ist des Junige wodurch nicht nur die Existenz, sondern vor allem das Verhältnis beider konstituiert – „gesetzt“ – wird“, p. 19.

105 Die Antinomie von Freiheit und Gnade lösen wir nicht durch einen logischen Gedanken, sondern durch den Hinweis auf das irrationale Geheimnis, das mit der persönlichen Beziehung eines Ich zugigem Du gegeben ist", W. Schmidt, Zeit und Ewigkeit, 1927, p. 384.

106 M. BUBER, Op. c.: "Das einzelne Du muss, nach Ablauf des Beziehungsvorgang, zu einen Es werden. Das einzelne Es kann, dusch Eintritt in den Beziehungsvorgang, zu einen Du werden", p. 42.

107 W. c. p. 204. See also Louis Lavelle, W. c. p. 408. "Mais, seule la résistance d'une autre volonté précisément parce qu'elle met un jeu une activité que je n'exerce pas moi-même, n'est d'une expérience, mais d'une fois".

108 M. BUBER, Op. c.: „Den Menschen, zu dem ich Du sage, erfahre ich nicht. Aber ich stehe in der Beziehung zu ihm. Erst wenn ich daraus trete, erfahre ich ihn wieder. Erfahrung ist Du - Ferne ", p. 16. - „Was erfährt man also vom Du? " - „Eben nichts, Denn man erfährt es nicht". - „ Was weiß man also vom Du?" „ Nur alles. Denn man weiß von ihm nichts Einzelnes mehr ", p. 17.

unveils itself only to them who believes it, but we can say that, in a certain manner, it owes its very existence to the faith of the fellow human.

We understand if we have in our sight that, sometime, when our call for communion remains without an echo, we sink into the darkness of our selfish life. Or, if we do not call someone to communion, he won't wake up in him the true me: or, in the end, if he calls us without any result, we will condemn him to death in loneliness. Somebody must have a great inside support to be able to exist like me, when neither I or another answers his calling to communion. Into the selfishness, in passions, in the loneliness of the failure to communicate itself, the self longs, and descends into an ill existence, like a tortured shadow. Like we unveil and "create" the somebody else's subject through faith, in the same way the subject within us gets born and strengthened through the faith of our fellow human. "The intimacy of my being it may also be stated through another, grace to a act of faith fulfilled in front of me, which concerns the act through which I affirm myself like a liberty and which, in a certain sense, even exceeds it, by strengthening the use that I'm making of freedom, which does not always inspire me the same confidence that I have in the other human being, often letting to me much doubt. So, I am upheld by another one in affirming not only of what I am, but also of what I could and I should do"109.

"It may be possible to say that I feel always the necessity to be upheld into existence by another's judgment and I am sinking into despair or insanity when I no longer have his assistance... To contempt, to ignore somebody, it means wanting to through him into nothingness. But only the another's love, by making me object its of, it can touch into me not only what I'm showing or what I'm doing, but what I am, namely my pure intimacy and my eternal existence"110.

The another's love for me it is not separable by faith, like its basis. On the other hand, the another's love strengthens me only when I believe in him. Through the bond of the faith the subjects grow up. "It is admirable that settling down which makes the faith that I have in the others' existence to be the condition of the testimony which they give me, the testimony that I need for"111.

How much are we living through the other's, and through the attention we pay to them, through the tension, through the outcry about communion, even if not fully accomplished, it is shown us by the fact that, however selfish would our life be, however much absorbed by the selfish passion fulfilling, through everything available to us – even through other's persons – though, the life giving nerve, of ours endeavors, it is the preoccupation by others' opinion, it's the permanent thinking at others, at their praise, at their respect, at their eyes which we believe they are watching us, even though, actually, they aren't. We are living like some actors continuously preoccupied by what will the spectators say, about the way which we mirror in their soul. If a human being had been sure that nobody has followed him with his attention, that man couldn't have lived, and he would have lacked the oxygen. Even when we do not live into communion, we cannot get out from its disfigured and excruciating frame¹¹². Only a full animalism would help us to get out of it completely.

109 LUDOVIC RAVELLE, De L'Acte, p. 100.

110 LUDOVIC RAVELLE, W. c. p. 99.

111 LUDOVIC RAVELLE, W. c.

The whole human society is a web of relations, of partial communion with some of our fellow humans, because of the fact that haven't been tried yet, with others, or by the fact that they have been tried but they have failed or haven't been able to last. Only few of our relations are complete fulfillments of the communion; or maybe none of them.

If the accomplishing of the true human subject is due to the fellow human, on each one will press a heavy responsibility for another. Can I say that I have to always wait for the others' calling to communion, to serving, to love, and only if I'm not answered then I'm guilty for the relapse of that subject in darkness? Have I always to wait for a you to become me? But how can be born that you? - through a you of him, another then me. Then, me too, since I have been awakened through the calling of a you, I have, at my turn, to awake into other the subject whom to be you to me¹¹³." (Stăniloae 1993).

So, the human being is responsible for his fellow human. We have seen that the establishing of the me-you relationship it is accomplished through faith. The one who calls me to communion, he does that through faith, because, even if he does not see, he believes that he can wake up in me a subject capable of communion. If I also believe in him, I will be resurrected and the communion will be established. My possibility to believe it also depends on my endeavor, but it also depends on the faith which the another has in me, it depends on his love from faith. The more powerful, the more resilient his faith will be, the surer is that I will believe and, by believing, I will be resurrected like a me of the communion, like a true me. My fellow human must believe hardly in order to resurrect me, and I, the same, will have to endeavor to believe in him in order to be resurrected and to become a deep believer if I want, at my turn, to save others.

112 W. SCHMIDT said: "Liebe und Hass sind ja überhaupt die tiefsten Triebfeder der Gesichte. Althaus und Hirsch haben nur eine sekundäre Sphäre berührt wenn sie den "Entscheidungscharakter" zum Wesensausdruck des Geschichtlichen machen". Zeit und Ewigkeit, Gütersloh, 1927, p. 386.

113 J. CULLBERG, op. c.: "Meine ich-heit ist aus der Gemeinschaft mit einen Du geboren, dadurch wird es mir möglich, das Du eines anderen ins Leben zu rufen", p. 205.

But this belief with the help of which the another awakens me he cannot take it from himself. To believe in me and to place himself into the hypostasis of being debtor to me, because only that way he can awake me, he has to believe that I was given to him by somebody superior to him, like a duty, like a mission to awake me by serving me and to serve me further. Where is a duty, there is also an obliging one, and this two differ between each other¹¹⁴. The one who indicates me like a duty for my fellow human, He can be felt only like the Supreme Master of both of us. And that is God. The faith which the another has awakened me, it is faith in me, for it is, at the basis, a faith in God. And the faith in the subject of who is awaking me, which takes birth in me from his faith, it has also at its basis the faith in God. The spiritual birth of a man from another, through establishing communion between them, due to his accomplishing of the transmission of faith, which is not only a human's work, but it belongs to God in the first place. And the maintenance of the me in the human being and of the communion with another, it depends on faith and this depends on God. The Revelation's propagation from man to man, it is, in conclusion, the same like the birth of the human me, the same with the continuous establishing of new communion relations." (Stăniloae 1993)

"By and large, the true spiritual birth of the human being it is realized through communion establishing, but this cannot be established but only through the faith on which, one bringing, makes to light up into the other¹¹⁵. But the true faith into the human being fellow, in my duty to wake up him, to save him, I can have only if I believe in God. Only if God is a You from me, the supreme You, I can wake up or I can recognize in every fellow human an You¹¹⁶. If the faith hadn't come through another man, then it would have been missed between people the most profound and intimate bond.

This is the same to say that, through faith and only through faith, it may be produced the true cohesion and brotherhood among people. Only through it

¹¹⁴ J. CULLBERG, w. c.

¹¹⁵ The true faith prolongs itself through love. That's why it is assigned also to love the creation of communion estate. F. Ebner said: "Der Glaube setzt das Ich im Menschen in ein Verhältnis zum Du, die Liebe Verhältnis wirksam", Wort und Liebe, p. 174. "Durch das Wort... ist das Verhältnis des Ichs zum Du" (das Wort und die geistigen Realitäten, p. 21). But "Zum Glaube Wort gehört der Glaube aus Wort. Ihn braucht nicht nur der Hörende, sondern auch der Sprechende" (Wort und Liebe, p. 178).

¹¹⁶ F. EBNER, Wort und Liebe, p. 136: "Die Duhäftigkeit des im Bewusstsein des Menschen nicht nur mit Gott, sondern auch mit den Menschen". The man, earning in his relations with God the certitude that he has inside an eternal value, sees the same value to his fellow human being. T. Steinbüchel (Der Umbruch des Denkens, Regensburg, 1936, p. 122) commenting the mentioned maxim and another one from the p. 146 of F. Ebner, says: „Sie lässt ihn im Du des anderen a in „Ewiges“ zeichnen. Eben wilde das Ich im Gottes ewigen Du seine „geistige Grundlage“ ha, darum auch das Du des anderen, der Mensch ist wie das Ich“.

the people get born, through mutual aid, in spirit, by overcoming the bodily life. And the birth in spirit it means rising at the rank of a personality¹¹⁷. Only in the role of conveyer of faith, the feeling of being responsible it rises to the supreme intensity, knowing that on him it depends not only the life from here, but also the eternal life of his fellow human. But the feeling of responsibility it's the essential condition of the personality and, in the same time, the main element which links man to man." (Stăniloae 1993)

"I have highlighted that not in my exploitation of my fellow human it stays the report of the true communion, of the true validation of the subjects like me-you - but, again, it neither stays into a rejection of his concrete claim for help. I can pretend to my fellow human to ask me only for a platonic understanding, a communion which is missing from both parts the sharing of concrete hardships and the request for help. The man is not somewhere beyond all this, but into them. I will wake up the one who completes my being into my fellow human, if I do not avoid: to wash the wound of his body when he is ill; to help him earning a piece of bread when he is in need; to visit him and walk next to him when he is blasphemed by everybody. Of course, these are not that intimacy of the human being that I want to create, neither this works taken per se are not the ones which wake up his communion subject, but the faith and the love put in them. Therefore, it is necessary that love to be shown in concrete manifestations, in answering the fellow human needs.

The man, though, does not appear to us like an individual totally detached from any bonds with others. He is a part from a society and the hardships, the joys, and all his problems, they are caused by this society, which has in every moment its content of concrete preoccupations. The understanding of the human being, helping him, it must to envisage, at least indirectly, the whole society, with its rules from that time. I see me in the situation to plead for the establishing of some organizing conditions for the collectivity of a given time. Here's how the quality of the propagator of the Revelation into the history compels you to be a history factor. The prophets addressed themselves not only to individual persons, but to the entire society, asking it to leave some mores and shapes which were suffocating the true soul of the human being, and his power to raises up to the light through faith and communion." (Stăniloae 1993)

"But the direct meaning, the primordial one of the divine Word, in His intentionality voluntary obliged towards communion, is doesn't mean that ¹¹⁷ THEODORE STEINBÖCHEL, der Umbruch des Denkens, p. 97: "in der lebendig vollzogenen Beziehung zu seinem Du ist der Mensch erst Persönlichkeit und also das, was er wirklich ist".

He has also the function of the reality discoverer, of its sense, and therefore also the meaning of the Logos. When a person calls us through his word into communion, he unveils us his reality too, one of the realities which really deserves this name, by not being only an illusory construction of our mind. The communion really places us into the bosom of the reality and it unveils us by this its meaning¹¹⁸. The more the reality unveils us and it places us into its core, the more sounds into our ears of the divine Word, the supreme Person Who is also the supreme Reality, in the experience of whom we experience everything that the reality comprises. The communion which we are with the reality in, it makes us thinking at it and this thinking is as true as it detaches less from the reality which we experienced, or we are experiencing it in communion. But, the thinking about the reality, namely about a person, until we are not into communion, if it doesn't have like a result only an illusion or a shadow of the reality, it won't be able to raise ever on its level of complexity and richness. Not the standing alone meaning, the individualistic one, the one monologue like, it corresponds to the truth, but the meaning which interprets the communion, the contact with the reality, that is accomplished through the word which creates communion. The "sense word" is in dependence with the "communion word" and they must continuously remain in this dependence. The reality or the profound truth, a lot more comprehensive, it is something what is discovered on the earth through the entry of God in report with the man. Only into heaven exists from ever, and there exists eternal and uninterrupted - right because God is an eternal - an uninterrupted and consummate communion. Only like a gift from the heavenly communion it is established on earth the reality and the truth. The truth on earth is the Son of God and through Him it is established any truth (Jn.: 14: 6: "I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life")¹¹⁹. Into the communion with Him we have the eternal not exhausted possibility of experiencing the infinite reality. The transposition of this experience in ideas, which can multiply continuously and it can be organized in visions and lights increasingly clear and deeply penetrating, it is explicable through the fact that the common reality and the divine reality, ¹¹⁸ See also M. Heidegger, who shows right that the language comprises a sense and stays connected to the understanding, but there isn't any sense which not to be discovered by the understanding of a person and communicated to other one. Where it is a word there it is mandatory to be a person who utters it. The sense from the word has only the role to establish a connection, an agreement, an understanding between persons. Therefore, it has also a function subordinated to the communion; it is a part from the whole called person of interpersonal relationship. "Rede ist die Artikulation der Verständlichkeit (and the Verständlichkeit it is an existential structure of the human person)... Als konstitutive Momente gehören zu ihr: das Worüber der Rede (des Beredete), das Geredete als solches, die Mitteilung und die Bekundung... Das Hören ist für das Reden konstitutiv... das Hören auf... ist das existentielle Offs ein des Daseins als Miteins", W. c. p. 161 – 163.

¹¹⁹ E. BRUNNER, der Mittler, Tübingen, 1930, p. 187: „The Christian faith is first of all the knowledge of God, therefore the eternal Revelator is like a Son of God, and in the same time Logos”, p. 185: “The knowledge of the real God, the personal one, it can't take place but through the real and personal impartation of God, through the revelation in which He impart us with what ourselves couldn't ever know through any thorough research, through any profound meditation”.

like the supreme reality and like a source of the entire reality in special, it comprises structures, clarities, and ontological, ethical and esthetical rules, and it is not an amorphous entity in which cannot discern any meanings¹²⁰. For this reason, the divine Logos, like a supreme reality which reveals Himself, He is also the source of every idea and meaning of our mind. All the right ideas coming from the human culture are rays from His reality which hardly penetrates through the gloom of the ontological and moral distance, vague revelations of the Logos. "And the light shined in darkness; and the darkness comprehended it not." (Jo: 1: 5). False ideas or false aspects in human ideas are also rays from His reality, but deformed by the spiritual environment which is remote from God. When the full Revelation of the Logos it happens, He comes whole, like a Subject, close to us, and the ones who are imparted with the experience of this closeness they are illuminated, by turn, by the richness of meanings springing out of Him.

The word – when is not much speaking – by being one with the person, it wants to address directly to the person of whose communion it is searching for. And only then it can reach its purpose. This is for, only then, the person who speaks, he stays in report with the spoken person. When I send a word through somebody, the intermediary does not comprise me and he cannot convey me in the same time with my word to the envisaged person. My word has become, somehow, the word of the intermediary. I am but only indirectly present, into a loose connection.

Where was the obstacle that He didn't come to tell us the Word directly, by entering the communion with us? Not at Him, for He is always the intentionality towards communion. The obstacle cannot be but within us. We weren't prepared to receive the Word, to listen to His calling to communion. Even today we hardly accept Him. And the Word does not impose Himself forcedly." (Stăniloae 1993)

"From the state which placed us in the full Revelation, impropriated through faith, we can clearly see what a precious asset is the communion report between man and God, and how abnormal it is the state of the man before having the full Revelation. Only after we believe, we will see our sin from before believing or the one which will remain after we have believed. Before these it is only a vague action, a waiting for something which to save us.

¹²⁰ LOUIS LAVELLE, La conscience de soi, Paris, 1933: « L'intelligence ne peut pas voir la vérité sans que l'âme soit touchée ». P. 29, M. Heidegger considers he sense like a formal skeleton of the personal reality, which reveals itself: "... muss Sinn als das formal-existential Gerüst der Verstehen zugehörigen Ersohlossenheit begriffen werden. Sinn ist eine Existential des Daseins". W. c. p. 151.

But, the dignity, the superior state of reality and the supreme happiness, in the same time, they are not something else to be artificially added to the human being, for it is reckoned like a rebirth of his. It is the restoration of the man on the line of his destiny, elevated to its peak.

The man is therefore into an abnormal state before the rebirth through the Christian faith. We call it "state of nature" just because the subject is not yet born in him. But this state of nature will be weird, and will be unnatural, if we have in our sight the target which the man has been destined to. Besides this, it is ascertained that the man in whom subject of the communion is not born yet, he still isn't in the automatic state of the animals, but into a state of perversions and evil. He consciously impedes the subject's birth of his fellow human's subject and his egotism hasn't any limits. Not only that he does not know about the communion but moreover, he is against it. His will and his conscience – which still are not the real subject, the subject of the communion – they stay against his accomplishing and against that of his fellow human, and they stay against the targets which God pursuits for the man. This hostility being a conscious opposition to God, it has the character of a sin, and not only that of a simple imperfect nature. He does not love God, he does not love its fellow humans, and he stands in the way of the targets which God pursuits for the man, and all of these because he loves himself with an egotistic love, namely with a false love. His mind and his will, by staying under the impulse of a too big love for himself, are weakened and falsely oriented. In all regards he sins against God, and the sin against God it is the abomination of the sinner and of his fellow humans. The turning away from God, towards the self like a center of preoccupations, the getting out from the communion with Him, it automatically brings the man's diving into an obscurity of the mind, into a weakening of the will, into an egotistic and tormenting solitude, into a state of numbness of his subject, into an evil spell which paralyzes his powers, like in a fairy tale, or it demotes him from the state of a man to an animal state. The punishment and the curse are organically comprised into the sin. There exists a supreme order, established not only by will, but based into the tri-personal being of God Himself, whereupon to, the happiness stays into communion, and the lonely egotism it is against the ultimate laws of the reality, and it is an ordeal to the existence. The child, who leaves the parental house and its loving atmosphere, when he is driven by his disobedience, he decays spiritually because of the natural consequence of the things, without to be any longer needed the formal curse of his parents. If one is still speaking about a parental curse, like cause of the decay and of the misfortunes of the son who has gone out from the connections with his parental house, through it will be expressed on one hand the lack of communication state, of the impossibility of the communication, and the pain of the parents for this thing and for the fatality of the sad consequences of which the son will endure, and on the other hand, the fact that the state of lack of communication of the son it means for him depriving the soul's powers which had been continuously received from them, and, even more than a privation, it is a cause of uninterrupted failure and of moral weakening step. If the communion gives powers, if the communion means living according to the laws of the spirit, getting out from community it brings a torment of the being and a gradual exhaustion of powers. All the more accentuated these consequences of the getting out from communion with the godlike Subject are, because the godlike Subject is the absolute source of power and of life.

The restoring of the communion with God and, consequently, of the equilibrium and of the power state of the human being, it cannot be accomplished, however, by himself. Neither will us able to enter the communion with our fellow human if he does not want that - even less with God. On the other hand, there are no longer within man the moral powers which to make him able to raise himself to the state of communion. The man's wish is a weak intermittent flickering, deprived by any force, and deprived of continuity and profoundness.

Just because of his lack of spiritual power, which to make him able for the communion state, it is necessary not only that the communion initiative to start from God, by coming Him firstly into the maximum closeness to the man, but also the man needs to be shaken, through an unveiling of all his wickedness, by his profound guilt. He must understand what condemnable his sin is like, what guilty he made himself like in front of moral order, how seriously he mocked the basic law of spiritual existence: namely the communion's law. Only on this way he will raise the importance of this law in his conscience, and his longing for communion it will be seriously intensified, and he will receive power to get rid of the inertia of a life into the ethic relaxation and disorder. Therefore, it is necessary, for the real restoration of the human being, a reestablishing of the moral prestige of his conscience. The authority of the conscience must grow up in him to become a support to him, on which he can grip with all his strength. Accustomed to despise his conscience - to his bad - he must be awakened by an act of shaking, in order to see all its importance and, related to it, to see all the ignominy which, by disregarding it, he has made himself guilty of. But this doesn't mean else but that the law, which was mocked through his sin, it must get satisfaction, and the sinner suffers a punishment according to the seriousness of his transgression. Put at his place, the man will understand why he wasn't able to offer the necessary satisfaction to moral order and to elevate through his own sufferance out of his decadence, in order to reenter the communion order with God." (Stăniloae 1993)

"We have highlighted that the divine Hypostasis, like the human hypostasis, they consist, mainly, in the intentionality towards communion and, for this reason, they dispose of word, and they even are therefore word, the second divine Hypostasis being Word by excellence, and human hypostasis, word in the image of the divine Logos. The second divine hypostasis, by becoming a human hypostasis, He has not done something else but to bring - in the region accessible to the men - the intentionality towards communion which constitutes His essence, to dress up His intentionality into the human intentionality. And He has done this whereas He has taken the human elements like means of His manifestation.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Any human person actualizes among people an intentionality for communion. But the human person actualizes it in a disfigured and hindered manner, because of his own spiritual and material egotism. God, like man, He has accomplished in the most unobstructed, and undisturbed human person, the intentionality for communion into the human circle, even more so because into the divine plan the Son manifests the spirit of serving, of obligation, into the divine communion too. Therefore, the embodiment itself of the Son of God it constitutes His coming close to people, being a savior deed. His theandric Person is Himself savior reality.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“We feel the power of the claim, our ethical situation in front of a soldier with his arms amputated due to the wounds he received during a war for our defense. One who would manifest his claim over us through a simple pretention over us, he is not touching us. We experience him like a subject, but he does not attract us into communion; we trying to evade, to gain back our position of liberty and, if we can, of supremacy even upon him, so to reduce him to an object.

Only he who does for us, without us to impose it him, so much than he shakes us, he succeeds to attract us into communion. And this is the goal of the claim.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“God, by stepping Himself into arena in order to attract us into communion with Himself, namely to save us, He hasn’t restrained Himself only to the word, like some Protestant theologians believe (Gogarten, Ich glaube an den dreieinigen Gott). The word has not the power to produce a definitive new state, to establish a faith unshaken by the ulterior happenings. Then, the word can produce more respect of fear and, even it vibrates by interest and intimacy, though it can prove a full love and, that is why, it cannot awaken a full love. Only the sacrifice of the speaker it fully confirms the love which he shows through word, only the sacrifice shows him unequivocal as renouncing to himself in order to create a communion and, so, only the sacrifice can awaken the true love in the other and it can attract into communion. The love, the sacrifice, and the communion, they belong together. The one is into another, like the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit.

And the sign that He has actually attracted us into communion, it consists of the fact that He has succeeded to detach us from the joining with the world, from the contemplative–exploiting-the-reality attitude, or even from ourselves. We are giving ourselves to whom has given Himself for us. We arise ourselves in the ethical supreme subordination of the sacrifice. And not only us, but the entire world, which we have submitted in the contemplative–exploiting attitude. Thus, way we escape from sin through the sacrifice of Jesus, who makes to die within us the former man of the egotism, and to be embodied in all of us the ghost of sacrifice.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The good is an interpersonal reality and thanks for it, also. In the same way are the evil and his consequence. To do the good it means not to conform yourself, into an isolated existence, to a law which imposes the good, but to do the good to somebody, to manifest your love towards somebody, to search for the communion of a fellow human, or to remain into that communion. And the satisfaction consequently to the good, it means the returning into your soul of the satisfaction that you have produced into the soul of your fellow human, it is the echo of the resonance that you have awakened into him, it is the joy of the disposition for communion with you, which you have produced in that one. Through good the man searches for communion, the reward is the news that he has found it, it is the answer of the fellow human. Through good you have wanted the awakening of the subject of your fellow human, the reward is the satisfaction produced in you by the signs that this awakening is taking place. Doing of the good is the call you address to another one for communion, the reward is the affirmative response of that one. If you feel a satisfaction for the good done to somebody, even when it has not produced any favorable answer from his part, this is due to the hope that your deed is noticed, if not by the man, at least by God and His approval is your satisfaction.

If you were dominated by the certitude that there is no personal conscience which your deed to produce satisfaction into, a satisfaction which to be directed towards you, the good would not have any power of attraction and it would not make any sense. In this way, the law which the good deed corresponds to, it is nothing else but the law of communion, the law of the relation between me and you. Good is what you do out of love for me, not what you do in conformity with an extra-personal law. This does not mean that the norm of the good is according to the arbitrary of the second person. The norm of the good is according to what raises it to the true communion, to the exit from the egotism. I can do good deeds, which not to be pleasant to my fellow human, now, or never, because he does not understand their value or use for his real benefit. From this point of view, it can be said that the law of the good is above persons. But, because the good is the normal manifestation of the person and it aims the person's accomplishing into the fellow human, and the true person is given only like a pole of communion, it can be said that the norm of the good it coincides to the law of the communion, to what suits you, in your quality as true person. But, in the state of sin which the people are into, none of them is able to want what matches him, none of them can be a precise norm of good. The good orients according the law of the communion, which, even if is what truly suits the true happiness of the persons, it is above their arbitrary. The communion cannot be accomplished according to the arbitrary of two persons, but according to a law. In this way, we understand how God, the One without sin, the One Who meets in a full way the character of a person consummate into communion, He is the norm of the good for all the ones who want to do the good. His satisfaction is the criteria of the good that we have done, His command, it is the criteria of the good which we are going to do. The good, and with it the moral law, are nothing else but the will of God, and this is the voluntarily expression of His tri-personal being. Into good, the God's will meets the indication of His being. The norm of the good has a personal character, but not an arbitrary one, and, in this way, it still is a law. When we are doing the good, we are not accomplishing a impersonal law, but we are providing satisfaction to God, we are producing Him personally "a satisfaction", showing us capable of communion with Him. God has a satisfaction due to the good that we are doing, but not a satisfaction which comes out of an ambition, or out of a vanity, but one of a superior order, because we become worthy of the communion which He wants. It is a joy resembling to the one which is produced us by our child when we saw that he understands us and, by this, he grows up to the capacity of communion with us." (Stăniloae 1993)

"In order to be able to enter the report of communion with God, we must earn His forgiveness. But our capacity to impropriate His forgiveness it is not shown except in the same time with the capacity to endure the punishment like expiation. We will see that, in fact, Jesus is the one Who expiates for us. We only participate, in a secondary way, to His expiation. But we still are capable at least of a mediated, participated expiation. Though, we do not expiate by conforming ourselves to a law which stands by itself, but we expiate with our face towards God, by looking for His face. We are suffering in this case in order to realize the importance of the divine Person Whom we have disregarded. Only in this way we still can make Him grow up in front of us. Only in this way we cut off our egotism which has closed up the horizon towards God. We must give a satisfaction to the divine Person; this is the same with Him growing up in front of us and with our growth at the capacity of communion with Him.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Due to the fact that the heaven is the communion of the souls with God, and this was fully accomplished also to the ones deceased before, only through the coming of God on the ontological human plan through embodiment and in a perfect way through His sacrifice on the cross – in order to be possible to draw out from hell and to move those souls to heaven – Jesus had to go in the appearance of the one Who was crucified to where they were and, through His presence, to place them in this communion, namely to establish the heaven. His sufferance had to present itself, at least like a past thing, but one the most palpable, also in their front. By the fruit of His sacrifice had to enjoy, in the first place, the souls of the ones deceased into faithful waiting for His coming. Also, for these souls remained in heaven, unlike the ones who believe in Christ but they are on earth, their communion must be fuller than the communion of the ones from the earth.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“God did not create the people in order to bury them, row after row, on the basis of an implacable law. This is not a goal of the history. He created them to grow up to the capacity of eternal communication with Him and amongst themselves. The order of the nature and the social order He created only like a ground which the people to grow up on, towards this eternal communion. If they had been raised up towards this destination, the order would have been absorbed into their being, for their being itself pushed on that direction. But, by not accepting to raise up towards communion, there is the danger to fall down also from order, reaching into conflict with the order.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Until all the people enter the full relation of communion with God, the spiritual zone of the Church, on the throne of the world must exist also the governing form of the reality regarded in itself and with a punishing application. This is not used against the loving method of Jesus Christ, but in favor of it; the Father contributes the world to be submitted to the authority of the Son. The physical and state legality must be kept with the force, against the ones who, by refusing the communion, they tend towards disorder. And even in order to ease their eventual ulterior changing of their mind, being given that the bitter experiences gathered through the conflict with the order can be an instrument towards recollection, a pedagogue towards the true teacher, Jesus Christ.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The man has received, through the creation itself, a nature that has light within it, that is united with the nature’s light, which he has a unity with, through his body. This is for the human nature, assumed by Christ and elevated to happiness in union with the godlike nature, it is the nature which the man was given in the beginning; by obeying the divine will, the man in the original state could have reached that eternal happiness. So, in Christ has been restored the true nature of the man. But this light, a light of a created nature, it is only one level which the man can be elevated through, at the light of the uncreated nature, a light the man is communicated with by the Persons of the Holy Trinity and, especially, through the embodied Son of the Father. So, the human nature is created in order to increase the communion with God. But, if the man doesn’t open himself, by his own will, to this light he is given by God through the Son of God – in a non-full manner before embodiment and fully after embodiment – the man won’t remain only in a limited light, but he even falls into a crooked light, by reckoning that the light doesn’t come from beyond the world, but even that it is an immanent law of the nature, which would be the ultimate power and which, actually, it doesn’t give a true meaning to the light and to the man. This shows again the role of the will of God as Creator, and the role of the man a created by God, in the man’s reaching at the true light.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 13-14)

“In the quality of the Son of God as Word, and in the godlike love, which is united with it and proven through all the savior deeds of the embodied, sacrificed, and resurrected Son of God, it is shown also the God’s character as luminous light, a character which the Son affirmed and shown us through everything he did and taught. This is for the Word has, in the first place, this purpose: to show the light, to show the meaning of the things and of the deeds, and also to explain the true meaning of the man’s existence, a meaning that cannot be found out except through the communion of love with the people-loving God. Without words, there is not common elevation of the people towards God. The word lets us understand, just through itself, that it highlights not only the speaking person and the understanding of other persons and of God – the supreme communion of Persons –, but it highlights their mystery too. Within word, there is the light and the mystery.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 38)

“The man is made for eternity. The man aspires to eternity, for absolute, so badly that it offers us the image of somebody who is choking. We want to increasingly love and to be increasingly loved, tending towards the absolute and endless love. And we can find this only in the relation with an infinite and absolute Person. Out of the increasingly profound communion with the absolute Person, are projected within us and all over all the countenances of the world, new and new meanings of the reality, of the beauty, and are opened others and other horizons of the soul, as we understand our meaning within the world and the meaning of our existence on the life into body. If this meaning had ended in death, if the death had definitively ended our existence, the life would have been meaningless. The existence's meaning cannot be crowned except in the unlimited and eternal light of a transcendent life, a life free of any monotony of the repetition and of any relativity. And in order this true meaning to be fulfilled – and our being tends towards this meaning – not only us ascend towards the communion with the supreme Person, but the supreme Person too, descends within us, for the love asks for the movement of each one of the ones who love one another. God gives Himself as gift to the people, through all the things, and the man gives himself as gift to God. This is the faith and the only way the man can be happy in, and it is about not a temporary happiness but it is about an eternal happiness through the communion with God.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 138-139)

“The man isn't content except when being completed by another person, by loving that person and by being loved by that person. Without another person I am spiritually dead. On the communication with another person, it depends my spiritual life. If I do not communicate my thoughts to another, I won't be alive through them. Similarly, if another doesn't communicate his thought to me. My life doesn't consist of ideas, but it consists of the fact that in communicating my ideas I am showing my love for another, and in the communication of his ideas to me I live his love for me. But I won't be able to love another infinitely, neither another will be able to love me infinitely, except if we are united with the Son of God made man. Out of this I receive the power and I know the man's value. But in order us to love one another, we must communicate to each other the thought we have related to a world which inspire us those thoughts. Without another, and without the world to inspire thoughts, to me and to him, my person and his person will be spiritually dead. This is for in the communicated thoughts, I communicate myself to another, and he communicates himself to me.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 151)

“Wanting to achieve a certain union with the enlightened one, God Who enlightens that person has in Himself a certain union out of love. That's why God wants to accomplish amongst the enlightened ones too, a union based on love, they reciprocally communicating to one another what it is communicated them from God.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 193)

“The godlike Ghost, working powerfully, after the resurrection of Christ, from His body, into the ones who believe in Him, He doesn't bring directly or through work, only the Christ's image, but also the Holy Ghost's image.

More precisely, The Holy Ghost elevates us above space in the union with Christ, after He has accomplished this also in the union with the Father. From the communion of Christ as man with the Father, and with us, communion strengthened within us through Christ's sacrifice, we are elevated also to the maximum communion with our fellow humans who are believers. And this will produce a maximum effect in our future life and, especially, after the general resurrection. All the people who believed in Christ during their life on earth, they will have Christ Himself as at the Transfiguration on Tabor, in a perceivable mode, but spiritually, close to them, and they will have, on themselves, close to one another." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 198)

"The resurrected Christ fills all things up with light, for over all things is extended His light, reflected in the ones whom He loves and whom the Son of God entered a direct relation with, as God made man. Now, the Son of God is directly seen by people and all of them rejoice for the communion with Him. But the believers will fully enter this, in the future life. Christ "will come to be extolled into His saints and to be looked at with amazement by all the ones who didn't believe, for our witness towards you it has been believed (II Thess. 1: 10)." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 205)

"The ones leaving this life by believing in Christ, they won't ever get enough of this joy, or of this communion with His direct love." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 205)

"In my responsibility for other human being, it is involved they need for me, and it is implied my need for asking for the help from others. This is what highlights the value of each human being for another, and also the power each human being has from another. Without the answer from other of without being asked for help, by others, one cannot be truly a human being. But I live other not only like those whom I am responsible for, but I live them also as the ones who uphold me in my existence, not only by answering my requests, but even through the importance they grant me through their requests. And at their turn, they live me as equally necessary in both my roles. I am brought to existence through other human beings, other human being take care of me during my childhood, and other human being help me later. I find a purpose and a joy of my existence in helping others, and I myself get spiritually developed by doing that. I help them, and they help me; they help me even making me to help them, and I help them even being helped by them. And we reciprocally help one another not only through deeds, but through word too. They give me the spiritual content of my life, they encourage me in my hardships, they comfort me in my sadness, they show me together-suffering mercy on my pains, they give me joy, and they increase my joy by participating to it. But they too, they find a joy in doing so. The another is my strength, and he is my upholder. But this I am too, for others. There is a mysterious connection between human being and human being. What could be explained like, this strength I feel as coming to me from him, be him however weak in his power, a strength that he feels is too, as coming from me, be I however weak in my power?" (Stăniloae 1995: 100)

"On one hand, I know myself as unique and free, in the relations with other persons, and on the other hand, I do not know myself in this uniqueness and freedom except in relations with others." (Stăniloae 1995: 117)

"Saint Apostle Peter saw, at the Transfiguration of Jesus, the happiness of Peter, James, and John to be steadfastly, not only together with Jesus, but also with Moses and Elijah, who were talking to Jesus Whose face shined like the sun: "Lord, it is good to us to be here; if You want, I will make here three huts: one to You, one to Moses, and one to Elijah" (Mt. 27: 4). Being in consummate communion with the people it is the greatest happiness. But this isn't separated from the communion with God. On one hand, each one has his own hut, namely he remains non-confounded to others. Because, how could he otherwise feel the happiness that he is with another and with God?" (Stăniloae 1995: 134)

"The person, no matter how desired, after encountered, he doesn't give the whole happiness to the ones who has been longing for him. Tending towards the unlimited happiness, the human being shows that he tends towards the absolute Person Who has within Himself, from ever, the consummate communion with other Two Person, and Who can make the human being as partaker to that communion. It remains within us, after encountering any desired person, always a longing for a full happiness, a happiness that cannot be brought except by the impassable encounter with the Person Who can shows us an eternally all-satisfying love, for He has this love within Himself, just through the communion, from ever, with other Two absolute Persons. That's why we speak in the Romanian language about an "unquenchable longing", an expression that shows the human being as tending, by his nature, towards the Person loving perfectly Who can truly satisfy the unsatisfied human being's thirst for happiness. Saint Maximos the Confessor said: "The One Who wisely has brought to existence the whole nature, and Who hiddenly seeded in each rational being, as first power, the power of knowing Him, He has given us too, the humble human being, as all-generous Master, by nature, the longing for Him, and He has intertwined this into our rationality's power, in order us to easily know the modes for satisfying our longing, lest, by mistaking, not to reach what we strive to reach. So, by moving us accordingly to this longing, around the Truth Himself, and around the Wisdom and the Governing shown to everybody as well organized, we are helped by this to strive ourselves to reach at That One Whom we have received our longing for.” (Stăniloae 1995: 135-136)

“The past can be alive to us, in the present moment, as power which we start a better future through, or a future which it will be repaired in, what impedes our advancing towards the eternal happiness. Thus, not only the past determined the future, but also the future changes the past, to the ones who are convinced that they advance towards eternity, in which the ones from the past and the ones who will live in the future, they will encounter one another. The past becomes thus, alive and possible to be corrected, by us, on each moment, as means which we transcend through, towards the consummate communion amongst ourselves, in union with the Holy Trinity. In this mode we can repair our past. We no longer have in a bodily manner, the ones whom we wronged to, but we still have others whom we can do good deeds to. And by this we gladden God and the ones whom we wronged to in the past, for they see in our regret for the evil deeds we did them, the fact that we feel the need for doing good deeds to others, and thus we direct ourselves towards ourselves, because of them too. Thus, while the generations from the beginning of the history only determine the future, the generations living towards the end of the history they can repair the traces of the past too, and by that they can influence the future towards good. And thus, the generations from all times they can help on one another to advance towards eternity and towards the communion amongst them.” (Stăniloae 1995: 138)

“The past will live within us as a pressing presence on the present moments, only if we wait an eternal future by repairing our past. Otherwise, we no longer live with a vibrant interest either the present moment, or the past, or the future, but we lock up in the passing pleasure of the present, both the past and the future, and thus we are getting closer to animal condition. Only by feeling ourselves as advancing towards eternity, we live again, on the present moment, the past as foundation for a better future, by modifying the past’s consequences within us. Only thus the human being will live within himself the open time of the eternity. Only thus, the human being wants to take with himself, in eternity, his own being as cleaner in relation with his fellow human and with the cosmos. We won’t be able to advance towards the Kingdom of Heavens, that is a life in full communion, if we live as isolated persons, careless to others, but only if we prepare ourselves for that Kingdom of the Communion, through our effort towards an as accentuated as possible communion during time, or towards repairing everything that has weakened within us our capacity to communicate.” (Stăniloae 1995: 139)

“The human being can descend in the depths of his own person, and in the depths of others’ persons in his relation with them, for he is connected, in his aspiration, with the Person-Absolute. As the human being deepens into himself, he feels increasingly united with the Absolute, increasingly penetrated by Him, without being confounded to Him, and vice versa, as he feels himself more united with another in communication, he increasingly intensely lives his own self. This is for only in the joy of the communion, each person lives, intensely and in the impulse of communicative expansion, his own self; or, only together with another’s self, somebody lives his own self more fully and more richly.” (Stăniloae 1995: 144)

“The human being is called to the work of transfiguration through God, not only of his body, but also of the entire material universe, a work the human being accomplished increasingly more as he is in an ever-tighter collaboration with others, in communion. Through his spirit, the human being mediates also a more efficient presence of God within universe, based on the fact that this presence of God “objectively” (really) exists within the human being, and within universe, and it connects the human being with the universe, objectively, before the human being activity intensifies it and makes it obvious.” (Stăniloae 1995: 144)

“The communitarian human being, or his quality as member of the human community, it is founded on his dependence on the Trinity of Persons of the godlike Being Who is the source of the whole life and work in communion. The people wouldn’t have felt themselves in union with one another, if their being hadn’t depended on the supreme communion of God-Person. The human being wouldn’t have felt his unconditional duty to answer the request of his fellow human, through deeds and words, neither would him felt the need for others to answer him, if he hadn’t had in his being the seal of the relation amongst the Persons of the Holy Trinity. The human being wouldn’t have felt the need for asking for the help and for the advice of his fellow humans, neither to offer his help and advice to others, if he hadn’t felt himself in union with them, in the likeness of the communion of the supreme Persons. The insufficiency of the existence in isolation, but also a certain insufficiency of the communion amongst the human person, it urged the human person to ask for the fulfillment of the communion he is in, from the consummate communion of the Holy Trinity.” (Stăniloae 1995: 158)

“The human being is in a clearer relation with God, through God’s Revelation and through human being’s prayer, due to God’s character as Tri-Person. This is God encountered by the human being when praying, and this is the God Who accomplishes the man. But these things do not get the man off the relation with his fellow humans, but they strengthen the human being in that relation. Like the human being deciphers the word of God in the created nature, in collaboration with his fellow humans, likewise he hears the word of God which the human being asks for, even clearer, through other people, especially through prophets, and fully from the Son of God made man. And like he asks for help and for teaching from people, for he feels himself urged to that because of his insufficiency and by the connection that had placed others, in the creative communion, above him, likewise the human being asks for the help from God and for His teaching, through others, and urged by others, and in communion with others. In the teaching and in the help provided to the human being in his natural life, though seemingly there are in the foreplan the people, the human being often feels God too, as talking to him, and as working beyond the people, through the people; in the revealed teaching and in prayer, God appears to the man in forefront, not by getting the man off the relation with the people, but through a greater transparency, by asking the human being to strengthen the communion with his fellow humans into Him, as a necessary condition in order the human being to advance in seeing and in feeling God.” (Stăniloae 1995: 158)

“The human itself was created capable of being and of becoming increasingly transparent to the Person-Absolute. The human being was created capable of obeying the God’s word, of understanding it and of answering it, and even needing to ask for God’s word and of fulfilling what the God in Trinity tells him, through another human being. The human being is an organ whom God communicated His word through, to others. This is for each human being is not only one in being, with another, but he also differs from another as person, whom he can communicate with and whom he can receive the word from, and whom, by this, it fulfills the function of being mediator of God Who is actually the One Who speaks through him. But the man is not satisfied with what the universe and his fellow humans give him. The human being needs the absolute communion as person. The human being cannot stop on any knowledge level or on any level of his communion with his fellow humans. This is for he constantly needs to ascend on a superior level. The human being feels the existence of the Absolute also in the form of his helplessness to stop himself on certain level in his communication with others. This is for each human being arises him a thirst for a higher level, not being him able to stop except at the communication with the God in Trinity. The human being stays in this form in permanent potential connection with the Absolute. The Absolute shows Himself, to the human being, in this form, as One in Trinity, ceaselessly attracting the human being an on ever-higher levels. This is for the man feels the need for ever-higher ascending as communitarian person, not getting out from the quality of person desiring an ever-fuller communion. The human being cannot ascend towards an ever-higher fullness, towards the fullness received from Absolute, except as person in communion towards another person, in ever-deeper communion. The levels of the perfection, reached through calling and effort, they belong to the persons and are towards other persons, they being in communion, and they aren't of an essence towards essence. And the top of this cannot be except the Person Who is in the supreme community as persons. The life's perfection is one seen as the peak of a climbing, a peak that isn't the same with an essence. This is for the true life keeps the conscience, which is characteristic to a person, in communion with another distinct person living the community from ever." (Stăniloae 1995: 158-159)

"Only an absolute peak, as Person, of the consummation in communion, He can help and He can give a meaning to the ascension, towards Him, of other persons, through the calling and through the guiding communicated by Him in the form of the word, a word answered by the human being through prayer, and in deeds of continual improvement, helped by the power of the All-Good God, namely as God of the consummate communion." (Stăniloae 1995: 159)

"One can say that, in his aspiration towards the absolute Good Who is supreme interpersonal communion consummate in love, the human being can reach on ever-higher levels, but, despite all these, the human being couldn't ever be identified to God, and God remains forever a mystery to the man, but a Mystery Whom evermore light irradiated from, and evermore love and life lived by the human being and evermore meaning. God Himself, in His quality as Supreme Kindness lived in a communion of Persons, He descends towards the ones who ascend towards Him, for their desire to reach evermore good, and He makes them increasingly more feeling His kindness and, by that, they feel increasingly more His character as Person or the interpersonal communion with Him. This is for the kindness is characteristic to the person, or to the communion amongst persons and, as such, we live it too in dialogue with Him, and He attracts us evermore. But he still remains in His being as differing from the human being." (Stăniloae 1995: 180)

"Firstly, the human being is provided with a new existence, through the birth anew, in the likeness of Christ as man, through the Holy Ghost Who makes the human being who has become rigid in his egotism, again capable of communication with the Persons of the Holy trinity and with his fellow humans. It is a fact shown through the sinking into water, symbol and organ of the Holy Ghost, incorporating the named person, in a non-confounded manner, to the communion of non-confounded persons of the Church, all of them in communion with the Holy Trinity, through Christ.” (Stăniloae 1995: 203)

“The man makes his road towards infinity by continuously transcending, vertical and horizontal. By this the man gets to know his road towards God, towards people, and towards the world, for he wants to comprise everything, like God does. Transcending towards people means also a convergence with them, because the man won’t be able to comprised his fellow human’s things if they do not give him those things as gifts. All the people are enriched through God and through one another. This progress isn’t according to the body, but it is according to the soul. This progress can advance endlessly only for it is according to the soul. The man doesn’t extend himself only by taking, but also by giving. The more the man gives, the more he opens himself for receiving, and the more the others are opened to him in order to give him their share.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 14-15)

“By the fact that God has brought us, after our falling into death, His life, in the direct communication through the humanity assumed by His Son, we receive it in the easiest mode, by accepting the communion with Him, and also by the fact that His Son and Word prepared this descent into humanity through the Revelation given to people of Israel, and finally, by the fact that, by and large, even within the people who are dead in their souls, there has remained a certain connection with God-Person, and there has remained within them a certain thirst for their immortality as persons, in a more or less accentuated degree, it results another conclusion too: namely, that just by his nature, the man can find God-the Word, in himself and in his fellow humans, especially when he forces himself to live his humanity on a higher level. And this means that Christ, as union of the Son of God with the humanity, on a moment of the history, he is inscribed as virtuality just within our nature. The fact that only through the humanity assumed in His Hypostasis, the Son of God makes Himself nigh and communicable to us, at maximum, it means that His humanity is the most corresponding environment, which God communicates Himself with us through, or that God has made the humanity as the most communicable mode and organ, of His, with the people, the people having Christ virtually within them. This means that the whole humanity needs Christ, or that within humanity is inscribed Christ, in a prefigured manner. This shows that not only God prepared and initiated the embodiment of His Son as man, but also the humanity desired that embodiment and, into the Mother of the Lord, the humanity welcomes this will of God. But this showed also a certain connection with Christ, of the people from before the embodiment of the Son of God, or of the people from after embodiment, but who remained outside the faith in Him.

“But this will be shown within people only if they do not remain sunk into the world as in a unique reality, namely only if they live a certain transcendence towards the God-Person, through all the world’s things. Then the people will discover the death as something abnormal, and not as a natural merging into an impersonal being.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 29-30)

“The man reckons himself in no regard, as long as he lives, as ever reaching the end of his movement, namely the end of his forming and fullness. By and large, the man isn’t accomplished only through the contact with the things, which he realizes about, that they cannot satisfy him except superficially and in a passing manner. The man is accomplished to a greater extent, through the communication with other persons. Knowing and experiencing human persons it is especially endless, for the more and the intimate the man knows other persons, the more he wants to know them. This is for the man never finishes enriching his life out of this communication with other persons, with the help of which he increases more and more in knowing and in understanding the things. The man’s thirst for eternity and his hope for the possibility of satisfying that thirst, are upheld within man by this communication too, with his fellow humans.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 34-35)

“The human being wants to know or to comprise all the things in his conscience, for he can, through all of them, to easily reach his Creator and the all-things’ Upholder. “Being a person means participating to all the existing things”. This is for each man is a source wanting to be projected within him the rays of all things, but also the light of The One Who is above all things. The man must gather, somehow, all the things, and he must unite as many persons as possible, not only for seeing everything and everybody in their unity, but also in order to see, through all the things and through all the people, the One Who is above everything and above everybody. In real exceeding everything and everybody, the human being found not only on himself as person superior to them, but he tends towards the absolute Person, as he tends towards his fellow human too. The person’s continuous transcendence it is, as well, a real transcendence, which completed his transcendence towards the world and towards himself, and this is for when transcending towards his fellow human, the person ascertains that, on one hand, he reaches their real inward, but on the other hand, they still remain non-comprised by him, as well as his own self, and in the same time he sees them as thirsty for the One Who really is non-comprised by them and by him. And again, on the other hand, in his union with them and in everybody’s union in the non-comprised One, he seen also himself as unconfounded to them and to the supreme Person. And his joy consists just of that he is in union with everybody and he comprises all the things in his communion with other but without being him confounded to them. And he feels himself free in this communion and he can advance endlessly in it. He also feels free in the communion he has, without ever to be satisfied, with God, when he sees God within them and when he communicates, through them, with God Whom he also remains unconfounded to. Each one wants to have, increasingly more, the another's way of understanding all the things, or he wants to have united with him, in understanding the things, the another. But this happens when one wants to fully give himself, as a gift, to another. By this he receives the full self-giving, as a gift, of the another. This is for then, each of them sees the another as extended with his being in the infinite God. But because no one ever ceases to advance in self-giving, while having God within, no one could ever give himself, as gift, totally. This is a reason for joy increasing into eternity." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 36)

"The human being can direct this thirst for absolute and for godhead, of his, either towards himself, through and endless pride. This is an illusory transcendence, lacking the convergence or the communion. But the human being's thirst can be like endless because it is upheld by the human being's illusion that he is or that he becomes God by himself. This thirst is together with the contrary of the communion, and it stays with the struggle of everyone against all the others, or with the struggle of some groups against other groups." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 38-39)

"Only through convergence it increases in everybody the real life in fullness, or the life ceaselessly increases in meaning. By this increases in God-the Word Who is the hypostatical Rationality of God. The meaning is one with the life and the life is one with the loving communication amongst persons, a communication having at its peak and as source the communication amongst the Persons of the Holy Trinity. This communication is accomplished by people through experience, by transcending, and through endless convergence. This communication is one with the life in increasing joy. Only the Word or the divine hypostatical Rationality, the source of the supreme communicability, it can bring us, thus, to the salvation, or to escaping the meaninglessness of the eternal death - namely the locking-up in the poverty of the egotism." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 39)

"The highest level of seeing God through man, we accomplish it in Christ; likewise, the highest level of the communication with us as God, and with God-the Father through humanity, it is accomplished in Christ. Christ gives us the highest strength for communicating with our fellow humans and with God. Christ understands us more than anybody else, and that's why he has the greatest mercy on us. He gives Himself to us, to everybody who wants

Him, as a “bread” of life, and He helps us too, to enter this impulse of reciprocally giving ourselves as gifts.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 49)

“The non-confounding, but also the reciprocal enrichment of the human persons, are due to the difference between persons despite the whole intimacy accomplished amongst them. The human persons differ to such extent, that one never reaches to live the pain or the joy of another person as that one lives them himself. But just the fact that another lives my joys and my pains differently from how I do, it increases my joy and it diminishes my pain and, by and large, it increases my life. Each one participates to the spiritual life of another, but he lives that one’s spiritual in his own mode. In this it is also shown the reciprocal commitment. I sometimes suffer for another more than he suffers from himself, just because through his face he gives birth within me to a bigger sufferance than the one he actually endures. And this brings him a great comforting. We still understand the another as man like us, for, though we don’t live his life as himself does, we live in common with him, his life, in a double manner. Only thus we are spiritually enriched and strengthened in the relation with each other, but without being confounded to one another. The thirst for this endless enrichment and strengthening, it upholds out desire of knowing all the people and of reaching the maximum communication with everybody, in God.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 49)

“We are made as immortal beings, for in the present life we cannot reach to communicate with everybody, neither we can reach the end of the communication with a single person. The consummate communication with everybody it will be one in the Kingdom of Heavens. All of us will be transparent to everybody; each one’s life will be filled up with everybody’s life. Then we will have, each of us, the whole life we can receive as human beings, from God, through everybody. Each one of us will bear within himself, in his mode, the everybody’s life and, through them, he will bear Christ.” Each one participates to the spiritual life of another, but he lives that one’s spiritual in his own mode. In this it is also shown the reciprocal commitment. I sometimes suffer for another more than he suffers from himself, right because through his face he gives birth within me to a bigger sufferance than the one he actually endures. And this brings him a great comforting. We still understand the another as man like us for, though we don’t live his life as himself does, we live in common with his, his life, in a double manner. Only thus we are spiritually enriched and strengthened in the relation with each other, but without being confounded to one another. The thirst for this endless enrichment and strengthening, it upholds out desire of knowing all the people and of reaching the maximum communication with everybody, in God.

The human nature will actualize then, through the human persons, all its resources of internal love, out of the love coming to it from the godlike Being Who lives His love in the Persons of the Holy Trinity.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 49-50)

“By eternally remaining, I and him, as unique, he needs me, in order him to be strengthened and enriched, in order him not to be in the sadness of the loneliness, and I need him too, for the same reasons.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 50)

“We need to talk to one another in order to confess out attention for each other, in order us to be enriched and strengthened through the life-giver attention of another. The dialogue is the means for communicating the life from one to another, but without they to be confounded. I talk to somebody else, for I crave for being listened by somebody; I need somebody to talk to me, in order I to see that he needs me. Not only by talking to me, the another gives himself to me as life, but he also does that by listening to me. In speaking, each human person transcends on himself, and the dialogue partners transcends on themselves, together, towards the One Who seeded within them the need for transcending, on themselves, by talking to one another. They speak for they are made to thing to one another, and to speak to one another, and to thing together at the Person-Absolute and to answer His speaking to them. They speak to one another for they are made to communicate the life they have out of the common source of the Creator.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 50)

“Needing another in order to know himself the human being lives the another as a mystery, like himself is. I know, on one hand, that the another’s mystery if like mine, but, on the other hand, it still remains a more unknown mystery than mine, for I do not live it as mine, and for it though differs from mine. But without living his mystery I do not live myself. Without knowing myself as mystery I do not know him as mystery, and vice versa. I always find out something more about him and I experience him as a mystery. I always live in him a reality differing from me, but in communication with me. We communicate ourselves to one another but we still remain incommunicable. This is a new unity of the contrasts. In this we together experience our incommunicable fund, or, both the unity of being and the difference as persons.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 50)

“By surrendering myself to another, I still remain myself and non-confoundable; and the another remains likewise. The more he surrenders to me, the more I feel him as present within me, as differing from me. I cannot dispose of him, neither of myself. But we can surrender ourselves, as sacrifice, willingly, to one another. And I cannot be whole without a communication with him, without him wholly surrendering himself to me, and I to him. Our words show us as two (or several), for they are means for communication amongst us, but the words keep us as distinct and as necessary to one another, it our distinction and just because of our distinction. We are unable to communicate our own mystery to another, only by using the words, though the words are to us as means for communicating our mysteries as facts. We uphold our life through reciprocal communication and we still remain as contents of incommunicable mysteries. We continuously uphold our lives by continually communicating our mysteries, by the fact that we do not exhaust ourselves in what we communicate. This always keeps alive our desire for receiving increasingly more out of another, through his communication. We feel ourselves as of-the-same-being, but still as non-confoundable. The another remains to me, just by his will to communicate himself to me increasingly more, a wall which I cannot cross over. This shows that I haven't produced the another's person, neither he has produced on himself, and so, neither can we abolish on ourselves in what we have as differing from our bodies. Neither the parents produce the child's person, nor they can do that through education, as totally belonging to them. This shows that each person is brought to existence by a supreme Creator of persons, as mysteries, having in Himself as supreme mystery the virtuality of all the unique persons. The: "birth" out of parents, it is added to the "creation" by God. That's why the parents cannot cross over this product "created" by God. (Stăniloae 1995 I: 51)

"Heribert Mühlen draw out of the fact of the helplessness of overlooking the another's person, the personological argument of the existence of God and he saw the one's "holiness" in our helplessness of understanding him, for he saw in that the presence of God in the another. We live in another both out limit – and therefore his person's not-coming out of us – and the openness of a horizon beyond his person, who is limited at his turn. The more intimate we live another as mystery, but still as a depending mystery, the more we live God, and vice versa. We live in this a new deed for endless transcendence." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 51)

"Just in the inexhaustible mystery and, in the same time, not fully satisfying for me, of the another, I live God Who, on one hand, He upholds the another, and on the other hand He exceeds him. And I cannot make vanish the another's mystery through any closeness of mine, to him. The more I get closer to a person, through love, the more I am bewildered and overwhelmed by that person's mystery. Besides, this happens to my mystery too. The more I deepen myself in meditating upon myself, the more I become less understood to myself. The deeper I live myself, the more I realize the helplessness to comprise myself, to understand myself. Although, I cannot satisfy myself either with myself or with the another, and the more we get closer to one another, the more we need our closeness and our self-exceeding, in order to find God, and vice versa. The more we understand on one another, we are willed up with the helplessness of adequately thinking and speaking about God, though we feel Him increasingly more in this closeness of ours. The more we see each other as limited, the more we feel ourselves as destined to the union with the Person-Absolute.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 52)

“The another is both border and bosom to me, who receives me and over whom I cannot cross without damaging myself too. But by what I transcend to myself through, I get out of my seemed infinity, which is rather a prison to me, and I am received in another true reality, which I cannot annex to me in the another’s reality. I live his true reality just in the fact that I need to be received by him, in order I to transcend to myself. I cannot cross the border of his being without his approval. And once he opens himself to me, I discover him as another infinity besides mine. Or, only through his infinity my infinity is open like a living infinity, or I live my infinity only by communicating it to another. If there isn’t somebody who opens himself to me, I will remain in the seemed infinity of my spiritual poverty. But when there is a true reciprocal oneness, we transcend on ourselves, together, towards the absolute Infinite, by living ourselves, on one hand, each of us and reciprocally, the insufficiency of our existence, and on the other hand, by living our transparency to the absolute Infinite. In this sense, the ones reaching “in the Abraham’s bosom”, they live within him or through him in God’s bosom.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 52)

“The fact of being you and him to others, it doesn’t place me in a situation inferior to the ones who reckon themselves as I in relation with me, but only this shows that I am important to them. I feel myself as depending on another, but I feel him too, as needing the relation with me. But I won’t be able to give him the whole power, if I myself expect power from him. Neither he can give me the whole power I am expecting from him. Each one is transparent to a supreme You from Whom he really can hope for the whole power for himself and for another, and Whom he must answer to, for himself and for others, with the whole his being.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 67)

“The human being gets discouraged to death in the sphere of his relations with others. The human being suffers a killing loneliness in not being a you and a him for others, in not needed by them. But the human being deceives on himself too, because of not receiving from those ones the whole power he is expecting. This shows that, in principle, only by being a you to an unlimited Me Who has infinite life, infinite power, and infinite attention to me, I also can have the endless life which I am thirsty for. If I joyfully live the attention of another, who is you or him, to me, I will feel the value covered by them, namely their value for me. But this is a value which I cannot define, because I cannot define what this you or him are to me, and what I am to them. Although we do not know each other to the final extent, we still have in one another a support. This is as greater support as each one of us are non-comprisable. But we feel, in the same time, our insufficiency for one another. And that makes us thinking at the fact that there is a truly infinite Me in Who we put the whole our hope for life. Only from a supreme existence having the form of a Me full of attention for me, I can receive the whole help I need. We are used to search for knowing something, by separating that something from something else. But in the real knowledge and self-enrichment, the human being cannot advance except in relation with others. The one who doesn't love others, he doesn't have the possibility of saying something always new, neither about himself, as in case of his own self being revealed as stimulated and strengthened by powers and understandings from other persons, and by their important to the own self. That's why, the unquenchable thirst of the human being for knowing himself and for filling himself up with life in his undefined mystery, it cannot be upheld except by the relation with a really infinite You. Without any doubt, this doesn't mean that his person will merge with That One, as neither it happens in my relations with other persons. But, if only in union with them my hidden virtuality can be actualized, then only in union with the Person-Absolute my virtuality will be actualized at maximum, or my virtuality can advance eternally in this actualization." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 67-68)

"The name I bear isn't for me, as singular being, but it indicates my relation or my connection with others, and the names of others indicate their relation with me, in their distinction. My name is joy or longing for others, while others' names is joy or longing to me. I am and I remain imprinted in myself, as long as I, and as long as they, all of us exist on earth, as sign that I won't definitively disappear from existence, to them, neither they to me, forever. We are forever connected to one another and each of us is imprinted in the spiritual being of the others.

"Through name it is maintained in memory the own value and the own uniqueness of each person, and the name makes that person to mean something unique to all the ones who have known him, as one occupying an irreplaceable part of the spiritual life of everybody." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 69)

"Through name we keep on one another in a mysterious, affective, impossible to undone connection. This is for the name is a projection of the distinct person, of the one who bears that name, within the one who utters that name. And in not forgetting the person and his name it is manifested the need and the possibility of remaining with one another, endlessly, in a connection that upholds the live, or it is shown the sentiment, seeded within our nature, that we will exist eternally, and not as singular beings, but together with all the persons we have known, without any of them to be lost in an impersonal essence.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 69)

“If through the pronoun me I can cogitate, for a moment, that I am alone with myself, I do not bear my name, at all, only for myself in isolation, but my name shows me as being, to others, a person in communion. Through name, neither am I lost as distinct person, nor I am indicated as a lonely entity. The name indicates the elation with one another as unique persons, but not only as a simple memorial, formal, or statistical relation, but as an affective and ontological relation. Through name, I can be praised or I can be detested and mocked. By remembering somebody’s name, I send my love to that one, namely I send him a power, but I also can send him my mockery, namely a weakening. By remembering his name, I show in both cases, that I am connected to the person who bears that name. By remembering the names of the deceased ones, the Church sends them power of life, helping them to escape the loneliness’s torment.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 69)

“The Son and the Word of God, the Hypostasis of the supreme affectivity and rationality, He enter the communion as from man to man, namely an interhuman relation, by fully humanizing on Himself, but through deification. He unveils us the endless depths of our human brother, when he is in communication with God, for this brother unveils us God, in himself. Due to Christ, we are placed in an actual or in a virtual connection with the Son of God, through our nature itself, and that is a connection one can endlessly actualize and experience it. The human no longer is locked up in himself, either as individual or as species. The human’s quality as creature of God, it is elevated to the quality as brother of the One Begotten Son of God Who places us in relation with the Person of the Holy Trinity. This is for the assuming of the human nature into the divine hypostasis, it brings Him on the level of the human hypostasis or Person, in communion with the people, and it elevates us to the communion with the Person of the Holy Trinity. The Creator, by assuming the human nature as nature of His hypostasis, tightly united with the divine nature, He shows Himself as having the capacity of making, on Himself, hypostasis of the human nature, and He shown the human nature as having the capacity of being made as nature of His.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 72)

“The supreme forum hasn’t given only me into my care, but the supreme forum has given me - in my care - the other people too, they requiring me through themselves, or through Him. I am tied to my fellow human through the supreme forum, or, through my fellow human I am tied to the supreme forum.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 78)

“In my awareness about myself, and in my responsibility for me, it is involved, thus, my responsibility for my fellow human, in front of the supreme forum. This forum unites me with my fellow human through the authority the supreme forum exercises upon me, in the favor of my fellow human, by requiring me through my fellow human, through His care for us in common. The supreme forum stretches out and deepens by this His light within us and amongst us, through the request He addresses me through my fellow human, and through my responsibility for that fellow human He awakes to me through that request. If the man hadn’t lived the responsibility for himself, he wouldn’t have lived either the responsibility for others. But vice versa too. I am responsible for my quality as human being responsible for others. But my fellow human cannot be the forum who to maintain within me the absolute responsibility for him, since he needs me. Neither I can impose my responsibility for myself and for another, neither can somebody else impose it to me, as the last forum, my responsibility for him or for myself. Even in the responsibility for myself, in the responsible doubling that I live, it is shown that I cannot live this responsible doubling except by living, through my conscience, in front of God. And even the fact that I am responsible for my own self, it shows that I haven’t given to me my own self. I see God through my own self. And the fact that I am accountable for other it shows that God hasn’t given to me only on myself, but the others too are given to me by God, and God asks me to take care of them. The supreme forum has given each human being, through creation, in his own care, and in the care of the other too, reciprocally. But the fact that this responsibility is a responsibility in front of Him, it shows that the human being cannot, by his exclusive care, to achieve his and others’ salvation. The human being must manifest, even in fulfilling his responsibility, the whole his humbleness.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 78-79)

“The manifestation of the freedom, tied to the fulfillment of the responsibility, it thus creates the communion between God and the human being, or amongst people, communion that, on one hand, it provides them joy, and on the other hand, a communion that makes the ones who advance within it, or who have accomplished it, to feel themselves as equally free, or to show to one another the respect for their freedom. The manifestation of the freedom, related to the fulfillment of their reciprocal responsibility, it creates in the One Whom a responsibility is being fulfilled towards, and in whom a certain responsibility is being fulfilled for, a narrower love in freedom, determining him to do likewise.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 82)

“What can be explained like, the positive report of the time with The Eternal Trinitarian God? Because the question raised is: What can create like, The Eternal Trinitarian God, to the time and to uphold the time as road towards the advancing of each one of us, in connection with other human persons, towards Him? One can guess the answer to this question immediately that the Supreme Person’s eternity, better said the eternity of the supreme communion of Persons, it isn’t cogitated as amorphous, unconscious, lacking the freedom, and of inferior relation eternity. Of course, such an existence can too, to open Itself to the relation with the temporal person who is called to an increasingly accentuated communion with other persons like him/her, and also to the supreme and consummate communion as persons. The supreme communion of Persons creates and upholds in advancing towards the consummation of the relation in communion with Itself, and with persons who are in Its likeness, also person who lack Its plenitude. It would have been unnatural if the supreme communion of Person had created only existence submitted to a monotonous repetition, without they having the possibility to advance towards the goal of a as full as possible, and eternal communion with persons alike him/her, and with the Person form above him/her. The possibility of connection between the supreme and eternal communion of Persons, and the temporal communion of persons, it is given in the fact that both communions are open, consciously, to the good, the first one descending, for concretizing the good, towards persons made to aspire towards growing up in the communion’s good, while the communion amongst human persons is capable to ascend towards the good of the supreme communion. The persons’ conscience is, through itself, keen to open itself to other consciences, towards entering the communion with those persons, and this is one with the good.” (Stăniloae 1995: 43)

“The kindness wants to open itself by descending towards inferior existences. The greater the kindness is, the fuller is both the communion on equal plan and the will for conveying the kindness to some inferior consciences too, namely to consciences which are so inferior to the supreme Kindness that He creates them out of nothing.” (Stăniloae 1995: 43)

“The words’ unity in a common language shows the people’s unity amongst themselves and with the cosmos, as also the unity of the human being in himself/herself. All the things are united in cosmos, but they are united in a variable unity deciphered by people and shaped in a various mode by each human being and by all people in common.” (Stăniloae 1995: 48)

“God is the human being’s Prototype, the human being having in himself/herself the words which express him/her and all the things which he/her stays in connection with, words coming also out of the supreme Word. The creator and upholder Word has in Himself the words or the rationalities of all the things, of some of them as subjects of words, of the others as contents of words, differing from the content of the persons subjects of the words, but destined to become theirs. But in all the things created and upheld as words concretized by another being, it is reflected the eternal communion of the supreme Word, with the supreme Person of the Father, and with the supreme Person of the Holy Ghost, reflected in the special communion through words, amongst people.” (Stăniloae 1995: 49)

“God creates the world and the time, and God remains in connection with the world by His will, for a dialogue with the conscious beings, who He wants to lead to the full communion with Himself. On this purpose, the world has been made for the man to can use it in his growing up in the communion with God. The world has been created for the man. The world has been developed by the guiding exercised by God upon the world’s component energies, until, through a special work of God (‘the hand of God’), it has been formed the biological organism in which appeared through the ‘breath’ of God the rational soul in the image of God, capable of dialoguing with God, and with the aspiration towards an increasingly deeper communion with God, the man being provisioned on this purpose from the beginning with the grace of God, or placed in relation with God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 349)

“If God has created all the things in order to be imparted with His love, their purpose is to reach a full participation to this love, namely to a full communion with God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 352)

“The communion requires the partners to have something that approaches them, in order to help them to get along with each other. Because it is from God that power that makes the man capable of communion, not being but His love itself, it can be said about Him that, whereas the man is created, there is an abyssal difference between him and God, though the man is in His image, but the love overwhelms this difference, by making the man, like Maximos the Confessors said: God by grace¹²¹. But if it is possible to hooking in to the man the power of the divine love, he will have to have, through the Creation itself, something in him which to be hooked. There is into man, in other words, the capacity to receive the love, through which to respond to God’s love. More precisely, the man has, through Creation, the capacity to become a subject of the divine love, capacity which is not erased

121 “If we are in the image of God, let’s become ours and of God, better said only of God, by no longer bearing anything earthly within us, in order to get closer to God and to become gods (...), receiving from God the quality as gods (...)”, G.P. 99, 1189. “Towards this God has made us to become husbands of the godlike nature (...) and partakers of His eternity and to become as Him through the deification by grace”, G.P. 90, 1193. Quotes with similar content, belonging to other Holy Fathers, there are mentioned by Nichifor Crainic, Course of Orthodox Mystique, taped by E. Olteanu, Bucharest, 1936.

even through sin. The objects do not have this capacity, neither the animals do. The man becomes actual subject of the love only when he receives in him the love of God, but the capacity of becoming subject of the love which descends from above, he must have it too. And we have to understand this capacity of becoming subject of the divine love not like a passive reception capacity, but like a capacity to acquire it and to grow up in it also through his own efforts, because the man must collaborate to his salvation.” (Stăniloae 1993)

Correcting the Holy Fathers

“(The man) appears to be the unique being which (...) is aware of the world’s rationality and – by doing so - of its own rationality. (...) We cannot be aware of ourselves without being aware of the world and of the things from within world. The better we know the world, or the more we are aware of the world, the more we are aware of ourselves.” (Stăniloae 2003: 11)

“Some of the Churchly Father said that the man is a microcosm, a world summarizing, in itself, the big world. Saint Maximos the Confessor noticed that it is more rightly to be the man considered a macrocosm, for the man is called to comprise in himself the whole world, being able to comprise it without losing himself, as one being different from the world, and therefore realizing a bigger unity than the world external to him (...)” (Stăniloae 2003: 13)

“To the Holy Fathers, the matter was an amorphous, totally not lightened mass, whose transfiguration was difficult to understand. They inherited from the Hellenic philosophy the notion of a matter opposite to the divine Logos, and therefore to any logos. (...) Today we see the full and though malleable rationality of the matter, its rational transparency, its capacity of being flexed by the conscious human rationality and deed – like the metal is given diverse shapes – and discovered in its light by this rationality. But this malleable rationality gains a full meaning through actualizing this malleability, only if the human rationality is led in this work by ethical principles, by a responsibility towards the human community and towards God. Through this it is opened in it the perspective of a transparency and transfiguration which can advance until resurrection, by being overwhelmed by the light and the power of the human spirit filled up with the light and the power of the godlike Ghost.” (2003: 376)

“Palamas addressed the powers of God which are without a beginning as well. The providence’s work existed before the creation too, in order to be each thing created at the due time. The science about everything, we well. The prescience, it hasn’t a beginning either. Therefore, there is a sole without beginning providence, as work of God. All others are of created nature. And there is a sole uncreated and without beginning prescience: that of God. All the other prescience(s) have a beginning and they are created. Likewise, there is a sole will from ever, while all the other wills are created. It is what Saint Maximos the Confessor said: “The existence, the life, the holiness, and the virtues, they are deeds of God, without a beginning in time”. But Maximos didn’t understand the new ones, for he added: “The ones having a beginning are and they are called through participation to the ones which do not have a beginning. This is for God is the creator of the whole life and of the immortality, of the holiness and of the virtue from within us”. The ones not having a beginning in time and which are shared to the ones participating to them and having a beginning, Maximos didn't reckon them as itself the being of God, because he said: "God is infinitely elevated and above the ones which we are imparted with". Maximos considered those as being "existentially related to God". (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 72-73)

"In order to achieve a communion amongst people, it is necessary both their unity as nature and their distinction as persons. This is because, without their unity as nature, the persons wouldn't have anything in common, and without their distinction as persons, they wouldn't have anything to tell to one another. Saint Maximum the Confessor described the community of nature mostly as an ontological fact. But we today see the communion more as a spiritual fact. And the communion as spiritual fact has at its basis not only the common nature but also the necessity of making whole the persons endowed with other and other particularities. A human nature not-concretized in diverse persons, it would be a lifeless and always the same mass, as Saint Gregory of Nazianzus said that the divine nature would have been in such a case too, if it hadn't been concretized in Persons. And the different persons not having a common nature, it would have been some entities totally separated from one another. Only actualized in diverse persons, the human nature is shown as animated by love and as alive, being possible to be enriched, either through the actualization of what it has within itself, or through its growth. That's why, one cannot cogitate the human nature without being concretized in persons, neither can be cogitated the persons without having a common nature. Or, the human nature appears to necessarily be concretized in the variety of persons. Only by abstraction, one can think at a nature not concretized in distinct persons. Concretely, there isn't except the nature concretized in persons, endowed with distinct personal traits, differing from person to person; although, the human nature cannot concretely exist and it cannot have life without persons. The interhuman relations cannot be concretized without there being different persons, differing by their persona traits. That's why saint Maximos the Confessor said that also through their rationality as persons, the human beings are both distinct and united to one another." (Stăniloae 1995: 142-143)

Creation

“Both the man and the cosmos are the product of an above nature creation act of God, and they are maintained in existence by God, through a preservation action, which also has a supra-natural character.” (Stăniloae 2003: 10)

“(…) to the original and creator position of God in front of the world, it is corresponding, on a lower or of dependency plan, our positions of knower and manufacturing being, like image of God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 11)

“(…) the supra-natural revelation, on one hand, it is done through direct speaking and through acts above nature, and on the other hand, it doesn’t contradict the nature and the natural faith, but it confirms it and it consummates it.” (Stăniloae 2003: 31)

“Detaching the nature from God, through which He speaks and works, or speaks by working and works by speaking, it has led to diverse conceptions which wanted to explain the work exclusively on the basis of an immanent reality. But the natural Revelation is not-separated from the supra-natural Revelation, and the believer feels himself also through it in an immediate connection with God. But this is only if God manifests Himself continuously through the natural Revelation, continuously speaking and working, through all the things and their combinations chosen by Him and through all the thoughts brought by Him through these ones, directly, in the human conscience, and thus leading the man towards accomplishing the meaning of his existence in eternal union with Him.” (Stăniloae 2003: 31)

“Actually, God continuously speaks and works through the created and reigned things, by creating always new circumstances, through which He calls each man to fulfill his duties to him and to his fellow humans and He answers the man’s appeals of each moment.” (Stăniloae 2003: 31)

“The creation is on the way of love, by receiving its power out of the Trinitarian love, and by advancing towards its consummation in the union with the Holy Trinity and with all the people.” (Stăniloae 2003: 292)

“According to the Christian faith the world and the man they have a beginning and they will have an end, in the present form, or in the one they can evolve by themselves. If they hadn’t a beginning, they wouldn’t have been out of nothing, and therefore they wouldn’t have been the exclusive work of the liberty and of the love of God, and they wouldn’t have been destined to an existence in the fullness of God; if that had been the case, the relative, imperfect form of the world it would have been the sole fatal essence of the reality. Only if the world is out of nothing, by the will of God, it can be elevated on a plan of perfection into God, also by His almighty will and through His love, after a certain preparation of it for that. This beginning of the world and of the man and this total end, both of them prove the love of God for them and gives them a meaning.” (2003: 342-343)

“The man’s soul no longer comes, neither in the case of the first man, out of the potency placed within world ‘in the beginning’, though the first man is at his turn established to be from the ‘beginning’ and out of a commandment, and out of a power of God, likewise the other orders of the existence. The man is instilled by God Himself, namely he is brought to existence, out of nothing, through a special act of God. This is for God enters from the beginning a direct relation with the man. The wanted relation of God with the world or with the time, through which the world and the time subsist, it means in the case of the man, from the first moment, a dialogue with a subject, given the fact that both God and the man are persons, whilst the entire nature is brought to existence as object or as succession of objects, only through power. But God creates this ensemble of objects for a dialogue with the man. Otherwise, creating them would have been meaningless. That’s why, in man it is surpassed the plan of the nature’s creation. The act of creating the man’s soul it belongs to another category. In the man’s soul it is manifested, from the first moment, the direct relation of God with the man, a dialogical relation giver of spiritual life.” (2003: 348)

“Saint Maximos the Confessor sees in the tendency towards the full union with god and towards the resting in the plenitude of God the sense of the movement and therefore of the time. By narrowing his affirmations to the rational beings, he declares that all of them have been brought to existence in order to achieve through their free movement or free work the good existence and, by this, to reach the eternal good existence.” (2003: 353)

“According to the Christian faith, if the world has a contingent structure, which allows the intervention of the human liberty in it and which can be lead towards increasingly higher states, it means that it is the work of a free creator. If the world had been the emanation of an impersonal force, then it wouldn’t have offered the possibility of the human interventions within it. If the world is adapted to the liberty of the human spirit, it means the world is the work of a free and as spirit person, more powerful than the man is, a spirit whose freedom can be manifested in a world given for the man but a world the man couldn’t create himself. If the contingency of the world implies in it the fact that it is given for a conscious and free spirit, this character of the world couldn’t be explained without a spirit that is not only conscious, free, and powerful, and not only inside certain limits, but also almighty, and who created the world for the free and conscious manifestation of the human spirit in it. If the world is contingent, for is it adapted to a free man, then the world is created by an almighty spirit interested in man, and the man is called to manifest his freedom through the world.” (2003: 387-388)

“The world is contingent for it is created by a free almighty spirit, for a free spirit that is in His image, as a place of encounter between His freedom and the freedom of His image, for the free activity of the creator with the man within world. The free almighty spirit has created the world for the man to elevate the world to a supreme spiritualization, with the help of the supreme spirit, in order to meet God in a fully spiritualized world, through the union with God. The world is created as a field of the encounter between the free work of the man and the free work of God, aiming towards their final encounter through the world. If only the man had worked freely within the world, the man couldn't have brought the world to a complete spiritualization, namely to his full encounter with God through the world. God uses His free work within world in order to help the man that through a free work of the man the man to be elevated and together with the man to be elevated the world too, towards God; this is for in collaboration with the man God to bring the world to a state of an environment of perfect transparency between God and man.” (2003: 388)

“God, the One Who is limitless in richness, He doesn't create parsimoniously. The Creation is brought to existence in order to reveal Him, and for the Creation to participate to the richness of His Being, the Creation having its solidarity in this participation. Consequently, the Creation reflects in some measure, correspondingly to itself, this immeasurable richness, through its dimensions and variety, and the Creation participates in all the forms to that richness. On the other hand, the revealing of God must be done to somebody, namely to some spiritual beings. That's why the not-spiritual nature isn't a true revealing of God except by the fact that there are human beings to know God out of Creation and through the Creation and to realize how the Creation, by revealing God, it participates to God by doing that and how the human beings themselves participate to God by this, in a greater and more conform measure. Knowing God through the seen world, which the man is tied to, it isn't the sole mode to know God. There must be also another way of revealing God and therefore of knowing Him and of participating to Him, namely a mode untied to the seen symbols and therefore more appropriate to the divine spirituality, a more adequate mode to His Being.” (2003: 437)

“If God had created only embodied spirits, we would have reckoned that the Supreme Being cannot be known except through sensitive forms. This would have meant that the Supreme Being Himself is a sensitive subject, and that to the existence of the absolute it is ontologically tied the matter. And this would constitute a doubt upon the Creation itself. A matter depending on the Absolute Being it would take from the Absolute Being the capacity of the creation, giving Him a pantheistic character.” (2003: 438)

“The whole created existence makes a continuous circular movement around God, for it tends towards its Cause. Properly-said, an infinite ascension cannot take place in an ascending straight line, for if that had been the case, the lower ones would have looked only at the upper ones, and not directly towards God.” (2004: 465)

“The Holy Fathers let us understand that through the tree of knowledge of the good and of the bad and through the tree of life, it is being perceived the same world: looked at through a spiritualized mind, it is the tree of life and in sets us in connection with God; and looked at and used through a feeling untied from the spiritualized mind, it represents the tree of knowledge of the good and of the bad, and it detaches the man from God.” (2003: 489)

“Out of the work of the Holy Ghost upon the water there came to existence into the Son (Col. 1: 6) all the defined forms of existence, at the beginning of the world (Gen. 1: 2). In a special mode was created the man at the beginning, by the will of the Father, in the image of the Son and into the Son, and by the breath of the Holy Ghost (Gen. 1: 2; 2: 6).” (Stăniloae 1997: 22)

“The original water, from the Bible, it is not identical to the defined water from later. But it is neither a matter standing by itself in front of the creator Ghost, being possible to be made whatsoever out of it. This is because it was also created by God and it had within itself, virtually, the rationalities and the potencies of the defined existences – image of the rationalities of the Logos – which appeared through the breath of the Ghost. That water wasn’t totally passive. That water was an undefined energy, not illuminated by any determination, but it was in a universal movement, not-solidified in any way, having in itself, through creation, the rationalities of all the forms of existence, created and upheld according to the image of the rationalities of the creator and preserver Logos. The godlike Ghost by representing the same fluidity on the spiritual plan, it made the original water to actualize the forms virtually inscribed in it by the creator act of the Logos, in forms showing in them in a definite manner the images of the rationalities of the Logos. The Ghost consummated thus, by irradiating out of the Logos – on one hand transcendently, on the other hand being present in it – the creation founded by the Logos. The Holy Ghost with His fluidity, united with the fluidity of that original water, it is the force of continuous forming of the defined existence of all degrees.” (Stăniloae 1997: 23)

“The Ghost consummated the man’s creation, being blown upon man and therefore being placed in a special kinship with the man; the man’s body was composed out of dust by the will of the Father, and the man’s soul was blown within man by the work of the Logos. The existence form which appeared then it was the highest visible creature, having within the image of the logos as Hypostases, but keeping within the state of movement through which the man was to grow in the likeness with Him.” (Stăniloae 1997: 23-24)

“The universal energy totally undefined, from the beginning, was taking diverse shapes, more or less solidified, by the work of the Ghost. A part of it took the shape of the water which, being kindred with the original water, it represents the mobile reserve which all the bodies are born and are fueled out of, and they are kept in movement. Now nothing is born and nothing stays alive, or in some mobility, without the water moved by the Holy Ghost. All the organisms which can no longer use the water, they become rigid and they crumble down as dead.” (Stăniloae 1997: 24)

“Through the man’s separation from the world, the Ghost hasn’t ceased to uphold the people and to collaborate with them for the birth of the following people. This is for without the Ghost nothing can be born. But now the people are born mainly out of body and they bear within them the imprint of the body, namely of their antecessors, seen in the interminable mobility and in the continuous ascension of the life in the Ghost.” (Stăniloae 1997: 24)

“All the theologians, headed by Dionysus Areopagite¹²², deduce the Creation of the world from the characteristic of the good in God. The good wants to be tasted by as many beings as possible. But how can somebody be good, unless he is in communion? That’s why, one can say that the indicative reason towards the Creation of the world it is the Trinitarian communions of God, which, just for it is a happy communion, it wants also other beings to enjoy this happiness, and the falling scattered the human being out of this communion, God wants also to restore them through His embodiment.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The reason and the model of the creation and of the salvation would therefore be the way which God exists in the Holy Trinity.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Thus, the human being in his subject quality he is an image of God. The Creation is a free divine work, but under the indication of the divine life. And the Salvation reestablishes and consummates the Creation according to the model of the Trinitarian life, by elevating the man from the damaged image of God to the likeness with Him.” (Stăniloae 1993)

¹²² “And like our sun, not considering itself and not deciding, but through the fact itself of be, light all which are capable to impart from his light, after their power, the same way also the Good (which is above the sun, like it is the archetype in its real existence above an fade icon) irradiates to all that exists the rays of the entire goodness according to the everyone measure. Through them constituted all intelligible and spirituals existences, powers and works”... P. G. 3. 693 – 696.

“Through creation, the Father wanted to increase the number of subjects who to enjoy the happiness of the communion with Him. Not for His happiness, because the communion with the other divine subjects does not permit any decrease of His happiness. He wanted to have more sons. He wanted more subjects to whom to be their Father. But the divinity neither multiplies nor decreases. Other subjects cannot come to the existence but through creation. The created subjects cannot remain or do not raise to the height required by this communion. But what is inferior by creation; it is elevated through love to the height of a son, on an equal level, in order to be possible to establish the intimacy and the understanding. By creation it is established only the capacity to receive the love. Then the love descends abundantly upon man, and it elevates him on the level of son, of being able to be a partner to God. Love is godlike, it is uncreated. Love can dress and make, through gift, the man like a god. We can say, together with Sergei Bulgakov, that into the man there is something created and there is something uncreated, but only into the man who stays in report with God. Love, by being godlike, it makes the man immortal, it dresses a created nature in divine features, like Maximos the Confessor said¹²³.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The Son of God has created or, better said, He has re-created the world, through His death, put at the basis of this re-creation at which fulfillment we are called to participate to. This time the calling has been done through sufferance, in which pulsed the same endless force through which He created the world for the first time. Adapting a word of Saint John Chrysostom, we can say that the re-creation of the world, in a certain sense, it is harder even than creating it for first time, because it is harder to be healed a spiritual nature that has slipped on the slope of the decay, than to be created a new one¹²⁴. The only creative force it is in general the sufferance, which defeats the old structure, not to eradicate it, but to renew it.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“In any case, the almightiness of God towards man, if God wants to remain in conformity to the meaning of His creation – He created the man like a free

¹²³ “Godlike and happy love bound man to God and shows God the God lover”, P. G. 90, 1192.

¹²⁴ “The conservation of the world, said Saint John Chrysostom, it isn’t an inferior stage of its creation, but, if we must say something wonderful, it is even superior to it. It means a lot to produce something out of nothing; but to conserve those things, which tend towards inexistence, and to keep them together, when they want to spread away, it is a big and wonderful deed and a sign of lot of power”. Omil. II Ebr. 1, 3 Cf. H. Andrusos, The Dogmatic in Romanian translation, p. 126 – 7.

being, for communion – and to save him, He will manifest Himself through love. Only in the Old Testament God manifested His love somewhat directly. His power's manifestation through love it is more conform with the being of God, which is the free personal communion with the free will of the man. Of course, that means a restraint of the divine almightiness, because the love doesn't want to compel anybody, no matter how much conquering force it is in it. But it is a voluntary restriction, if God wants to exist in his front free beings and not simple objects. In any love there is a self-restriction, a kenosis, because there it is a renouncing to the direct power, which reduces to the object what it is in its front. The alternatives to God are: or direct almightiness, with the reducing to the object of all it is outside Him, or a passing of His power through the love which is a restriction of the exclusivist affirmation, a restraint of the power, an admission of other free beings, a descending on their level in order to make the communion possible. A kenosis of His, God admitted even from the creation of the man. And, though, if the direct manifestation of the power on all the line - in God's case, the almightiness manifestation is a sign that everything is considered like things, so that the one who behaves like that he is on the inferior stage of a egotistic being - the God's superiority is shown just into this kenosis. (Properly-said, God does not gain this superiority through the creation of the world, but He also reveals it, because He has it into His eternal tri-personal communion)." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The first act of God towards the world, that can be regarded as the basis of all the other acts and of His Revelation in continuation, it is the creation. Out of this act, hard to be understood by us, we have to understand the fact that the world it has been constituted as a reality just by the will of God, on one hand having its own laws, on the other hand as a contingent reality and its causality can be directed either by God, or by man, in order to serve as purpose to the communion between God and man. The free energy of God is answered by the free energy of the man; properly-said, out of the divine energy it gets its start and its growth the human energy too." (Stăniloae 2005: 9)

"Just the first act of the Revelation is, as we said before, a bringing to existence of a world with own laws and of a free mankind. We cannot understand the intimate meaning of the world's creation. Of course, our inferior understand has introduced a mythological objectifying element in this case. We must eliminate this element as much as possible, but without eliminating the idea of the Revelation, as the "demythologizing" theologians do, doing what do the women who throw the baby together with the bathing used water. What we must do isn't a "demythologizing", but we rather must to spiritually understand the divine acts and the God's relations with the world. The Creation mustn't be understood as an act which God created a reality separated from Himself through, as an object exterior to Himself, which would be the first object. God created the world within Himself, through a manifestation of His spiritual energy. Of course, God mustn't either be confounded to some part or to some force of the world; God is unseparated from the world and the world is unseparated from God, but God is the unconditional cause of the world." (Stăniloae 2005: 11)

"The Russian theologian Paul Evdokimov, starting from the idea of the Fathers that the grace is necessary for the human nature's normalness, he goes so far as to impropriate the opinion of Nicodemus the Hagiorite, Soloviev, Serge Bulgakov, and to argue that the embodiment of the Word is the necessary conclusion of the world's creation, by being involved in the God's creator act as in a premise. The man has been created, according to him, in order to be deified, and the man's deification wasn't possible without the embodiment of the Word. (...) This would have meant that Not only the prophetic, the messianic symbol, but the symbol by and large it is an anticipation of the icon, that in the world as such God has inscribed as potentiality the future embodiment of the Word, that God obliged Himself, by the way which He created the world in, to consummate the world through the Embodiment of His Son, that He would have placed in the human nature the need for being hypostatized in God-the Word and, consequently, to become, in hypostatical union with the Word, a prototype for the icon of the embodied Word. It seems that Evdokimov says this thing too, but somehow indirectly, when declaring that the creation has an iconographic character (namely more than symbolical)." (Stăniloae 2005: 70)

"Without any doubt, that the world as concretely given after the falling into sin, namely as it was really known, it was in a waiting for the embodiment of the Word. But it is questionable if this waiting had sprung out of the world's state itself, in case it wouldn't have been awakened in it through the God's promise. It is sure that the fallen world had had included in its insufficiency, though not necessarily in its conscious feeling, the need for the godlike help. But it isn't totally proven that that necessity should have been on with the necessity from after the embodiment of the Word." (Stăniloae 2005: 70)

"God is in a free relation with the world, and not in a relation imposed by His Being. The existence of the "things from around God" - which the relation with the world is now being accomplished through - before the creation of the world, from eternity, it means, amongst others, just this eternal possibility of God of having relations also with something different from Himself, namely, also to give existence to something that wasn't existing, when He wanted and as he wanted, of not being God "forced" to remain only with Himself. When we say that “the things from around God” irradiate out of His Being, but they aren’t His Being Himself, this means – amongst others – that God by His Being He has the possibility of creating relative realities, different from Him, but “the things from around Him” differing from His Being, these relations aren’t a necessity to Him. These relations aren’t imposed by His Being, His Being doesn’t need them. So, both before and after creating some realities which to enter such relations with, God is enough to Himself, but still, He has through His Being the possibility of pouring His love also upon something else than He is, upon as many and whatever kind of worlds He would want to create. The world isn’t imposed either by His will, or by something from outside, as something contrary, not wanted by Him. God, by participating to the world’s life freely, and not existentially, this participation doesn’t sustain an inevitable tragicalness, or some contradiction essential in His life.” (Stăniloae 2005: 107)

“At the foundation of the created things and beings, it doesn’t stay the divine being, but the “forms”, the “types”, the “paradigms”, and the predeterminations, which God thought from eternity. Each thing, each being, it has its/his “form”, its/his “image” defined or “predetermined” into God. It is an incomprehensible mystery what the infinite God could like, to produce in Himself “types”, or “forms” corresponding to the finite things. In this consists His divine essence, which, being accomplished through the will of God, it lets His Being always the same. These “types” or “rationalities” of the things are “around the divine Being”. Of course, in each of them is manifested God’s infinite wisdom and power, each thing having a support and as source the divine infinity. And because, on the other hand, we do not know the power, the wisdom, and all the divine works, except through these rationalities, the Holy Fathers were justified in calling the also the divine works and the divine powers as “the things from around the divine Being.” (Stăniloae 2005: 110)

“Each thing and each being created, by having at its/his basis such a divine “form”, the immediate divine transcendence, which we can contemplate in each creature as a symbol it is this “form” which, though divine, it is anyway, “defined” (predetermined) just through God. Of course, we contemplate this “form” as soaked with the divine infinity. We feel, we live God in it, its cogitating subject, and its support. For instance, through lamb we contemplate not only the idea of lamb from within God, but also the Son of God, Who has placed in the idea of lamb, and Who reflects in His Being, the feature of His gentleness as Person and the intention of his future sacrifice for the world. This reference to God Himself, it is received in the Mosaic cult and then in that of the New Testament, by some of the things, indicated and consecrated by God as symbols. But if God’s cogitation hadn’t produced these defined “forms” of the things, we couldn’t have experienced

Him through things except vaguely, and not through a “form”, or through a godlike beauty - but still “determined” – of the things. If that had been the case, the things couldn’t have been symbols of some godlike powers and works, of some manifestations of God. These “forms” are the mediators between the absolute “indetermination” and “unimaginability” of God, and the seen images which are the things. That’s why we’ve seen that Patriarch Nicephorus rejected the iconoclast thesis about the absolute unimaginability of God, by affirming that He makes Himself imaginable “through the godlike works and powers from around Him”, or through some “obscure manifestations and echoes” known around the inaccessible Being of God.” (Stăniloae 2005: 110-111)

“These “paradigms” aren’t identical to the seen forms of the things, but neither they are totally separated, as it seems that G. Florovsky seems wanting to argue, in his attempt to oppose Bulgakov, who identifies the seen world to the divinity in becoming. The created things and beings, they are constituted and they are sustained as some seen forms corresponding to the unseen paradigms, by the world of those paradigms. Those paradigms are, in the same time, some forces which work by constituting and by upholding the seen forms, which are corresponding to those paradigms. Those paradigms are determined and unitary structures of some divine forces and, on their basis, the things and the beings are being constituted, at their turn, as some determined and unitary structures of physical forces, chemically, biologically, and spiritually created. The work of the divine paradigms must be present right in the seen things, and for their state organizes and it upholds the seen image corresponding to the unseen image, the unseen image itself must be manifested through them.” (Stăniloae 2005: 111-112)

“The world and the man are brought to existence not through an involuntary emanation, but through an act of willing creation, out of nothing, for the fact that, if the world and the man had emanated from the so-called divine being, then, necessarily, they wouldn’t have been the result of an act of love of the God in Trinity, but they would have been themselves eternal, necessarily produced by an eternal essence. This is because, if the man and the world had been emanations from that essence, that essence wouldn’t have been free either, and the man wouldn’t have enjoyed a freedom in his relation with the world and even with that essence. If that has been the case, the evil done by man to himself and to the world, it would have resulted from the so-called God. On the other hand, the man and the world couldn’t have escaped the evil from within them. Neither the man nor the world couldn’t have advanced in the infinity of the God’s kindness. Only a free God is an infinite God on the moral plan, and the man and the world can spiritually advance infinitely towards Him. The ones who deny the creation of the world as made by an absolutely free God, and who declare the world as unwillingly emanated out of God, they reckon that they can solve through this the idea that the world is infinite or that the world can develop infinitely. But what infinity is that that is always impeded by evil to infinitely advance towards love? Even the fact that the man, and through him the world, they can be impeded by the man's freedom to infinitely advance into good, it shows the limitation of the things belonging to the creation, but it can be exceeded through the union with God, the uncreated Creator, the free Creator. Only thus it is explained the fact that the man, when remaining through his liberty, in evil, he ends in death, and the things he used they rot as well. But in a world and in a man created by God, even the death is defeated through God Who receives the death as man. The man and the world are no longer impeded by evil and by death from advancing in the infinity of the true God. They are impeded only by their own will. The evil isn't, through the deceiving affirmation of advancing into life, but a continuous limitation of the life or a locking up in the limitation of the created state, a limitation of the existence identical, in its extremity, to death, to the extreme depletion of the life. The evil is a locking up in the limitation of the created, which becomes, because of that, monotonous and tormenting, and it cannot offer the man a satisfaction through and endless spiritual growth." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 8-9)

God isn't a mono-personal existence, and this is from ever. In this case, where would be from, the love explaining the world's creation? Has it been achieved by God by creating the world? If the world has appeared out of necessity, from the so-called god, it means that within him there was necessary to exist a virtuality of the love. So, the world was necessary to Him in order to reach to love. But, in such a case, would this be love? And, in such a case, how could have been the world occurred like, later than God? And, would the world be created? And if it hadn't been created, the it wouldn't have belonged to the essence which the world has appeared from, the imperfection, namely such and such phenomena, of the lacking of love?" (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 9-10)

"Only a world created out of nothing, in the service of the man who is created at his turn out of nothing, it proves the existence of a true God, namely: almighty and free, which can give the human creature, created by Him, the possibility of a free using of the world, a world created by Him in the service of the man and, therefore, the possibility that the man to be happy in using the world, a world created by God and in dependency on God, in order the man to advance, through the world, towards God, or the possibility to be the man unhappy, by using the world in a mode which doesn't want to take in account the world's connection to God." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 11)

"The world and the man, created out of nothing, they have nothing from themselves, but they have everything from God. Through themselves they are nothing. The fact is, though, and this is a temptation to almost all the philosophies, namely to reckon the world and the man as coming from the essence of the so-called divinity. This thinking, which confounds the world's power to the divine essence, it degrades, though, the so-called divine essence, and thus it makes the evil as non-abolishable. Actually, something else is the divine essence and something else is the divine power. Of His power, so also of His creator power, God disposes freely. If God hadn't disposed freely of His power, by His will, God wouldn't have been, actually, almighty, but He would have been submitted to a law, on the basis of which the world emanated from Him, and that would have kidnapped too, to the human nature, the possibility of opposing the so-called divinity. This is for, in such a case, the man would have committed the evil as coming from itself the divine essence, a fact that would have limited the divine essence too. Only the fact that God brings the world and the man to existence, not out of His being, but out of nothing, on the basis of His power used as he wish through His will as Person, it can let the man the power of opposing God. And only the fact that God can dispose of His power as He wants, it makes Him, on the other hand, as almighty and not-submitted to a law, and it can give the man the possibility to oppose God. In order to understand the true and the almighty God and, therefore, also free God, on the basis of what we've said until here, one needs to recognize the existence, within God, of a will. A God without a will, He isn't a true God, because of not being an almighty God. Such a God couldn't create, out of nothing, a human creature endowed, at his turn, with will: God disposes through His will of His power, as he wishes, and, through his will too, He gives the created man the possibility to oppose Him, in thoughts and in deeds." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 11-12)

"That Rationality gives all the rationalities is has within, also an external reality, by concretizing them as things and as persons, and by His power He upholds them also in a connection with Himself." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 34)

"If the Son and the Word, had made all the things by Himself, it would have been shown in that, His possibility of being separated, in this deed, so that there wouldn't have been in all things a Person Who speaks to the other godlike Persons and, so, neither would have been the man and the world which helps him to come closer to God, a work of the godlike power. And this would be reflected in the lack of harmony of the things, and in the peoples' lack of need for communication." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 37)

"By making Himself man, the Son of God has given the people the greatest example of humbleness, out of love, by showing that the love means paying attention to one another, until totally forgetting the self-importance. But He highlighted the paradoxical character of the love it stays in the fact that just in the self-forgetfulness, out of cherishing another, it is shown the spiritual greatness. The Son of God Who is the limitless love and power, He showed to the man He created out of nothing, so much love than He descended on the man's level, and He even went to death for man, and by that He has given an immeasurable value to the man He created out of nothing, and thus showing just through that that the one who has nothing from himself will be invested by Him with importance, and He will elevate that man on His level. Christ gives the man an importance equal to His, without this being imposed on him by the man's being, or by some substance out of which He would have had to produce the man. This is the supreme love: not to be imposed on somebody by anything. In this is shown, though, also the man's value given him by God in creation; though God created the man out of nothing, he created him in such a manner that God sees in man a creature dignified to be treated as equal. The greatness of God's almightiness is shown, in the first place, in the fact that He can create existence out of nothing. If God hadn't been able to create existence out of nothing, He wouldn't have been God, because He wouldn't have been almighty. But God shows His almightiness or His character as the Almighty, not only in the fact that He brings something to existence out of nothing, but also in the fact that He grants to some being created out of nothing so much value than He makes them partners in love with Him, and not because he needs it, but because he wants it. No pantheistic essence, submitted to some emanationist laws, or submitted to evolution, it hasn't such power. One could object that God loves in His creature something given by Himself, something coming from Himself, and therefore something belonging to Him. (...) The Son of Man and Word of God, He loves the man for he has made the man exclusively as worthy of love, out of His will (out of nothing). (...) God wants to make some existences partakers to his love (...). God loves the people for he created the people able to enjoy His love. That's why God loves seeing the people as feeling the joy and, in order to do that, also feeling the need for loving Him in order to gain their happiness. When God decided to create conscious existences, ones differing from Himself, God decided also to create them as desiring to tend towards limitlessness, for everything that exists as limitless and created by Him, the limitless One, it only tends to grow up in existence. But it is a great mystery that the existences created by Him, they can in their freedom, also not to tend towards Him, but they can imagine that they can increase in a limitlessness of their own being. And God, by wanting them freely, but also by wanting them to be free, He decided to create them for this eventuality too." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 55-57)

"Through embodiment, the Son of God showed Himself, to the man, as full light, by showing the man as capable of being made son of God and brother of Christ as Son of God, and the man was shown also as able to be elevated, through the Holy Ghost, to a life that isn't locked up within this world. The man was shown as made for an intimate living with the Holy Trinity, and for an eternal happiness in this communion. The creation, by and large, it was shown through the Son's embodiment, as being made for a unity into God, namely for a life common with the limitless life of God." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 57-58)

"This spiritual character, but visible through the body and through the body's eyes too, of the godlike work, it proves a mysterious connection and conformity between spirit and the material matter by and large. The same Creator has made the material matter, as lighting in universe, able to be seen by the eyes of the material body, but due to the soul from within man. And through the body's organs are communicated and are noticed by the soul, his conscious thoughts and feelings. Even in its pleasures, the body is warmed up by a certain warmth, which is like a fire, though it is produced by certain thoughts. But this is a fire that locks the mind up, on the other hand, in a lack of meaning, as in a darkness. It is a fire noticed through conscience, but through a narrow conscience and not illuminated by a meaning, namely through a conscience which is, somehow, unconscious or darkened. But a cleaned up of passions soul, he lives his love for God, and for his neighbors, as a clean and full of sensitive light fire. Of this clean, illuminated, and luminous fire – as the Church tells us about, in some of its prayers - the body of Christ is filled up with, and that that fire can be communicated to our souls too, by being imparted with Christ, and our soul will be cleaned up of sins by that fire, and our soul will be illuminated too, but that fire can also burn the body to death. Thus, in the prayers form before the Holy Impartation, the priest prays to God, on one hand, not to be burnt by the fire of the body of Christ, and on the other hand, he prays to be burnt his sins, and to be him illuminated by the fire of Christ." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 127)

"The communion of Three Persons in the supreme being and love, as free of any law superior to Them, it isn't forced to produce other existences, out of Their being or out of something else. But if we ascertain the mode of existing of the created things, we will see that they cannot be except the fruit of an absolute freedom, namely created out of nothing. This is for, if the supreme existence had needed something existent besides the supreme existence, for producing them, that supreme being wouldn't have been totally free, neither would have produced them exclusively out of love. And the world's coming to existence would have been irrational. Thus, the dogma of the world's creation out of nothing it is the second dogma, resulting from the need for admitting, through rationality and free faith, a supreme existence totally loving and free. The creation of this world out of nothing, it imposes itself, therefore, at its turn, as a deed on one hand rational and on the other hand free. This is for imposing it as a rational deed won't mean that it necessarily proceeds out of the supreme existence, since the full rationality must be reconciled with the freedom." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 158)

“A world created out of full love and out of full freedom, it won’t be created except for answering through it. The Creator is answered by the being who are aware of being part of the world, they being created also out of free love. The dogma of the free creation out of love it requires, thus, as another dogma: the free, loving use of the creation by some free and conscious beings, who, on the other hand, they need a created world, as they are too, a fruit of the free and loving Creation. This means that these beings can use the creation which they are part to, also in a manner unloving towards Creator. But such an unloving use deprives them of new powers, which could come to them out of their communion, in continuation, with their Creator. The creatures weaken, consequently, in their love for one another too, a fact that brings them the decrease of their real joy. By lacking, because of their actions, the love of their Creator, and because of the lack of love amongst themselves, the spirit of the created being weakens, and it causes an increase of the body’s attachment to the material world, and this diminishes the spirit’s power upon the body. Consequently, it intervenes their death and the impossibility of the man to remain through the fallen universe and through his fellow human, in connection with God.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 160-161)

“The teaching itself, about the Creation of the world and of the man, it is solidary with the teaching about the God in Trinity and with the teaching about defeating death through Christ, the embodied Son of God.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 24)

“The existence by and large, it is from ever. According to our faith, there wasn’t any moment on which nothing existed. The existence by and large, it couldn’t appear out of nothing. If that had been the case, we would have had to reckon the nothing as virtual existence. So, even in such a case, we would have reached to an existence too.” (Stăniloae 1995: 5)

“The existence from ever, it should have the fulness of the known and cogitated by us content, or even endlessly richer than the content cogitated with the human mind, in its continuous advancing into cogitation; that is a fullness which nothing can be added to, so that is borderless, or infinite. It didn’t need to be added something essentially new to its existence, and existence that dates back from ever. Only through its creator power it has been added something new. The possibility of this new adding to the existence from ever it must have been given, potentially, within the existence from ever. We have to reckon as being such an adding, everything we ascertain as limited in power and insufficient by itself. But as such, it cannot be reckoned as an adding through being.” (Stăniloae 1995: 5)

“The consummation must have some features opposed to the insufficiencies of the temporal universe. On the other hand, the consummation must have some features representing the full accomplishment of the best aspirations of the temporal universe, which the temporal universe tends towards, through the continuous transcendence towards those features, and this being the essence of the normal movement of the conscious creatures within it. In other words, the plenary existence must avoid, on one hand, the insufficiency represented by the material and animal order of the existence through its unconsciousness; on the other hand, it must have a conscience alike the human conscience, in which its subject doesn't know himself as depending, in his freedom, on an unconscious order, or alike that of the created spirits, which the created subjects know through, on themselves, as depending on an absolute Creator. In the supreme existence the conscience must be covered with the plenary existence, or to know the plenary existence as master in an absolute mode (as creator) upon any other existence." (Stăniloae 1995: 7)

"For the loving God wanted to show His love for another existence too, that other existence must have been created out of nothing. This is because to an existence emanated by Him, or organized from a preexisting substance, He wouldn't have shown a perfect love, namely by emanating it or by organizing it, because of such acts would have been acts produced by a need which the fundamental existence would have been submitted to; or, if that had been the case, the existence organized by God wouldn't have had everything from His love." (Stăniloae 1995: 9-10)

"The fruitfulness, the love, and the infinite life, as traits of God, though making His existence plenary within Himself, due to the relations amongst the Three Persons, those traits have been manifested also in bringing to existence, and in leading towards Himself, of the universe that differs from Him, according to the being. On the other hand, the love amongst the Three Godlike Persons it is the only explanation for creating another existence than Their own, plenary, and uncreated from eternity existence. Saint Maximos the Confessor said that the Hellenes didn't admit this (the universe's creation) "for they didn't know the kindness, the almightiness, the wisdom, and the knowledge of God, as being above anything and above mind" (Dumitru Stăniloae, The Romanian Philokalia, vol. II, Heads about Love, Sibiu, 1947, p. 99). God wouldn't have been creator if He hadn't been kind. And God couldn't have been kind if He hadn't been Person in conscious relation with other Person, from eternity – better said with Two Other Persons. God wouldn't have been creator if He hadn't been Trinity. But the opposite is true too: if this universe hadn't been created, there wouldn't have been a good, conscious, and free God. If that had been the case, it nowhere would have been kindness and freedom. The created universe is a proof for a good, free, and conscious God. The created universe shows that the conscience, the freedom, and the kindness aren't only some passing and insignificant epiphenomena, everything being a law blind and inexplicable in its origin.” (Stăniloae 1995: 21)

“The kindness or the plenary existence of God as Trinity, they don’t force Him to create the universe. If that had been the case, the universe would have been rather an emanation of an essence. Just the fact that God is, through His transcendent Trinity, the free plenitude of the existence, having everything in Himself, it doesn’t force Him to add something to His existence. The Trinity is both the universe’s explanation as existence, and the universe’s explanation as differing from God, according to the being, for the universe is a, existence on a different plan, namely created.” (Stăniloae 1995: 21)

“If God had needed to create the universe, the universe wouldn’t have been created out of His kindness, or it wouldn’t have been even created out of nothing, but, in a way, the universe would have come out of God’s existence. And a forced kindness isn’t actually kindness at all, so that God wouldn’t have been, in such a case, source of all kindness in a supreme degree. If that had been the case, the insufficiencies and the evilness from within universe they would have derived from God, and not from a voluntary separation of the universe from Him. The emanationist pantheism attempted to escape from under the power of this conclusion by formulating the idea of the increasingly reduced degrees of the existence emanated out of the original existence. But this would have submitted that essence itself to a lack of fulness, or to a limitation, by admitting its incapacity of infinitely emanating out of itself consummate existences. And the hope of the evolutionist pantheism, in the fact that, in time, the universe will reach a perfection, it hasn’t been proven as real, though the universe has the eternity behind. Then, why wouldn’t the fundamental essence have been emitting fully evolved form of existence, since the beginning? Finally, any pantheism submits the original essence to a certain law, and that law need its own explanation, but no one can provide it.” (Stăniloae 1995: 21-22)

“The consummate kindness of God, namely God’s Trinitarian character, it explains not only His quality as Maker, but also His quality as free Maker, namely the fact that He created the universe when He wanted. The moment of the Creation was chosen by His unfathomable wisdom.” (Stăniloae 1995: 22)

“The fact that the universe has been created as limited in time, and out of nothing, it is consistent with the fact that the universe hadn’t come to existence as a completion of God. God, as plenary existence, through His being and through the Trinity of Persons, He doesn’t need any completion. If the case hadn’t been this, then the universe would have existed from eternity. Consequently, God wouldn’t have created the universe out of nothing. But God has shown His absolute and transcendent superiority as Creator, for the universe cannot complete God, because the universe is limited and it totally depends on God. God has created the universe in order the universe to rejoice of existence, together with God. This is for any degree of existence is exclusively owed to Him. God rejoices, at His turn, of the universe created by Him, in time, but this is only due to His kindness, for He rejoices of the universe's joyfulness. He doesn't need this rejoicing, but in the limitlessness of His kindness, He deigns that, other beings to rejoice of existence too, and He also rejoiced of their joyfulness, and that's why He gives them, as a gift, their existences. God doesn't need anything, and He doesn't envy anything. Although, this capacity of non-envying, namely the capacity of rejoicing of others' joyfulness – this showing His perfect love – it is a motif explaining the Creation, but as a free Creation.” (Stăniloae 1995: 22)

“God's decision to create the universe and the universe's creation can be called as lenience, and not a necessity. God rejoices too, for creating the universe, but he doesn't need that joy; He feels a joy that is united, paradoxically, with His willing lenience. He manifests a lenience out of His generosity, out of His plenitude, out of His consummation, and not forcedly. God's plenitude stays at the basis of His lenience, and not a target that God would tend to. But He rejoices of manifesting, in this, His plenitude's generosity.” (Stăniloae 1995: 22-23)

“One can say that God's rejoicing of His lenience – when creating the universe - out of His plenitude's generosity, it expresses the union between God's freedom and the love characteristic to Him.” (Stăniloae 1995: 23)

“Regarding the Creation we have a paradox: what is brought to existence and upheld in existence it is out of nothing, but just because of that it has at its basis the power of God. And the power is out of God's being, but it is activated through God's freedom. The Holy Fathers spoke about an “impartation” of the universe with God. Saint Maximos the Confessor said that “every mental and submitted to senses being, he receives his existence through impartation”.” (Stăniloae 1995: 24)

“The work of God, by differing from His being, it makes possible both God's existence as Person free from creatures, and the creatures' distinct existence from God. The one who denies the work of God as distinct from His being, he denies both God as Person and the Creation as distinct from God. This was said by Saint Gregory Palamas: “God, by having a being in order to exist and a will in order to do, the ones who denies the difference between being and will, he rejects also God's existence and doing. That one rejects God's existence and the creation of the making of the created things” (Antirrhetic V against Akindynos, cod. Paris, 1238, f. 151 r.). Through work God creates, through being God exists. God doesn't create the universe through His existence, but through free creation. This makes the universe distinct from God, but it makes the universe as God's masterpiece too." (Stăniloae 1995: 24-25)

"Only the Son and the Holy Ghost come out of the Father's being, the Son through birth and the Holy Ghost through proceeding. The universe is brought to existence through the willing work of God, a work that give the universe a being differing from God's being, namely the universe has its being out of nothing, for outside God there was nothing. This is for, if outside God there had been something, that would have limited God, and it would have deprived Him of His quality as God (Saint Cyril of Alexandria, Thesaurus IV: G.P. 75, col. 276)." (Stăniloae 1995: 26)

"The being doesn't really exist except in hypostases. That's why, in order to be born, it must be in hypostasis. Any being exists in hypostases: plant, animals, and people. And any hypostasis is born out of another hypostasis, or it is formed out of a hypostasis' seed. And this law is given even in the God's existence mode itself; the Hypostasis of the Father gives birth to the Hypostasis of the Son, and the Father also proceeds the hypostasis of the Holy Ghost. In creation, only the land, the water, and the air aren't hypostatized, and that's why they do not give birth, and they serve only as material matter for nourishing the born hypostases, by being as some kind of the hypostases' virtual being." (Stăniloae 1995: 26)

"The difference between God and the human being, in both of their capacity of giving birth out of being and of doing something distinct through willing work, it is that God can create, by work, something of nothing too, whilst the human being can work only upon what exists." (Stăniloae 1995: 27)

"At God, only the Son and the Ghost come out of the Father's hypostatized being, the Son by birth, and the Ghost through proceeding. The universe exists due to God's willing work, and that has given the universe a being distinct from God's being. Through the work that creates another existence, God not only that He remains with His threefold hypostatical being, and through his work the man doesn't remain locked-up in his pluri-hypostatical being. From here comes the paradox: only in the fact that the universe hasn't been emanated out of the God's being, but it has been created out of nothing, and therefore much inferior to God, it is shown God's almightiness, all the more that the universe is untold great and complex in its being. If the universe had emanated out of God, it would have shown God, even by coming to existence by His will – as it is contradictorily affirmed in uniting the emanation with the will –, God's being having in Itself some imperfections which are conveyed to the universe too, imperfections impossible to be healed, so that God would have been shown as a non-almighty essence. In addition to that, it would have been shown that, this God, He wouldn't have been able to create an existence out of nothing. Only in creating the universe out of nothing, or in the universe created out of nothing, it is shown, paradoxically, the God's almightiness, so that the true God is shown, as not fatally submitted to a narrowing." (Stăniloae 1995: 27)

"A Threefold Person-God, unsubmitted to any law, He is the only explanation of the creation of an existence that is distinct from Him. Of course, the universe doesn't necessarily proceed out of His Trinity. God hadn't been forced to create the universe, just because He has in His Trinity the whole rejoicing for the life's infinity and fullness. But God has been able to create the universe for He has had that plenitude. The trinity is basis both to the possibility of creation out of nothing and for God's freedom of creating the universe, or not. And the Trinity has had in the love from within the Trinity's bosom, a motif for creating the universe. If there had been manifested the impossibility of creating, it would have meant that God lacks freedom and almightiness. But, the need for creating the universe, it would have meant an absence of the freedom and of the true almightiness within God, so that the universe that had come, thus, to existence, it wouldn't actually have been created, but it would have been emanated out of His being, on one hand as rich, and on the other hand as insufficient, on one hand as producing life, and on the other hand as causing death, better said, the it would have been the creator of a life bearing in itself the germ of the death." (Stăniloae 1995: 28)

"God were able to create the universe but He weren't forced to create it. God decided freely to create the universe. God has shown, in this too, His borderless and almighty freedom. By creating the universe out of nothing, God has shown, besides His almightiness, His sufficiency in Himself, His Person's unnnarrowed freedom, or better said, He has shown His tripersonal freedom and almightiness." (Stăniloae 1995: 28)

"Has God needed to show His borderless power by freely creating the universe, and out of nothing? And whom has God needed to show His power to? To the universe? This would have meant that God hadn't had in Himself everything He needed in order Him to be happy. Had God needed to prove His power to Himself? But, doesn't God know His power without showing His power to Himself? So, God hasn't had any need to show to somebody, or to Himself, His almightiness." (Stăniloae 1995: 28)

"God made His decision to create the universe without using some preexistent substance, for He knew He had this power. This is for He knew that He followed to create a world according to what He is, or conform to what He is in Himself. There cannot come to existence something that doesn't have a likeness to some kind of possible existence that is within

Him. The existence created by God must have a resemblance to some modes of His plenary existence. God created inferior modes too, but because these ones are necessary to the modes which are superior and more resemblant to His plenary existence. Besides that, even in the inferior modes created, there is a rationality having its basis in His supreme rationality.” (Stăniloae 1995: 28-29)

“Between the universe resemblant to God, and God as Prototype of this resemblance, there is, on one hand, an infinite distance, and on the other hand, between God and the created universe, there is a living relation which the universe is increasingly filled up through, with the kindness, with the wisdom, and with the power of the Prototype, but without being the Prototype and the universe resemblant to the Prototype, confounded in a pantheistic manner.” (Stăniloae 1995: 29)

“God is the Prototype of the plenitude, and the creation is the plenitude’s image, an image called to be increasingly filled up out of God’s plenitude.” (Stăniloae 1995: 29)

“In the God’s almightiness of creating an existence without that existence to be one with God’s being, but only resemblant to one another out of His contents and in harmonies wanted by Him, it is shown an even greater freedom of God, than in the idea that God were able to freely decide to bringing the universe to existence, if the universe brought to existence couldn’t have been except a part emanated out of His being.” (Stăniloae 1995: 29)

“According to the Holy Fathers, the universe is an image and a shadow of the godlike Prototype, and it always advances towards the content of the godlike prototype, which is especially the Word of the Father, in order the universe to be filled up with Him, especially starting with His embodiment, and fully in the future life.” (Stăniloae 1995: 29)

“The creation has been made in order to be accomplished into Christ. Here we notice the creation’s character as shadow of the truth, or of the plenary existence, meant to advance into the Word too, towards the existence’s fullness. The shadow too, it is due to the reality, or to the truth, namely to God Who is accessible to us in God-the Word. The shadow’s existence couldn’t have been explained without the reality Whom the shadow belongs to. This is the positive meaning of the shadow, as also the shadow’s connection with the reality.” (Stăniloae 1995: 30)

“God would have manifested the whole His power upon universe, if the universe had been created out of God’s being. But that universe, on the other hand, it wouldn’t have been a created universe, or a sign of God’s almightiness. That's why, the pantheistic doctrines are unable to explain the universe's insufficiencies, except through a diminution of the emanator essence." (Stăniloae 1995: 35)

"So, God lowered Himself by giving existence, out of nothing, to a limited universe, but He did that by His will, and, on the other hand, He showed, by that, His almightiness. The smallness of the created universe it doesn't show God as small too, in essence, as the emanationist doctrine presents God, but God still is limitless in His power and in His love. On the other hand, descending on the universe's level, it shows God's superior character, or His character as Person, for He did that willingly." (Stăniloae 1995: 35)

"Creating and upholding an existence that doesn't have within itself, as basis, an own substance, or the God's being, it is a power which only God can have. By that, God concretizes and upholds another way of existence, exclusively owed to His power. In this sense, one could say that God adds another kind of existence to His own existence, because no existence can be concretized and upheld without having a connection with God's existence, for His existence is the unique basis for any kind of existence; through creation, it is accomplished another possibility of existence, but one exclusively depending on God, unlike God's being, about which one cannot say that God brings it to existence as He brings the universe. This bringing of the universe to existence, exclusively by God's will, it is a God's descent too, but it is also a manifestation of God's almightiness. And this new form of existence, an existence that cannot exist without God's power, it somehow receives a place within God Himself. Thus, the descent or the self-limitation of God to the relation with a limited existence, it is, on the other hand, a comprising of that limited existence within Himself, as rightly noticed Moltmann, who said: "This doesn't mean a pantheistic dissolving of the creation within God, but it means the definitive form the creation finds within God" (quoted work, p. 10). In this we have again a descent of God, that shows God's almightiness and all-encompassing nature. Although God makes room within Himself to a limited existence, the fact that He upholds it within Himself too, it doesn't limit God, but it shows God in another mode too, as unlimited in His power." (Stăniloae 1995: 36)

"Only the conscious creatures can bring a complete praise to God, for only the conscious creatures live the joy for the existence which they have been given with. This praise is bring brought to God by angels and by people. The material and the animal natures give the people one more reason for rejoicing of their existence. This is because the animal and the material natures, they make possible to the people a complex existence, a rich one, an occasion of power to the people too, making even more obvious the God's greatness and His love for them, as sources for enriching their existence. The material and animal natures are framed, by this, within people's existence. The people cannot fully rejoice of their existence without the material and animal natures. From here we see that the material and the animal universes are created for people, for the people are conscious beings. That's why the people praise God also through the material and animal universes; the people see the God's loving greatness as descended to the people, in the existence of those two mentioned natures. Thus, through people, the material and the animal universes too, they bring their praise to God. Regardless how wonderful had been the universe, in its power and in its harmonious rationality, it would have been meaningless if the human being hadn't existed. The universe's objective and incomplete praise, it will achieve a meaning, only if included in the conscious praise brought to God by people. If God hadn't created the material and the animal universe as being unconscious, one could have said that God had created those only for Himself, in order Him to see within them His rationality and His power, namely that He had needed those. A universe without human being, regardless how rational and full of God's power signs, it wouldn't have fully shown God's power and rationality, and it wouldn't have shown, at all, God's love. Such a universe would have shown God as insufficient and, at least, as capricious in Himself." (Stăniloae 1995: 36-37)

"Our thinking's categories cannot express, except in a non-fully understood form, the mystery of God's relation with the world and with the time, in His thinking and in His will, before the universe's existence and before the time's real existence, a relation that still is a free relation. There cannot intervene within God, something that differs from His will. That would have been a pantheistic evolution. But neither He had thought the universe through Itself His being. This would have involved, at its turn, a pantheistic understanding of God, and it would have deprived Him of His almightiness. What would have liberated us from death, once the death had exited from Itself His being?" (Stăniloae 1995: 46)

"If the universe hadn't been created out of nothing, there wouldn't have been about an embodiment of the Son and Word of God, as man, neither about the human being's salvation for eternity. If that had been the case, there wouldn't have existed a God transcendent to the universe and to the human being, a God Who, by being the Creator, he is stronger than His creation and that's why God can escape the human being from death, and He can provide the human being an eternal live unsubmitted to the corruption process affecting the present universe. If this universe had been the only reality, the death reigning within universe it would have been a definitive fatality, even if the persons dying definitively would have been followed by other persons. Not the life would have defeated the death, but the death would have defeated the life, because the person's life span is short, and the death is definitive." (Stăniloae 1995: 67)

Cross /

Crucifixion

“The Cross is unavoidable on the road of surpassing the distance. Accepting the human face as His face it is itself a Cross to God. Only through the Cross the closeness is being achieved. But the Cross lets to our human being, in the same time, the freedom, despite the risk of not recognizing God under the man’s image. In this is hidden, paradoxically, a misunderstanding of the man’s value, by the people who do not accept God. But the coming closer through Cross it is a force that doesn’t cease to work for removing the distance.” (Stăniloae 2003: 219)

“All the things which are in the middle, between God and people, they need the cross. By detaching himself from things, the man comes across God Who is infinitely more than all the gifts from Him. The cross the man detaches himself from the thing by, and the tomb of forgetting about the things, the things disappear in, they bring the man towards resurrection, namely towards the eternal life, as Saint Maximos the Confessor says (Gnostic Heads, I, 66).” (2003: 358)

“Through His life and deeds too, Christ fulfilled all our pretensions, all our needs for the love of the fellow human. He fulfilled it to the end, by receiving for us the death on the cross; and through His sacrifice, which is the fulfillment of our pretense, it was manifested in the most overwhelming way the claiming power of Jesus upon us. In His passion and crucifixion, it is fulfilled His word of love, it is completely satisfied our need for the other’s love, namely what His word confesses too. In His wonders but especially in His Resurrection it is revealed also the sovereign power itself, that is manifested through His word. His deeds are absolute in the manifestation of love and power, like the resonance of His word it is absolute too.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Understood like this, the crucifixion of the Lord has, in the same time, the meaning to give satisfaction to the moral order by springing out from the divine will, and to deeply re-make, just through that, the human being. The love towards man, which He wants to truly remake, to not give him only an external forgiveness, an ineffective one, made the Son of God not only to embody Himself, but also to receive the death on the cross. If it is proven here also the divine justice, it won’t necessarily stay apart from love, but it will be comprised into love, understood in a wide sense, like a will to reestablish the man’s life in an effective way. The Eastern Fathers, who explain Lord’s death on cross, mainly through love, penetrated more deeply into the Mystery of being of God and of the man.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Jesus Christ represents more than any human individual, the humanity in its entirety. He raised on the cross not a human individual, but the mankind.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Just because God pursuits, primarily, the achieving of the satisfaction for His offended honor, or a full revenge – like the ordinary man cannot endure –, or because this is the exclusive condition on which it depends the salvation of the people, the death of Jesus Christ on the cross it is put into an exterior and juridical report with the sin and with the salvation of the people. Either it is believed like in Roman-Catholicism that the transgression of Adam didn’t damage the human nature, but it only tensioned the report between God and man, on the basis of which the death was hovering menacingly - like expression of the divine pride - over all people, or it is declared like in Protestantism, that the death of Jesus Christ for us it didn’t bring any modification to our life while we are still on earth, but it brought to us only a forgiveness, though we remain sinners; the sacrifice of Jesus it is conceived like saving through a pure juridical effect of it: God reckons that His honor or His thirst of revenge has been satisfied, so the people are brought out from under the guilt without taking place any modification in the state of their nature. It is modified only His thought towards them (Protestantism) or it is removed the death conceived like a menace and like a factor which comes from exterior and not like a consummation of the interior ravages of the sin. Into such a conception the Logos has made Himself man only for legally representing the people in His death, and not to come, like God, close to people. Also, the preservation of His humanity after His resurrection it does not appear as necessary any longer.

The justice which had to be satisfied through the sacrifice of Jesus Christ, we believe that it doesn’t imply, though, into its notion a personal ambition of God, but the care for a moral order which stays at the basis of the spiritual world. The fundamental moral law demands that the committing of the good to have an appropriate consequence for the respective subject, and the committing of the evil, as well too. It could be objected that the good deed is not done for reward, but it has the satisfaction into itself. And something analogue it could be said about the bad deed. But, also in this way we can talk about a reward of the good and a punishment of the evil, understanding through them just the satisfaction comprised inside the good and the discontent comprised inside the evil. If this satisfaction or this discontent, they hadn’t existed, the good or the evil themselves they would have become indifferent, because the reward and the punishment, by not coming like artificial juxtapositions to the good or the evil done, but like organic consequences, like a prolongation of the good or of the evil done, they would have not been felt like precise different realities which would have done those good or bad deeds. The one whom the good or the evil had been done, he wouldn't have distinguished between these ones like distinct realities. If, though, you do not have any satisfaction or any joy for this committing, what are you going to distinguish through, the good from the evil, and what are you going to distinguish the one whom you do that, with the intention of that thing becoming within him too, such an impulse?" (Stăniloae 1993)

"On one hand, Jesus has Himself to the conscience of the sin in its unmeasured fullness, like only God can see it. On the other hand, He shows the personal identity to the absolute justice of God. In the third place, by being fully identified to the sin and to the absolute Justice, He had the power to endure, everything must result out of the condemnation of the sin through the absolute Justice, for the reestablishment of His personal identification to the justice.

"On the cross, He offered, in this way, to God, like man, not only a sacrifice of ultra-obedience, but also the sacrifice of the supreme penitence, namely of the perfect identity to God in the condemnation of the sin, He Himself being so much identified to the sinners, so that this could constitute the condition to offer Himself for sin" (p. 127-128).

"The perfect penitential sacrifice of Christ, the One without sin, it is the true savior sacrifice for the sin. Only Him Who knew in Himself the measure of God's holiness, He could know in the human nature, which He has made His own, the full abyss of the sin estrangement from God, the real character of the punishing of the turning aside of God's face. Only Him Who has probed the abyss of the human conscience in report with the sin, on the basis of His inherent justice, He can condemn and to crush the sin into body" (p. 130).

Though, the sufferance and the death of Jesus are not a punishment endured by God. Here is the characteristic feature of Moberly's theory. "The suffering involved in this is not, in Him, punishment, or the terror of punishment" (p. 130)." (Stăniloae 1993)

"But the sufferings coming from the weaknesses which He was subjected to, sometime it rose to a degree in which surpassed any human suffering, precisely because He accepted the temptations, and He didn't try to bypass them. His sufferings were in a direct proportional report with His voluntary straining, of not searching to get rid of them through sin. Jesus was, in these culminating moments of the sufferings, into a situation analogue to the man who, after he assumed a great mission and faced huge endeavors to fulfill it, he walked ahead, suffering, but not allowing, even for a moment, the temptation and the regret to sneak into his soul.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“But, through these victoriously borne passions, He overcame over the sin. The sin is relieved in each man by these sufferings. They are the matter which the sin lights up in. They are the door the sin enters through. In Jesus Christ the sin cannot penetrate through their mediation. His human nature can stay against, until the finish of the sin’s assault. His passions, instead of being the fords which the sin to enter through, they were the fire zones which kept any sin at distance, by burning it in face and making it to kneel in front of His human nature¹²⁵.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“How much Jesus is tied to the deed of the crucifixion... we hardly can understand. It is a transposition of Him in the same state like when He was crucified, into the same total engagement, a painful one, like on Golgotha, but with the same voluntary and full love, like then. The words and the work of somebody, when that somebody has given all in them, they bring his person to front on any remembrance.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Because every man was compelled to bring animals for sacrifice, it is shown that everyone was, in fact, indebted to die, but they were avoiding it, with the approval of God, without the substitutive sacrifice of animals to bring them, in reality, the forgiveness of sins. In this way, the sacrifice of Jesus, which is in fact a sacrifice like God wants, as a human sacrifice, because it has made useful all the animal sacrifices, it shows its factual efficacy for all the people.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Let us insist, though, even more upon the question: why God wants a human sacrifice and not an animal sacrifice? We told that not for the better smell of the blood, but for the spiritual element, specifically human, manifested in the event of enduring the violent death. Namely, not into the involuntary enduring of such a death, because the difference between animal and man it would not be integrally accomplished then, but in the voluntarily enduring of it. The question why God wants human sacrifice, it is specified like this: why God wants the sacrifice of the man like voluntarily assuming of the sufferance until the ultimate degree, which equals with the benevolent abolishment? Only for seeing the man suffering? The answer which the Scripture gives us here is: because of the man's sin. Thereby, for God to have mercy on man, and to forgive the man's sin, and to enter the connection with the man, He pretends the sufferance tied to his auto-annulling until the end. It is here a spiritual element which the animal sacrifice does not comprise. God wants the man completely surrender to Him." (Stăniloae 1993)

¹²⁵ “The Lord undressed the Chiefs and the Dominions at the first experience of the temptations into the wilderness, healing, to the entire nature, the passion of pleasure. He undressed them also during death, uprooting, also, from our nature, the passion of pain... By taking, without sin, the suffering character of the nature, through which was working all the mean and damaging power, He undressed during, His death, the Chiefs and the Dominions which came against Him, for probation, triumphing and exposing them on cross in the time of His soul exit, like ones which have not found anything into the suffering element of the nature. While they expected to find something human in Him due to the suffering features of His body, through His power, He liberated through His holy body, which He received from us, all the human nature, from the sin mixed with the suffering element, subjecting just through the suffering element of the nature, the cunning dynasty which was sleeping just into that element”. Quaest. ad Thalass., G. P. 90, 316 C. D.

"The sacrifice aims to the removal of the sin, a spiritual remake, and it accomplishes this thing because it is the total renouncing of the man to himself and it is sufferance in the ultimate degree of intensity. The sin, by being a moral reality, it cannot be surpassed except by a moral reality too. The animal doesn't do anything in this domain. The sufferance, like a sorrow until the ultimate surrender of the man to God, it is the sole spiritual way on which it is done the effective struggle against the sin like a hypertrophy of the ego, the sole force which can be opposed to the sin. Through nothing else it can be defeated the sin from inside, and the sin can be defeated only from inside, because it is a spiritual reality, a product of the liberty and, so, it can be surpassed only through liberty. Other methods cannot defeat the sin, except by destroying the sinner. The sin is a fetus of the liberty, but it has produced a burdening of the liberty, an inert gravitation of the man towards sin, a thickening of the entire spiritual life. The sufferance like a method of sin reduction it has, on one hand, a spiritual character and a bodily one, and on the other hand, it has a positive meaning and a negative meaning. The body suffers when the will searches to limit its inertia and the hypertrophy in lusts and passions, and the spirit, it suffers too, when the will fights the pride, the vanity, the hatred, and the egocentrism. Without this self-restraint combined with sufferance, the man cannot cohabit with his fellow human in a tolerance report, much less in communion, and neither can he recognize God." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Behold how it is explained why the sacrifice of Jesus was capable to establish the new report (the new covenant) between God and people, which was impossible to be done through the animal sacrifices. The man can enter the connection with God only through a reflux of his egotism, through a sacrifice. But a total sacrifice, a total exceeding of the egotism, a creation of the capacity of man for the full communion, it was realized only through Jesus Christ. As incomplete is the sacrifice from the Old Testament, in front of the one from the New Testament, as unconsummated must have been the connection between God and people based on the animal sacrifices, relating to the one established through the sacrifice of Jesus Christ” (Stăniloae 1993).

“We have all the time, though, the duty to look at the sacrifice of Jesus Christ, not only like a power in direct connection with the man, but also under the aspect oriented towards God, namely under the aspect of expiatory sacrifice. The sacrifice of Jesus Christ it is the plenitude of the sacrifice not only for it is capable to melt down the whole fund of sin from within the human nature, but also for it is capable to obtain the forgiveness from God for all the people, without God asking from every man an equivalent sufferance for the sin from inside him.

But these two aspects of the sacrifice of Jesus Christ are closely related and interweaved. We have said that through the sufferance for sin, the subject opens his way towards God, by cutting off the obesity of the egotism that locks him up into self.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“But the force which we are penetrated through, in a decisive way, in a terrible way, by the claim of a subject at the second person, it is not his word, but his sacrifice. Your sacrifice is to me the most staggering word from you. It is raising me at the supreme ethical attitude, it imposes me the most intensive obligation, and it gets me out in the fullest way and in the most radical way, from the contemplative and egotist individualism in which I am towards things, and it puts me in serving relation towards the other.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The sacrifice of God succeeds to accomplish in the same time three things: to attract us into communion with Himself, by killing the egotistic man from inside us; to make us on this way to impart His fate of happiness and the communion with the Father, since we form a whole with Him; to fulfill the divine justice suffering for the whole of selves which the humanity forms together with Him, so His ghost of sacrifice becomes common to everybody. The order is, though, different. The last point occupies its place with the first one.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The understanding of the cause, for which the efficiency of Christ over the people it increases after the resurrection and it gains the ultimate intensity after the ascent, it can be found not only into the thesis of Sergei Bulgakov, but, on one hand, in the fact that through His sufferance to death, Jesus penetrated and He is penetrating through the human ice, it made the man to feel Him closer, and on the other hand, in the fact that through resurrection, but only through resurrection and not gradually, in the time of the earthly life, it was produced, in fact, a modification of His body, which, among other powers, it was received also that one of no longer being touched by death, and to make easier the communication of the spirit and, by this, to transmit to all the people who believe into Him, the germ of the indestructibility. A new deification of the body of Jesus and, by this, an easing of His influence over the people after the resurrection, it takes, in fact, place, but this happens not through a gradual spiritualization of Him, but through the act of the resurrection, which is, however, the reward for His crucifixion. The accent on the crucifixion it must not be thinned in order to be divided on all the moments of His life. The crucifixion, especially, it must not be transformed in an act of self-education of His human nature for deification. The crucifixion aims, in the first place, the reconciliation of the world with God. Just because He endured the death, which is the punishment of all the ones who are living in an earthly body, and the death could not keep Him, His new body received a new character.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The cross or the death for the love for God and for other people, it hadn’t had to abolish into Christ the egotism of the sin, for He didn’t impropriated the sin by His birth out of Virgin, but in His death on the cross was shown the capacity of enduring the weaknesses and the bodily death consequently to the sin, for, by being shown thus, His soul full with the power of total self-giving, as gift, of the godhead, to make the body as easily to be overwhelmed by the work of the godhead and by the light of the immortality. His death as sacrifice it is thus a mode which the body’s matter has become transparent through, to the immortality’s light. His death as sacrifice is such a mode, which the matter of the body has become transparent through, to the light of the godhead which He is united with, in the same Person.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 121-122)

Death

"If the human subjects had ended by dying, no one of them can communicate and no one can receive, infinitely, the warmth of the love, in order each of them to develop himself to infinite, as actually the man wants. The human life definitively ended through death, it hits with nonsense and therefore with non-value the whole rationality existing in the world, and the world itself. The meanings pursued in the horizon of the terrestrial life are hit, at their turn, by nonsense, and y non-value, if any human life - within which all the things seem to find their meaning - it definitively ends in death." (Stăniloae 2003: 19-20)

"(...) the man weakens in himself the spirit called to eternal life, by exclusively preoccupying himself with the passing pleasures related to the body. Those temptations represent a weakness in the living for meanings, and therefore they are a sin, and death is the consequence of this weakness, or of the sin, as being the last collapse of the reality into the lack of meaning." (Stăniloae 2003: 25)

"Even the death – and our helplessness in getting used to it – it teaches us not to attach ourselves to this world and it shows that we are created for the eternal existence." (Stăniloae 2003: 29-30)

"If death means loneliness, God, as incorruptible Life, He is the perfect communion and He gives this life to the ones who believe in Him, receiving them in this communion. The deeper the communion is, the fuller the spiritual life is." (Stăniloae 2003: 88)

"The second element of this virtual Christology within man, Rahner sees it in the understanding of the death in a meaning he saw it fulfilled in the death of Jesus. "Death is a deed the whole life is fulfilled in, in which the man as free being disposes of himself as a whole, but as this disposition is the acceptation to dispose in an absolute manner of his being, in his radical helplessness, which appears to be endured and it is endured in death. But if this free acceptance, open to the radical helplessness, through which the being who has self-control accepts to give away this self-control, it doesn't mean accepting an absurdity – which, if this was the case, it could be "rightly" refused through a protest – this acceptation involves within man – who doesn't affirm abstract ideas and norms, but the reality as ground of his historical existence -, the waiting for or the affirmation, by presentment, of the death in which the deed's dialectics is reconciled with the helpless sufferance in death". This reconciliation is accomplished in Christ, and through Him, also for us." (Stăniloae 2006: 8)

"One of those theologians, he highlights the fact that the life of Jesus is lived and the death is accepted, with the conscience and with the pure will of being a life and a death for us, the people. But this full "dedication" of His life and death to us “it is done in a dimension where is about not only of the contact of the people with one another, but where it is clear that the problem of the man it is in the same time the problem of the man’s communion with God. In this dimension, directing the life of Christ towards us it corresponds to directing it towards God.” (Stăniloae 2006: 12)

“Christ has defeated the death in Himself, for in Him, the man’s communion with God it is accomplished in a culminant manner in death, and this means that we can consider this sanctification, by employing the conception of Saint Gregory of Nyssa on death and on resurrection. According to him, the death as separation of the soul from the body it appears as a consequence of the separation of the human compound from God, Who is the force of cohesion between soul and body, as he is the cohesion force amongst all the things. Through the man’s coming back to God, This One makes again the connection between soul and body, after they have been separated, or after the connection has been weakened. But his fact could fully happen for the first time in Christ, in Whom the One Hypostasis keeps forever and ever, in Himself, both the soul and the body, and the Godhead and the mankind too. If Christ accepted the death in Himself, He accepted it only out of oikonomia, in order to occasion His godlike power to manifest itself in such a mode than to reunite the soul and the body, even after they were separated by death. For this was the situation our human nature was reaching to, consequently to the sin. Christ wanted to defeat the death by enduring it, and not by avoiding it, in order to give, on Himself, to God – and each man to give, on himself too, to God – and thus the full communion with God to be the result of the man’s effort of totally renouncing to himself, and to come and meet the communion will of God.” (Stăniloae 2006: 60)

“On this purpose, by uniting in His Hypostasis the human nature with the godlike nature, He has laid down, from the beginning, the basis of the resurrection. He has united, on Himself, as unifier principle, both with the body and with the soul. And by this, He has united, on Himself, with the soul’s movement too, for the soul wants to remain united with the body and to work to body’s fullest union - strengthening this movement of the soul through His godlike work -, but also with the body’s movement, because the body, consequently to the sin, it tends to detach itself from the soul and to decompose. But in order to fully overcome this movement of the body, He lets it go to the very end, namely to death, but not to decomposition too, or to corruption.” (Stăniloae 2006: 60-61)

“This full union of the humanity of Christ with the Godhead and, in the humanity itself, the union of the soul with the body, it is, on one hand, produced by the fact that the Hypostasis of the Word of God has assumed the humanity and, on the other hand, by Christ’s total renunciation to Himself, as man, a renunciation that has, as its ultimate point, the death.

Christ accepted the death, as man, out of total trust in God, in the fact that God was going to resurrect Him by the total union with Him, a total union Christ has realized it by totally renouncing to Himself, namely by totally renouncing to rely on Himself. But He could do this for He has had the human nature in His divine Hypostasis Who is inseparable from the Father's Hypostasis. By this, the glory of God it has been shown in Christ. This union is, in the same time, a maximum communion of Christ with God-the Father, on the ground of the fact that Christ, as Person, He is in the same time the godlike Hypostasis of the Word and, as such, He had the power to remain in total union with the Father and with the Holy Ghost, and to sanctify His humanity both by renouncing to any founding of it on itself, and also by the maximum communion with God, in Christ, as divine Hypostasis. In this context, Christ's previous purification of any egotism, and by enduring the pains and the toils related to this renunciation, it gains also the meaning of a previous sanctification, of a spiritual "mortification" for God, or for the union with God, the meaning of a preparation for their culmination in the death on cross." (Stăniloae 2006: 61)

"The death thus accepted, by being followed by resurrection, it is in the same time a definitization in this state of self-renunciation, of sanctification, and of communion with the Father. Thus, is reconciled in the Church's faith, the state of Sacrifice with the state of permanent Hierarchy and with the state of resurrection of Christ, of eternal victory upon death, of sitting on the right hand of the Father, after Christ entered the Holy of the Holies, from heavens, with His blood. Only by being in quality of clean sacrifice at the Father, or to the eternal life, Christ can imprint to us too, the state of clean sacrifice out of the power of His sacrifice, and he can bring us too, to His Father. "He enters the Holy of the Holies once, not with goat blood or with calves' blood, but with His blood itself, and he has achieved an eternal redemption" (Hebr. 9: 12). Entering at the eternal God, namely on the plan of the not-passing existence, with His blood, it means that Christ has become eternal there with His most-clean blood, due to the sacrifice he has cleaned Himself through. Christ is in state of sacrifice but, in the same time, He is in the state He has passed beyond any death in, and which any death of us - of the ones who "die in the likeness of His death" - is melted in." (Stăniloae 2006: 61)

"Between death and resurrection there is, thus, continuity. By entering the Holy of the Holies with His sacrifice, Christ remains there forever and ever, and He makes us too, partakers to His Glory (Hebr. 1: 3; 10: 12). The death passes in resurrection and, on one hand, the death remains in resurrection, and on the other hand the death is overcome forever and ever for Christ, as man, and for us, for, by uniting ourselves with Christ, we spiritually die to the former man - the man of the sin-, together with Christ. When, by dying to yourself, you unite yourself with The One Who has died to Himself for the Father and for all the people, and Who has forever and ever remained alive at the Father, you too remain forever and ever in Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 61)

“We do not need to die like Christ, in a real manner, because this would mean that our death hadn’t been abolished in His death. But we still die at the end of our life, but not by a death as punishment, for this purpose of the death it has been abolished in Christ for the ones who unite them with Him. We die, by uniting ourselves with Christ, in a “likeness of the death” (Rom. 6: 5). We die to the former man, namely we die to the sin, by remaining to endure like Christ did, the pains which lead us to death, but these pains not being mixed with the sin – and therefore not being punishments for the sin – but as means for overcoming the death and as pains of the effort of renouncing to our pleasant and sinful egotism.” (Stăniloae 2006: 62)

“The human and godlike Person of Christ, He uses the death for consummating the relation with God and with the people - but He reestablishes through this, the consummate communion, His godlike Person overcomes in Himself the death endured for the other persons. The death without the hope of the resurrection, it comes from the sin of the isolation, and the death without resurrection is one with the definitive sinking into solitude.” (Stăniloae 2006: 62)

“When Hans Urs von Balthasar considered the death of Jesus as a sinking in the abyss of being abandoned by everybody, including by the Father, he started from the Catholic and Protestant conception of Christ’s death as punishment He must endure or satisfy to the end, like any sinful man.” (Stăniloae 2006: 62)

“We must make here some distinctions: an ordinary man, especially when he doesn’t believe, he doesn’t see God in death, but such a man he doesn’t suffer, though, so hardly the loneliness he is in, for he has accustomed, on himself, not to wait for something else, and by this his conscience has been blunted. And if his conscience hasn’t been blunted, but though his habituation has made him unable to believe, then he will be desperate. Jesus suffered because of this loneliness, for he hadn’t a blunted conscience, and He knew about God and He didn’t shake at all in this certitude. In His lonely conscience He shouted out: “God, God, why have You left Me alone!”, but He didn’t fall in desperation. A proof in this sense, it is the final shout: “Father, in Your hand I am yielding My soul.”” (Stăniloae 2006: 63)

“But Christ is elevated to His full imperial power through His resurrection, for His imperial power to be manifested also in the Ascent, in sitting on the right hand of the Father, in leading the salvation work, in coming into glory and in the general judgment. After Resurrection Jesus said: "I have been given all the power in heavens and on earth" (Mt. 28: 18). And Saint Apostle Paul said: "For that God has extolled Him too and gave Him name that is above all names" (Phil. 2: 9). But Christ doesn't keep the glory He is elevates too, only for Himself, but he spreads it over us, like also His power on earth consisted in the first place in keeping the irreproachable affects under control, in order not to become sins, and he did this by receiving the death too." (Stăniloae 2006: 65)

"Christ's Resurrection as unique and creator act of God, of His intervention in this world, a world of the death without return, it cannot be understood by employing the method which the historical phenomena are known with, which in the case of the human persons, tied to the corruptible body, it always come to an end with their definitive death, as individual persons. It is what the Holy Fathers said, that the corruptness of the creation couldn't overcome itself out of itself: only Christ, as embodied God, He was able to overcome it." (Stăniloae 2006: 67)

"Through all the things will be seen the supreme Person; through all the things the persons will see one another. There will no longer be seen a nature which makes the person difficult to be noticed. We will see God, "face to face", but we will see us too, "face to face", not covered either by the nature manifested in material needs, in bodily weaknesses, in illnesses, and subjected to death, or by the nature that becomes exclusivist through all sorts of passions. In the present eon, by being imparted with Christ, we herald His death, which remains in its bodily form too, in our existence, in order to help us to fill it up and to transform it towards benefit, through our death to egotism." (Stăniloae 2006: 75)

"The earthly life needs the death as passing towards its full meaning, because of the fragmentary meaning from the earthly life is craving for the full meaning, which is given by the plenitude of life in God. Without death, understood as the gate we cross through to the full meaning, the earthly life's fragment of rationality appears to be rather as a nonsense and as inexplicable; and the world, if it must always remain in this fragmentary meaning, it would have been rather a nonsense, because, if it hadn't had nothing beyond itself, it would have led all the people to the definitive death." (Stăniloae 1997: 144)

"The Christendom considers death as a necessary and universal event. But the Christendom explains this necessity and universality through the necessity of fulfilling the human existence in the transcendent God. In this explanation the death makes a sense, and it even is an event which the life finds its sense in." (Stăniloae 1997: 144-145)

“The death is the precipice or the universal crossing bridge towards another existence, towards the eternal existence. Out of this death’s objective role it comes out a subjective role too. By and large, the death gives our earthly life meaning and depth, helping just through this to the spiritual growing up and to our salvation.” (Stăniloae 1997: 145)

“The death reveals the mystery of person of our being, the depths of the existing as person, the importance of the existence as person. The death’s mystery and the person’s mystery they belong together: where the death is no longer lived as mystery, the whole life is flattened. But the vice versa it true too, for where the person is no longer lived as mystery, the death ceases to be noticed as mystery.” (Stăniloae 1997: 145)

“The death understood as simple destruction, it is the most terrible enemy not of the species, not of the nature – in which the person can be confounded - but of the person. But the person, as the greatest mystery of the reality, as the sole form of the human being’s consciously living the reality, as the sole not-understood reality and which understands everything, or which tends to understand, he doesn’t allow being grossly himself disregarded by the most flattened understanding of this strange phenomenon of the existence. The death must represent a mystery on the measure of the human person’s mystery.” (Stăniloae 1997: 145)

“If the man had been constituted only of physic-chemical elements, the death wouldn’t have filled him up with such an unquenchable restlessness, and, in the same time, with some kind of longing for a plenary life which the man feels it beyond death.” (Stăniloae 1997: 145)

“The death gives the creation a meaning, only for it is a bridge towards a totally different existence from the existence from here, towards an imperishable existence, which has as meaning its plenitude in God, namely only for it categorically marks the huge difference between the two modes of existence, and therefore only for it is a precipice, and event which our mode of existence from here it is totally changed through. A death as an end of an incarnation for another incarnation, on a plan of the same perishable essence, it doesn’t give a meaning to the meaningless world.” (Stăniloae 1997: 145-146)

“In theological terms, the death, as being the sole crossing from here to God, it shows the transcendence of God and of our full life in Him, as fulfilling of our life. We have something from God in our life from here too, as an earnest, as the Church Fathers said. Although, the life of God and our full life in Him, they are separated by death. There is no continuity between our life from here and the life of God or our full life in Him.” (Stăniloae 1997: 146)

“On the necessity and on the universality of the death, there depend others explanation the death it has been given. They reckon the death also as a moment unveiling a meaning of the life. Two of these explain the death, without God, and they reckon that just by this they give death a meaning. One of them considers the death as a purely biological phenomenon, which the vital forces concentrated in an organism reenter the nature’s current through, in order the nature to concentrate them in other organisms. Another, it considers the death as a separation of the spirit from the body, for the spirit by himself, and not due to a divine causality, needs a life which not to be narrowed by the body. The last explanation ramifies in two. One of these ramifications it considers that the spirit, after his separation from the body, it overflows himself in a pantheistic spiritual essence. Another explanation, which is characteristic to the pre-Christian religions (or to the spiritism, which has very unclear reports with the religion), it reckons that the spirits live as persons around God and this would be without God having a role in introducing the death within world, but He still having a role as target which the death leads to.” (Stăniloae 1997: 146)

“The explanations which don’t recognize an existence as person after death, they do not see in death an event which would give the existence a meaning. What interest presents to the human person, the only one who unveils the meaning of the existence, or to whom there is a meaning of it, the fact that there is from ever, an impersonal spiritual nature, and therefore one unaware of meaning? (Stăniloae 1997: 146-147)

“The explanation affirming an existence of the spirits after death, around God, in addition to the fact that it isn’t an explanation of the origin of the death too, it cannot give enough reasons for a happy existence after death, because of God not being in this explanation a God of the communion, Who presents Himself as such in His Trinitarian existence, and in the embodiment of One of the Trinitarian Persons, as man, forever and ever, a fact that ensures the identity of the human person too, this identity surviving to death. Although, in this explanation, the death is not totally meaningless. That’s why the adherents to diverse religions can consider death, in some measure, as something positive.” (Stăniloae 1997: 147)

“Some people, mainly from Occident, being today influenced by the first two explanations of the death, but aware of the nonsense which these two explanations let the death loaded with, they try to liberate themselves from the thought of death, namely they try to cover up the death’s reality. Although they affirm the death as a natural phenomenon, they fear death, and so they implicitly recognize that the death isn’t natural to the human being at all. That’s why, these people do whatever they can in order to cover the dead body, in order they not to be disturbed, during their life, by the thought at death. O house in mourning because of the event of the death, it doesn't want to show any sign of mourning, and the dead body is taken secretly to the cemetery, or to the crematorium, and made unnoticeably to disappear." (Stăniloae 1997: 147)

"The death receives its full meaning in the Christian explanation, which sees the death as a moment in the eternal human person's dialogue with God as Person. To Christendom, though the death is the consequence of the sin, it has preserved a positive meaning too, for in it, Christ crosses us to the full communion with God, namely to a higher stage of the communion with God and, by this, on the level of the life's plenitude." (Stăniloae 1997: 147)

"In Christendom the death is taken seriously, but without despair, before taking place, in order to prepare ourselves to cross through death to the plenitude of the communion with God; and when death has happened, in order to ensure through prayers – even more –, to the deceased one, this plenitude. The death is neither slighted before happening, nor is a motif of despair after happening, nor is a reason for hastily forgetting the dead one. We do not weep the dead with the despair that their sole way of existence has vanished in nothingness, forever; but the dead ones are wept for they are a lost as help and because of thinking at the fact that they might have died unprepared. That's why, the main place is occupied by the prayers for them, on the occasion of their death, and after that, because of regretting a lost temporary help. From here comes also the obligation of remembering them." (Stăniloae 1997: 147)

"Actually, only to the Christian faith the death makes sense, both in what regards its origin and the purpose which the death has received in Christ. The Christian faith gives a totally satisfactory explanation to the death's origin, by reckoning the death as coming out of the human being's getting out from the communion with God, but to the Christian faith the death receives a positive meaning in Christ, by the possibility of being the death defeated through the restoration of the communion with God, by the faith in Christ." (Stăniloae 1997: 147-148)

"The fear of death it shown the death as not being a totally natural phenomenon, but that death has taken place as a contrary to nature phenomenon, as a weakening of the communion with God Who is the Source of the life. The Christendom explains this fear of death by the fact that the death has appeared as a punishment and consequently to the sin of the first human beings. That's why the Christian openly manifests a fear of the death's pains as separation from the body, as Christ manifested too, recognizing thus a unnatural character of the death, unlike the ones who declare, on one hand, the death as being a natural phenomenon, and on the other hand they desperately fear death – their fear being greater than the Christian's one.” (Stăniloae 1997: 148)

“The Christendom offer a remedy too, against the fear of death, for the death in Christ is a means of our elevation from the not-full and perishable life which we have descended in, to a life without death, to the plenitude of encountering Christ beyond death, after we partially have lived with Him here. And the surety of encountering him, of exceeding our emotions, we have it in His victory upon death through His resurrection.” (Stăniloae 1997: 148)

“In the present state we aren't content either to live or to die, because of not having either the plenitude of the communion with the Person of Christ, but as long as we are in sin, we fear of dying too, because of not definitively remaining outside the communion with Him due to our lack of preparedness. On his death bed, Saint Anthony asked God for a little more repentance. On the measure he advances in a clean life, in the communion with Christ through faith, the Christians surpass not only their fear of the pains caused by the separation of the soul from the body, but also their fear of what will happen after their death.” (Stăniloae 1997: 148)

“The death has appeared as an unnatural separation of the soul from the body, and consequently to the weakening of the communion with God the Source of the power and of the life, therefore as consequence of the sin; the separation of the soul from the body, being a consequence of the weakening of the communion with God, it leads beyond death to a abolishing of this bond. In Christ, being restored the communion with God, the death remains as separation of the soul from the body and by this, the Christian lives together with the other people the fear of death's pains, but in a more attenuated manner; and at the one who are strong in their faith, as for instance the martyrs, the death is totally overwhelmed.” (Stăniloae 1997: 148)

“In the fear of death, the Christian has the living sign of the death's origin in his proto-parents, a sin having negative consequences to the end of the world. But the death has become an impulse for fighting the temptations of the sin. The earthly life is the arena of this struggle to the end of the world, in order the death which the earthly body will end in, not to be a passing to the definitization in the state of non-communion with God.” (Stăniloae 1997: 148)

“By remaining in the state of soul's separation from the body, the death has become in the ones who are united in Christ, from passing to a definitization in the non-communion life with God, a passing to the plenitude of the communion with God, and therefore a passing to the life's plenitude. This is for the believer, by bearing Christ in Himself, he strengthens his own soul out of the power of Christ Who is within his soul, in order to be him able to cross through death to life, and in order to elevate his body –, which he has cleaned up of sins –, at the end of the world, to a luminous, transfigured life, at resurrection.” (Stăniloae 1997: 148-149)

“To the Christians, not only the death achieves a positive meaning, but it gives the whole human being’s life a meaning, through the strengthening in the communion with God and with the fellow humans.” (Stăniloae 1997: 149)

“The spiritual writings speak about keeping the death’s memory in mind, as waiting for us, in order out of this to take urge not to adhere too much to the world’s perishable pleasures.” (Stăniloae 1997: 149)

“The death isn’t only a destructive end, passively endured, that comes from outside, but it is also a reason of the human being’s preparation for death, through the human being’s inward action.” (Stăniloae 1997: 149)

“The more the human being makes out of death a valuating presence during the whole his life, the more he transforms the death in a crossing towards the life’s plenitude, and the more the human being fills his earthly life with more value. The death still remains a force working within human being on the direction of destroying the earthly form of his existence. But Saint Paul said: “If you live according to the body, you will die, and if you kill with the Ghost the body’s deeds, you will be alive.” (Rom. 8: 13).” (Stăniloae 1997: 150)

“Actually, our being increases on one hand, in the spiritual content, and therefore in a spiritual strength, and for a while even in the biological force, and on the other hand, our being is getting chronologically and inwardly closer to death, or the death increases in our being. Karl Rahner reckons that our being is in a voluntary movement of rounding, of accomplishment, and the death represents the final point of the accomplishing, this accomplishing meaning my taking in mastery, as person, by myself, by liberating myself of the domination of the involuntary impulses related to the body and to the world. On the other hand, he says, the weakened body escapes, increasingly more, from under my power, in order to totally escape from me on the moment of the death. Thus, on the moment of the death I reach as person the peak of power which I can reach during my earthly life and the total helplessness as biological being. The body’s helplessness in the closeness of death it puts a “cover” upon the culminant power which the person has reached at, and this cover put by death upon my strength as person doesn’t let me the power of seeing with certitude where I am going to cross through death” to the eternal life into happiness, or to the eternal life into unhappiness.” (Stăniloae 1997: 150)

“Christians’ fighting for getting mastered by themselves as persons, it is in the same time a striving for surrender themselves to God, a fact that equals to an advancing in being dead to the sin, towards the enslaving passions. This is for only by surrendering themselves to God, for a full communion with Him in freedom, the Christians really take themselves in their own mastery. What we are saying in addition to what Rahner said, it is that the human being’s taken in his own mastery it is accompanied, on one hand, by the human being’s surrendering to God, and on the other hand, by this the refusal of obeying the sinful impulses. But these are two aspects of a death in a good sense. The man dies both by the fact that he surrenders himself to God and by the fact that he becomes insensitive to the sin’s temptations. And this is being done by the human being during his whole earthly life, without ever reaching the fullness of his surrender, or the end of this effort. The one who live their earthly life thereby, once reached in front of their death, on the measure of their awareness, they crown through an act of supreme decision their taking into mastery by themselves: by renouncing to themselves and by totally surrender themselves to God.” (Stăniloae 1997: 152)

“The body’s weakening towards the end of the life and its total helplessness felt like coming closer, the Christian no longer live it as a state opposing their total surrender to God, but as a state accentuating their disposition of surrender themselves to God, which is in the same time, a taken in total mastery of them by themselves; namely, the inappropriate the state of weakness and total helplessness of the body, as a completion of their disposition to totally surrender themselves to God, of letting themselves in God’s will, of uniting themselves with Him, as a liberation of their enslaving passions and firstly of pride, which put a distance between them and God. They voluntary inappropriate the weakness and the total helplessness, as a renunciation to an existence separated from God, as a help for their fully living in union with God.” (Stăniloae 1997: 152)

“The death as separation of body from the soul and as decomposition of this thickened body, it is no longer lived as a punishment, as Rahner says, but as surrender to God, as means of union with Him, of the human being’s fuller entering in his own mastery as person, though death has its origin in the punishment from the beginning. The death remains also as a memory of the punished sin, but also as means of exceeding itself as punishment.” (Stăniloae 1997: 152-153)

“Understood as surrender to God, more or less fully accomplished on the final moment, but always present as intention and as movement in life, the death can be reckoned as the human being's complete surrender to God on the moment of death, even in the Christian taken by surprise by his death, for the whole his life lived as an increasingly fuller surrender to God it includes in itself the intention of the total surrender." (Stăniloae 1997: 153)

"The Christians have power for living the life as developing surrender to God, from Christ and into Christ Who lived and died in an exemplary surrender to His Father, for His full union, as man, with God. An example of imitating Christ, out of His power, we have it at the thief from on the right hand of the crucified One, who, through his death, he entered the Paradise with Christ - namely he entered the union with Christ in the surrender to the Father. Christ dies shouting out: "Father, in Your hands I am yielding My ghost" (Lk. 23: 46), and then "He yielded His ghost". And they say about the Christian's death that they "yielded their soul" in the Lord's hands. The Dormition of the Mother of the Lord it is represented in the Church's iconography through the taking of Her soul in the arms of Christ, of course not without Her act of surrender. The most of the Christians die into Christ, during a life of surrender or of death - in development - to God, in order they to accomplish a complete surrender, or the full entering in life through the death from the end." (Stăniloae 1997: 153)

"We received Christ's power through the Church's Mysteries. Through Mysteries He dwells within us, as the One Who gives us the power to live with Him our death towards sin, the death as surrender to God, in a continuous development, until the acceptance of the full death, as separation of the soul from the body. Our developing death with Christ, by being our surrender to God, it is in the same time our growing spiritualized life, so that the moment of the culminant death, as separation of the soul from the body, it coincides to the culminant entering in the life's plenitude. "Likewise, you, reckon yourselves as you are death to the sin, but alive in God, in Christ Jesus, our Lord" (Rom. 10: 11). "We are always bearing into body the death of Jesus, as His life to be shown into our bodies too" (2 Cor. 4: 10). "Even if our man from outside is getting withered, the one from inside is being renewed from day to day" (2 Cor. 4: 16)." (Stăniloae 1997: 153)

"If through Baptism we receive out of Christ power for this death with Him, in order us to always be alive in Him, and this death-life it has a development through our co-working, the words of Patriarch Athenagoras saying that we actualize our Baptism in death, they receive a deep meaning. The death which the Christians advance in and towards - the Christians who live into Christ -, it is a death with Christ, and that's why is in the same time an advancing in life, for Christ in Whom they advance is Christ Who, through our death with Him, He takes us to the resurrection with Him. "The existence towards death" (Sein zum Tode), which characterizes, according to Heidegger, the human existence is in Christ in the same time the existence towards the plenitude of the life (Sein zum Leben). In Christ we have the plenary life of the future age; that's why we have in Him also the death to the narrowed and corrupted life of the present age.

The advancing in and towards this life it is one with the advancing in and towards death, not in order the death to diminish it, but in order the death to clean the path towards this life" (Stăniloae 1997: 153-154)

"If the weakening of the body, which we advance towards the death through, it is no longer something contrary to our strengthening into Ghost, or to our disposition to surrender ourselves to God, the death won't appear, when it is coming closer, as cover of entering to God, to the ones who have progressed much in the life of faith and of deeds, according to the will of God. The maximum weakened body becomes transparent to the full life which is waiting for the believers into Christ." (Stăniloae 1997: 154)

"The saints and the improved Christians, they receive from God the announcement of the exact date of their death, with few days before their end, and before this end, the angels can be seen around them. The expression: "Blessed is the death of the pious ones" it refers to a state taking place just in the moment of the soul's exit." (Stăniloae 1997: 154)

"Before the soul's exit, the knowledge about the life after death it isn't a full knowledge; it is knowledge under some veil. If death is a bridge between the shores of this life and the ones of the future life, it will remain a mystery in the edge it ends. We formally know that we reach "there", but how that "there" is we do not know, except some glimmer of it, through the veil of our life into body, which starts being torn apart, or it has become increasingly diaphanous for the saints and for the improved Christians." (Stăniloae 1997: 154)

"The death has changed in Christ not only its purpose in itself, but also the experience of the ones who live it, unveiling itself as a gate towards life. The death has become not only the necessary gate towards the earthly life, but also a power of the ones who are in Christ, during their entire life on earth, power which they achieve the full life in Christ through." (Stăniloae 1997: 154)

"The death doesn't have a positive role to all the people. The death still remains to some people a dreadful event, which they attempt to escape from, through forgetfulness, or through the effort to creating in themselves a state of indifference. To them, the death remains what it has been from the beginning, a punishment for sin." (Stăniloae 1997: 155)

“Many people oscillate between waiting for death with hope or with fear, because they do not totally decide themselves for a life according to the will of God, a life lacking the ambiguities which weaken their spirit or their character as persons in Christ, in order to gain a firmer hope that through death they will cross to the full life with Him, as Saint Apostle Paul had (Phil. 1: 21). To these ones the death hasn’t yet totally changed its purpose of punishment for sin for the purpose of crossing to the full life in God, which has been achieved by the ones who live in Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 155)

“The question: why some people die in carelessness, still being given some time for getting out of this carelessness, but others die before reaching a limpid orientation in their still very oscillating life mode, or why some people die at the age of their childhood, before specifying their life mode towards God or outside God?, it has its answer in the fact that God sees in the deeper settlement of their soul that the first two categories won’t gain a fixity which they be unable to get out from; and in the case of the children He knows the direction they would move when reaching the capacity of the personal decision. Amongst the others, some of them are allowed to actualize the good which they are capable of in this life, in order to get the beautiful crown for their efforts and to be role models to others, and others, though they are on a good road, they are taken before this road to end, for they are known where they are going to walk that road or that they won’t walked it further.” (Stăniloae 1997: 155)

“Each human being’s end comes when it is appropriate to each one, and each one, except the children, must work as long as they have been given time, in order to specify, in a way or another, the mode of his living, either as a mode which can progress very much in good, or in a mode in which he cannot progress too much, either in a mode which he cannot but progress in evil through, or which remains in a definitive state of indetermination. Namely, the final death comes to some people without having time to advance in it through a gradual “death”, for it has been known they won’t make use of it; and to others, at the end of a long exercising in it, or of a long refusal of it. And to everybody the final death stays in correspondence with their exercising or with their refusal of exercising their death, voluntarily, since during their life. The ones who have refused this, they die unwillingly, towards their eternal death; the others die without fearing it, towards their eternal life.” (Stăniloae 1997: 155)

“One can say that by and large, there are two sorts of death: the death coming as a supreme weakening in spirit of the human being and as a decomposition of the body, lived as a purely negative fact, consequently to the impulses towards evil and to the pride, which separate us from God, and there is also the death as voluntary surrender to God, and therefore like a union with Him, coming consequently to the exercising in death towards the impulses towards evil and towards the tendency of a life stranger to God.” (Stăniloae 1997: 155-156)

“By reckoning that the union with God is being lived as the human being’s voluntary surrender to God, through death, we highlight that this union doesn’t annul the human person, for the surrender is a voluntary act. The eternal union with God it always has in itself the human being’s surrender act, of his mysterious death with Christ, for in this union with God the human being to eternally be maintained as person and in total surrender, always in full union.” (Stăniloae 1997: 155)

“The last source of the life with Christ, which is in the same time a death with Him, and therefore also the source of the final death, it is the love. Out of the love for God the man accepts his whole ascesis, which end in death. Out of the love for God the Father, but also for people, the Son of God received His death towards God.” (Stăniloae 1997: 157)

“To the love, the death is no longer an impenetrable veil placed over the life from beyond; for, in love we have this life while still being us here. In His love for the Father, which surpassed the love of any man, the death wasn’t to Christ a veil which to cover His life after death insomuch as Rahner argues that it covers it to us. It was painful to Him too, the separation of the soul from the body and in this it was manifested a abstaining of the godlike power to overwhelm it; but it didn’t cover the life from after Resurrection until making Jesus to doubt about it, as it happens to the ones who do not believe firmly. For he said to the thief from on His right hand: “Today you will be with Me in Paradise”. Only in the sense of the Father’s abstaining from overwhelming through the godlike power the pains of the Son’s death as man, it can be interpreted the words of Jesus: “My God, My God, what have You forsaken Me for?”. The Father remains to Christ not only a sure reality, but he is also a felt reality to Him, just in this abstaining of Him from overwhelming the death through the godlike power. This shouting out it has its oikonomia too. Through this shouting out Jesus shows us that out of His desire for uniting Himself as full man with the Father, he accepts the death’s pains, in order us too, to learn how to accept them, out of the same desire, and therefore out of love for Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 157)

“Saint Maximos the Confessor categorically affirms and activity of the soul after death, no matter the soul would be at good or at bad, because he reckons that without an activity the soul will no longer exist, the activity belonging to the soul’s reality.” (Stăniloae 1997: 183)

“The Church prays for the soul of the deceased one: “Into Your resting, rest, Lord, also the soul of Your servant, where all the saints are resting”. It is the resting in the infinity of the love of Christ, towards which aims the movement of the one who believes in Him. It is the happy life. Properly-said, Christ is “the resting and the life” of the soul. In Christ, the man finds again his state of cleanness and communion from the beginning, of the development of the image into likeness, which is the full actualization in God. All the savior deeds of Christ are mentioned in the songs from the burial as deeds whose savior fruit it is asked for in order the deceased one to be imparted with it. It is mentioned the Embodiment too, in order to be invoked the Christ’s love for people: the Resurrection which He has defeated our death through.” (Stăniloae 1997: 191)

“There is a strong belief that Christ, Who has made Himself man out of His mercy for all the people, in order to save all the people (1 Tim. 2: 4), in order to unite all the people and to reconcile them into Himself, in His loving heart (Col. 1: 20; Eph. 1: 10), namely all the people to come to the love for one another which He urged us to (Jn. 15: 12), He rejoices and He takes in account this manifestation of love from everybody for the soul that might be close to his eternal perdition. The Church from earth prays Christ with tears, and it asks the angelic world and the Church from heavens for associate themselves with the Church from earth in an immense and cosmic prayer towards Christ, in order Him to place the soul of the deceased one in the group of the righteous. All the living people gathered around the body of the deceased one they thing with lenience at the weaknesses of the deceased one, and with a total impulse to forgive him for everything, for they think at their weaknesses too, and they ask Christ forgiveness for their own weaknesses, in order they to be forgiven at their turn. Not the crying for they have lost a kinship, an acquaintance, a helper and valuable man, it mainly dominates the people gathered on this occasion, namely not the thought at the past, or at the hardships which they will remain with, but they are gathered there in order to pray with tears for the deceased one to be forgiven, and not to be condemned to the eternal toils. The deceased one continues to exist, and his future faith preoccupied them in a main mode, his faith depends on their hearts, more than the regret for the deceased one. The burial religious service is everybody’s manifestation of love for the deceased one, of reconciling with him, of everybody’s prayer for his eternal life in happiness. Everybody wants the eternal happiness of the deceased one, without any shade of envy, for seeing him in the supreme state of helplessness and of waiting for the mercy of God and for the prayers of his fellow humans. This is about a bursting out of everything that is good in the depths of the human beings. “Come, brothers, let’s give the deceased one the last kiss”. The Son of God, Who was driven by His mercy for people to make Himself man, he sees His mercy fructified in everyone’s mercy for their brothers. The Church strongly believes that this mercy and prayer of everyone, fructified out of the mercy of the Son of God become man for us and out of our trust in His mercy, it is impossible not to be felt in the judgment of Christ. The whole Church on earth – this is for the priest by having next to him the churchly community he represents the whole Church he is in communion with – and the Church from heavens are united in prayer around this human soul. Here is shown the priceless value of a man, but also the importance of the communion with the Church. Each burial religious service is an occasion for strengthening the Church's unity in love. The universality of the Church is a manifestation of a great importance for the eternal fate of each soul. "Do all the time, into the Ghost, all kinds of prayers and requests, and into this take vigil, by praying for all the saints", namely for all the Church's member, urged us Saint Apostle Paul (Eph. 6: 18). And as in the Church that prays, the Ghost Himself prays, or in the Church's solidarity as body there is Christ Himself, one can say that Christ Himself moves through His Holy Ghost the Church to unite in prayer, again and again, for each soul of a deceased believer, for He wants to forgive and to save that soul, if that soul believed in Christ's power to save him, and if He sees in the prayer of the multitude that that soul wasn't totally unfruitful in their lives." (Stăniloae 1997: 201-202)

"In the same time, this lonely death could have the renewal efficacy for the un-destroyed creation. The death of the Son of God - the embodied One -, it was the explosion of an unlimited source of love and of spiritual power, overflowing like the burning lava into all un-hardened consciences and transforming them from ground up. The sufferance for the other one it is the most accentuated launch of the own power towards him. This sufferance, through its definition, it breaks the limits of the self of the one who suffers, by getting with a conqueror moral power into the one for whom he suffers. The sufferance for the other it is a power which is not only into the one who suffers, but between him and the one for whom he suffers, by bonding them both into a unity. This one it is the most important ring of the communion chain. It is everywhere an explosion of power from the one who suffers, with the goal to attract the aimed ones into the sphere of a new life, of a life in communion. But the death of the Man-God it was an explosion from the abyssal center of the existence, which outpoured His spiritual loving power on the range of the entire humanity, by burning with supreme intensity and efficacy. The Blood of the godlike Lamb, which does not end ever to flow and to be imparted, it has a real cleansing power, upon all the ones who are imparted with It.

The re-creator earthquake, caused by His sacrificial death, it propagates like a permanent actuality for and into every man who comes to the conscience of this sacrifice which holds in it the entire world until its end. On each day and, especially in the moment of the Holy Eucharist, the Christian lives the actualization of this quake, shuddered by the size of the sacrifice which must to be brought for him and under his power breaks the decayed shape of his being and he catches the new consistency. Into an uninterrupted moan for the own sin, which upholds us to continuous seeing His blood which we are imparted with, a moan which comprises, in the same time, the joy of the salvation, as well as the thank brought to God for the sacrifice which He has escaped us through, it is effected the salvation of each new generation of people that comes into the world. Without tears for our sins, without the crying of the repentance, we won't be saved, but this crying is mixed with the certitude of the salvation and it becomes to us a possibility, through the death of the God-Man." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Dying to us, without ceasing to exists to ourselves, but existing now for Jesus Christ, in communion with Him, in the dual whole which has Him like a center, we also share His situation in front of the Father. The higher form of existence, giver of happiness, it is not the one of isolated egotism, neither that of merger of the selves into a big divine whole, but into the dual unity, in which not any self, lives for himself, but, being dead to his self, he lives for the other and into another.

This is the meaning of the words of the Holy Scripture on the necessity of our death in order to be able to live in Christ and for Christ." (Stăniloae 1993)

"What death is? Nobody can give a satisfying answer to this great question. For such an answer one should experience the death not only from outside, like a phenomenon endured by others, but also from inside. That being so, we must content ourselves with what we experience in the death of the others, and further to base ourselves on the certitudes produced in us by the profound intuitions of our being, like also on logically derived considerations from certain real data.

What we experience with our external senses in the death of our fellow humans is a man's ceasing to exist like a subject in our world. He remains a simple material object, on in a rapid decay.

The continuation or the not continuing of the existence of the human subject after his physical death, it depends not on the natural laws, but it depends on a power which must have a character superior to these laws, a character of a subject, but superior to the human subject.

The experience of the death of the others it sends us, in what concerns the continuation or the not continuing of the existence of the human subject, to faith: I believe that the superior subject, who has brought a subject to the existence, he will keep the subject into existence henceforth too, or I believe that he won't keep that subject in existence. The lack of faith is also a belief, but into a negation. The unbelief does not base itself, more than the belief does, on experience." (Stăniloae 1993)

“By and large, two conclusions can be formulated from the reality of the death and from the general attitude in front of it. First, death is something scary to our being, an event which does not suit the human being, which the human being wants to escape. This means the death is experienced like a punishment; like a universal punishment for humans, from the supreme Creator of the world. So, we all bear a guilt in front of Him, and like a sanction for this guilt, we must endure the death. In the second place, almost all the people, near to the end, believe that they will not cease through to exist, and this belief it has, among others, its reason into the intuited fact and experimentally possible to be argued, that the reality of the subject it is not produced by the physical – chemical factor of the material organism. The deep belief of our being, like the intuition and the logic makes us to admit that no man totally ceases to exist, or that there is a possibility to be resuscitated to a new life on another plan of existence. The revelation which produces in us the full certitude, it confirms us both the faith that no man totally ceases to exist through the disappearance from the plan from here, and that, besides some people who will continue an existence which will only be a torment, a mix of being and of not being, there are some people who, through the divine intervention, for they have used the life from here to reduce their guilt, they will be partakers, after their death, to an existence happier than the one from here.

In this way, the death is, like both the conscience and the Revelation tell us, a punishment from God, but of such a kind that it doesn't exclude His mercy. The death exists according to a general human sin, but it is possible to not have, for some people, the meaning of a punishment, but that one of a passing into a fuller life.

The death concentrates in a bipolar tension both the destruction, like a sign that the humanity in its whole it attracted to herself this consequence, but also the possibility of the salvation, despite the whole consumption of the destruction. The salvation is accomplished through Jesus Christ. But even when the salvation it is not accomplished, the destruction through death is not a final act, but there it follows an existence on another plan, which bears though, into a certain way, the presence of the death, by being reduced to the minimum and, of this it consists its torment. At least in a tormented way, the existence continues after death, like a sign that God, even if He destroys the life of the man on the plan from here, He does not want the man's total lost, but, if there was a little effort from the part of the man too, He would turn the death in the man's benefit.

The death has, thereby, a close connection with the sin. The death is the payment for the sin, and in the same time, the abolishment of the sin on the seen plan. The death is the last conclusion of the sin and it means the disappearance of the one burdened with sin, from the world from here. The world must see that the sin brings the death. Since this life, the man must learn that the sin receives the punishment of the death with regularity without any exception. The refusal of the communion with the fellow human it is a torment. The refusal of the communion with God it is the torment brought to the last conclusion: the death. God has placed this order not arbitrarily, but according to His being. He punishes with the abolishment on this plan seen and with the reducing to a tormented and distorted minimum, on the eternal plan, of the one who exited the communion with Him.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The death, even if it is followed by a tormented existence, or by a happy one onto another plan, according to how the man is not forgiven, or it is forgiven by God, it has, in any case, a connection with the universal-human sin, and it is the fate of every man after the sin has entered the world. It is an element of the historical structure, in which the human life develops after the sin. Through this we do not want to say that the history itself started through a sin and that, consequently, to its definition belong, necessarily, the sin and the death. This thesis is sustained by the dialectic Protestant theology¹²⁶, and from the Catholics, for example, by Oskar Bauhofer¹²⁷. The fact is that the history, in its actual structure, it has the death like a necessary element (Ro. 5: 12). This axiom is due to the fact that everybody who is born into history on a natural way, he inherits the hereditary sin. Nobody is born without sin and nobody escapes death amongst the ones who emerge in history through the natural concurs of its factors. Any man is, immediately after he is born, a candidate to death (Sein zum Tode), by the fact that the death is a result of the sin. Any natural man enters the history through the gate of the sin and exits it through the gate of the death. The Orthodox faith differs, though, from the Protestant one, henceforth, because it doesn't draw out of these elements the conclusion that it is not possible to live without sin, that the historical life and the sin are one. It is true that the natural entrance into history it is done through the gate of the sin and it is also true that the living through the exclusive powers of the history it is a living into sin, but it is not excluded the entrance into history on a way which comes from above, neither is excluded the living into history through the help of some powers from God. Jesus Christ, by being the Son of God, born like man through the work of the Holy Ghost, He is a proof to this. The existence of the saints is another proof. The Protestants deny the possibility of the holiness, and on Jesus Christ, when they do not make Him exclusively man, they place Him into supra-history. The Catholic Bauhofer places Christ, also, into supra-history, for the reason that He had no sin

¹²⁶ E. Brunner, Der Mittler, p. 516: „Die Geschichte beginnt ert den Toren des Paradiesses, als da unter dem Fluch des Todes und des Gesetzes stehende Leben“. See also W. Künet, Die Lehre des Sünde, Gütersloh, Bertelsmann, 1927.

¹²⁷ “Das Geheimnis der Zeiter”, München, 1935: “Todverfallenheit heist Geschichtlichkeit”, p. 70.

and He should not die, though, at least in what regards the sin, he recognizes the reality of the holiness into history.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Christ affirms, at Jo. 8: 12, the connection between light and life, but also the opposite one, between darkness and the absence of the life, namely the death. In death remains the man who doesn’t follow Christ, or who doesn’t have Christ, within himself, as luminous light. Therefore, by saying indirectly, that that man doesn’t have the light of the life, Christ shows that the life is luminous light, and this light is Him. That’s why, the one who doesn’t follow to Christ, he doesn’t have the light, namely the life, and he remains in darkness, or in death. It isn’t about a darkness that covers the life, as the night cover, temporarily, the day’s light, but it is about a darkness that deprives the life of a meaning, and, by this, it deprives the life of its essential content. If Christ is no longer lived in our life, or if our life is no longer transparent to Christ, if we no longer see Christ as target of our life, we won’t know what we are living for. This is because without Christ, as the One Who provides us the eternal life, if we no longer see the life within world as a path leading us towards the eternity into Christ, neither as an environment which we live an actual connection with Christ through, in Whom our life is being deepened and out of Whom our life nourishes with a content above the perishable content, then everything will become monotonous and passing and, therefore, it will be lived as a death.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 48)

“The death has been let by God, to the people, not only as punishment for sin, but also as means for bringing to God, as sacrifice, the life, in order to escape death. This happened through Christ Who defeated the death through His power, by sacrificing Himself, the One without Sin, for the sin of the entire world.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 85-86)

“The fact that the corruption of the body’s material matter, and the death, still remain within the ones who entered the connection with God through Baptism, it has several causes:

1. The spirit has remained in a state of weakness that doesn’t allow the spirit to come back to the mastery the spirit had upon the body, at the beginning, though some ascetics reach far away in mastering their body’s material matter;
2. The material matter has received a rigidity that can no longer be defeated by spirit, so the spirit is no longer able to make the body’s material matter elastic towards the spirit’s action and easily to be brought, through resurrection, to a full transparency to God. These two causes have been defeated by Christ, for in Him the body has been taken in godlike hypostasis;

3. the corruption and the death have remained as general law of the human bodies, in order to allow the baptized human being to advance, through his own efforts, into happiness, at the end of the creation's present mode of existence. That's why Christ doesn't allow the power of His resurrected body to be poured upon the whole material matter of the world and upon the people's bodies in the present life, so that they aren't elevated out from the rigidity and opaqueness they have consequently to the falling. The future world's material matter and of the resurrected bodies, it will truly be an eternally young matter, for the spirit will eternally be powerful in the full union with God, by overwhelming the material matter without abolishing it. Then, the matter will appear as it is in its essence: a luminous energy (a dark energy in hell) easily and clearly imprinted by the spirit, elevated into body to a spiritualized sensitiveness." (Stăniloae 1995: 87)

"The fact itself that the human being feels the need for exceeding the universe, through his superior and of another order necessities, or the fact itself that the human being is proven by this as superior to the universe, it shows that even the human being's death, as separation from universe, it cannot be a human being's end, but it is rather the fullest way of transcending the universe. The fact itself that the universe appears to the human being as perishable, and by this the human being can and he must adopt a superior attitude regarding the universe, it shows that the human being is imperishable; this fact itself makes the universe transparent to a superior plan of life. The universe is not transparent to the human being when he is totally sunken in what the universe can offer him, and when the human being reckons the universe as the ultimate reality, when the human being doesn't see, on himself, as having to cross through universe, beyond universe; and the universe is perishable to the human being because of not satisfying except the perishable needs of the human being." (Stăniloae 1995: 121)

"The human being cannot live, even for a moment, as locked up in present. The human being is never satisfied with what the present gives him. The human being hopes for something more, in the future. The human being hopes that he can get rid of the present hardships, in the farer of in the less far future; he hopes that he will have more than the present offers him; or he hopes that he will remain in the present happiness he has. The human being is always transcending on himself, towards future. He never reckons that he has reached the end of his road, or that he has everything and forever, in the present. Even about death, the human being doesn't believe that it will end his existence. The human being aspires towards absolute, an absolute which cannot be given him during his present life in the material body. This determines the human being to seen in death not a final, but rather a passing, namely to see in death something positive. The man believes he will reach the absolute by crossing through death, from this life that doesn't have the absolute. Thus, the human being no longer fearfully only waits for his death, but he also waits for it with hope. The hope seeded within the human being it doesn't allows him to admit that his being is destined through death, to a total ending. Heidegger, who analyzed several traits of the human being, he didn't see the existential trait of the hope. That's why he concluded that the human being is "an existence towards death". One can say that the human being is an existence towards death whether we only consider his life in the present material universe. But the hope cannot admit that the existence in the material universe is the only one the human being has." (Stăniloae 1995: 130-131)

"The human being cannot reach the immortality with his body, because through sin, the connection between the human being and God it has been weakened, and the power of the human being's spirit for overwhelming the body's impulses towards pleasure - and by this making the body immortal and making the universal matter immortal, through the collaboration of a consummate communion with his fellow humans." (Stăniloae 1995: 145)

"The death, which every human life in the material universe ends in, it hasn't been imprinted to humanity by the Creator. God hasn't created the human being as knower beings and with powers to transform the universe, as beings capable of endless advance, only to die. The death has been introduced through the people's voluntary separation from God Who is the Source of the life. Once introduced within universe, it was impossible the death to be removed from the material universe by the people themselves, no matter how much they wanted. That's why God Himself undertook the defeat of the death. On this purpose, the Son of God has made Himself man, in order to defeat, in His humanity, the death for all the people. And He didn't defeat the death by not receiving it, for the victory upon death couldn't have been complete if the death hadn't really taken place in the One Whom the death power was exercised upon, to the very end. Only thus the everybody's human nature has been imprinted with the victorious power upon death." (Stăniloae 1995: 187)

"The Son of God, by embodying Himself, he used the death itself in order to defeat the death. He turned around the death's meaning. Instead of being a means to pass to the lowest degree of existence, He used the death as means of defeating the death and of entering the eternal life, as man. God gives thus, in his embodied Son, a positive purpose, even to death." (Stăniloae 1995: 187-188)

"The death receives, firstly, the positive purpose of highlighting and of upholding, by being the deaths' perspective and the death itself endured by the human being, the truth of a higher life. This truth was firstly affirmed by the Son, through His word and life. By that He attracted His violent death from a public force, a force guarding on the existent level the order of the human life. Christ attracted His death because He didn't obey the interdictions of that force, for He was calling the people to a higher life, to more sincerely fulfill their duties towards God and towards their fellow humans. Sometimes the force punishes the ones who do not obey its laws, with death. And the force punishes also the ones who call the people to a life higher than the reciprocally tolerated compromise belonging to an external regime of a not too high level. Christ has made out of the sacrifice of His life, a means of attracting the people towards a life of more brotherly relations amongst them, through the love He shows to God and to people." (Stăniloae 1995: 188)

"The truth preached by Christ and which He endured the death for, it consists of much more. He endured the death for He presented Himself as the embodied Son of God Who came to escape the people through His death. He says this for several times: "For God loves the world insomuch that He has given even His Only Begotten Son, for whomsoever believes in Him to have eternal life" (Jn. 3: 17). And: "The Son of Man hasn't come to be served, but to serve, and to give His soul as ransom for many" (Mt. 20: 28; Mk. 10: 45). He lets us understand the same thing on each time he says that: "He will be given to death, but He will resurrect on the third day" (Mt. 14: 21; Mt. 20: 18-19). But by being given to death for the mankind (Jn. 9: 31), by being not only a man but by being God too, He defeated the death. Also, about defeating the death, by dying Him for all of us, Jesus speaks, according to John the Evangelist, when saying: "I will elevate Myself from the earth and I will attract everybody to Me. And He said that in order to show what death he will die of" (Jn. 12: 32-33). About defeating the death through death, Jesus speaks also when He says: "Crumble down this temple, and in three days I will erect it again". Saint John the Evangelist added here: "And He spoke about the temple of His body. After he resurrected from dead, His disciples remembered that He told this, and they believed the Scripture and the words said by Jesus" (Jn. 2: 21)."

(Stăniloae 1995: 188)

"The Savior told us that He was to endure the death for many, in order the new life - which He will elevate Himself after His death with, by defeating the death - to be beneficial to all people; He told that also on the occasion of the Last Supper, by declaring: "Drink this, all of you, for this is My blood, of the new covenant, which is shed for your and for many, towards the forgiveness of the sins." (Stăniloae 1995: 188)

"Jesus was given to death especially for he said that He was the Son of God Who came to escape the world from death, through His own death. The will of the public force to submit Him to death, it encountered His will to receive the death, in order Him to defeat the death.” (Stăniloae 1995: 188)

“It was unavoidable, to a society which the religion was founded in, on the idea of a God Who cannot make Himself man, in order to die for the people, namely to a society which couldn’t understand this and which couldn’t allow its order to be shaken by the faith in such a God, to give to death the One Who was contradicting the foundation of that society’s order, as it was also unavoidable that the embodied God, to defeat the death by accepting the death, and not by avoiding the death.” (Stăniloae 1995: 188)

“The death endured by Christ it will create in us, if we unite ourselves with Him, a new state, a state of ceasing the egotistic and passionate attachment to the material universe’s things, as state of self-giving to the Father, and to His will of loving us, and of loving one another. And this gives us the strength of defeating the death.” (Stăniloae 1995: 190)

“The death is thus, itself, on one hand, a gate for entering the Christ’s humanity – and after, also of all the ones who unite themselves with Him – to the state of supreme encounter with God, the state of supreme intimacy with God, as state that remains as such into Christ, a state which Christ elevates increasingly more at, the ones who impropriate His death through union with Him. That is a state of the human’s transcendence towards God Who is absolute, namely Who is independent of everything.” (Stăniloae 1995: 190)

“The death of Christ is in reality a killing of death understood as locking up in the opaque narrowness of the live within the material body and within the material universe, of the live that, after short pleasures, it leads to death. Christ’s, and our death, out of the union with Him Who dies and Who has resurrected, it is the total transcendence towards the union with God, for Christ as man towards the consummate union, for us towards an ever-tighter union, up to the full union with Christ and with the Father. Christ was placed by His death as Sacrifice on the right hand of the Father, and He is working there with maximum love for us, the love He showed on the cross, for the eternal consummation of the ones who believe, and working also for the definitive submission or for totally depriving His enemies of power, namely the demons and the ones who won’t believe in Him. To the last ones He can give, during the course of this life, also the power to change themselves, and He takes their power from the demons, in the sense that the tempted people can fight in this life against them, and the people can become spiritually strong.” (Stăniloae 1995: 191)

“Our death’s killing, the death being understood as locking up in the narrowness and in the darkness of the opaque life within the material universe and within body, and as final death of the material body, it has taken its power from the power of Christ's death, through His resurrection. This is told in the Epistles of the Saint Apostles. These Epistles describe the righteousness state as equivalent to this killing of death by the ones who unite themselves with Christ. The one who has escaped the death, the death understood as such an opaqueness, they become transparent to the Immortal Son of God, embodied as man and resurrected, and Who communicates His life to the righteous, together with the power they to communicate themselves to others. This is for Christ, once resurrected with the body, the righteous have Him in total transparenence and communication, towards a consummate communication to others." (Stăniloae 1995: 191)

"The death has brought to Christ the extolling of the humanity (Phil. 2: 9), not as a payment given externally, but by it enduring itself, or by the fact that the power of this enduring in action, it was the crossing towards the life victorious upon death." (Stăniloae 1995: 192)

"Even after suffering and death, Christ defeated the suffering and the death, proving Himself stronger than they. This was not only because His humanity was in conscious and unimpeded communication with God, because His humanity was sinless, but also for He received the suffering and the death of His humanity not for Himself, but out of His all-generous mercy, and therefore full of power, for His brothers or for His children. His suffering and His death didn't have in themselves the power to push Him to sin, for they didn't have their origin in His personal sin, but they were simple occasions for altruistic sufferance for the others, and also for defeating them by enduring them with the whole strength. The suffering and the death weren't occasions to make God even more non-transparent to the humanity. By enduring the suffering and the death, He showed Himself as even more understanding and even more merciful on His brothers in humanity, and He has given us the example and the power for fighting, at our turn, for our liberation from under the slavery of the body's weakness, by attaching ourselves to God Who is the Source of the spiritual strength and of the freedom. This was for – out of mercy on others – He took power and He gave power for patience, for defeating the pains and the death. This is for the merciful one exceeds on himself, out of love, all the way up to suffering and to enduring the death, for others, with strength. The mercy and the love increase the powers for enduring the suffering and the death. And in Christ Who is also God, the patience out of mercy it had so much power that it overwhelmed the suffering and it elevated Him from death." (Stăniloae 1995: 192)

"Christ as man, by self-giving to the Father for His brothers, He has ascended as no one else, on the height of the total union with the Father, in His humanity too, as he was in His godhead. And on that height will be able to accede His brothers too, if they receive Him as sacrifice brought for them, namely if they are penetrated in their souls by His sacrifice. The one who willingly self-sacrifices, he lives as liberated from all enslaving things, and even as liberated from himself: he lives as partaker to the Person-Absolute, especially when he self-gives to Him. Christ, he defeats as no one else, the death through his death, for in accepting the death by Him, as total self-giving to the Father, for the ones whom He made as His brothers, out of love, it was manifested a loving strength of His person, towards the Father, for the people. And the strength which He enters the state of death with, namely the strength of renouncing to an inferior mode of life, which is in the same time the power for entering a superior mode of life, it was coming to Christ out of His godhead. That power was received by Him with His sinless humanity, through all the power potentially being within it, and that was potentiated at maximum through the union with the godhead. A humanity liberated from the sin's weakness, and which has become by this too, totally transparent for the Godhead Whom the humanity was united with, in communication with the Godhead and penetrated by the Godhead, it actualizes in itself untold resources, increased by the strength coming to it from God, for the victory upon the greatest human weakness. This is for, by being dead, in Christ, all the impulses which separate the humanity from God, Christ's humanity fully opens to God's powers." (Stăniloae 1995: 192-193)

"The Christ's state of death, as state of passing towards the new life, which he accepted for God and into God, we receive it through Baptism, when we confess the faith in the power given us by receiving Him in the state of death as state of passing towards resurrection and Holy Trinity, out of the love and therefore also out of the power of Whose the baptized one is going to live, for the sin's affects are weakening and their weaker attraction is going to be overcome. That's why we are baptized in Christ's death, in the name of the Holy trinity. We are baptized in the love of Christ Who died for us, in order to elevate our humanity to a live above death; and we also are baptized in the name of the Holy Trinity Whose love has been brought to us by the Son of God, by making Himself man and by dying for us." (Stăniloae 1995: 193)

"The Christ's death, which we bear within us, it is equivalent to His life without affects, which He has passed to. That's why we can also defeat any temptation or hardship, by remaining into Him. Only our will can separate us from the life into Him. The death into Christ as superior life, it has killed the death of the sinful life, the sin being a weakness driving us towards the definitive death, a weakness that only apparently had power upon us: "Brought down, but not destroyer; always bearing into body the death of Christ, as the Christ's life too, to be shown into our body" (I Cor. 4: 10). The death of Christ towards the life into sins, it must be definitive within us, in order to resist through its strength, on each time the death from the sin, or the external temptation, they try to enslave us.” (Stăniloae 1995: 193-194)

“Christ didn’t remain in the state of death except insomuch to be possible one to see that He really died, namely until the third day. The full union with the Father, as sacrifice, it brought Him, without delay, the state of resurrection. This shows us that one doesn’t reach the resurrection without crossing, first, through the death as sacrifice, but not only to be shown that we must cross from this mortal body to the immortal body, but also for the state one reaches through the death as sacrifice it is a state of full union with God, so that is totally superior to the union lives in the mortal body. It is a state which crossed through death to, the one who will resurrect, Christ reached the resurrection immediately after the state He entered through the death received as sacrifice, but we will reach it at the end of this material universe, when the entire material matter will be transfigured, after serving, in its actual form, to all the people from after us, towards their spiritual growth, and towards receiving, in this mortal body of ours, the Christ’s death. This is also for us to pray here with understanding, for the ones who lived before us. The without delay resurrection of Christ, it is His extolling (Phil. 2: 9) for He was the first to willingly receive the death as sacrifice, in order Him to be the hope of the resurrection of all of us, and attraction center towards our resurrection. The resurrection of Christ foretells the full “crossing” from the life enslaved to the nature’s laws in the present state, to the life out of the Absolute God, in Whom the material matter will be elevated into the Holy Ghost, above the laws which enslave it, and through which the matter enslaves the human being.” (Stăniloae 1995: 196)

“The state of our death towards the egotistic pleasures, it is a higher level which the human being ascends on, in his transcendence. Through the death with the body, accepted through faith, the human being will ascend on an even higher level. And the resurrection with the body will be the passing on to the higher level. The state of the death towards the sin, it is a victory upon the too much dependence of the human being on the material universe, and on the body reached in a slavery to the material universe, through sin, or through the weakening of the connections with the Person-Absolute. The state of the death with the body it will be a complete liberation of the body from under these dependences. But the state of resurrection will be the elevation with the body, by the soul elevated on the level; reached through a greater penetration of the soul by God, since the bodily death, on to the level of consummate transparence of God through the whole human being. By that, the soul is reunited with the body and with God, on the highest level, in the likeness of Christ. The whole human being is restored, but on the supreme level of transcendence and by the full transparence of God through the human being, like Christ, and in maximum union with Christ.” (Stăniloae 1995: 196)

“The death came to the man as something contrary to nature. The man feels that in the fact that he cannot reconcile with the death, in the fact that the death is a principal and permanent problem to him. That’s why, even his nature tells him that he cannot be destroyed by a total death, for within man there always remains a thirst of knowledge and of communication, even if his knowledge is reduced to knowing the nature’s laws and to knowing his fellow humans, as unsatisfactory entities. Even in this the man can have a certain advancement, though an inessential one. The man remains even in his relations with his fellow humans with the desire to impose himself to them increasingly more, in order to use them increasingly more.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 15)

“Christ hasn’t defeated only the death of the spirit into the assumed humanity, but He has also defeated the death that was prolonged into the humanity’s body. But He hasn’t defeated the death by keeping the body untouched by death. This is for, the Son of God by assuming the humanity, He has taken upon Himself also the responsibility of the humanity towards God, in the last analysis a responsibility towards the Father as supreme Life Source. He hasn’t remained only as the One Who has strengthened our quality of persons who think and who speak to one another and who answer Him and to the Father - Him being the supreme Word -, but He impropriated in the same time our quality as liable people. This quality had to go, because of the sin, to the total surrender of our life to the Father, in order the sin to be overcome. But we weren’t able to willingly accomplish this requirement, because that would have equaled the exceeding of the sin by ourselves. But, as we are unable to escape the death, we would have been dying unwillingly. That’s why we weren’t either able to defeat the death, once entered within our nature, without becoming a voluntary surrender of the humanity to the Father, namely a surpassing of the sin.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 16-17)

“In Christendom the body’s death has two specific meanings. Like the life, likewise the man’s death bears within the paradoxical character of the man’s being. For the man dies, but his being is created for immortality, the death is to man an unnatural phenomenon, a phenomenon of offence and pain. The death is the event projecting upon the entire mankind a tragical shadow. The animals die too, but because of not having conscience, they aren’t preoccupied, in a tormenting mode, with the death. The death preoccupies the man in a tormenting manner for the man is a conscious creature and he has seeded into his conscience the will to not die, but to last forever. And his conscience reflects what his being feels. Thus, the death and the man's conscience or being, they are in an irreconcilable contradiction. Through conscience, namely through his being himself, the man opposes death, for he wants to defend himself against death. Through will, the man is contrary to death, besides his conscience, as inalienable features of his being, but the death defies the man's conscience, being, and will, and it seems to bring all things to an end." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 21)

"The conscience, following the being, and the will as another expression of the being, they do not accept defeat. Although they cannot avoid the death, the conscience inspired by the human being himself, it cannot accept the thought that the death has the last word. The conscience associates this state to the ascertainment of the unique value of the person and of his fellow humans, but also to the fully rational judgment that the so valuable person cannot be the product of an unconscious nature, but the man is the work of a Being of the same quality, but Who is immortal, and Who will give the immortality to persons created by Him - if those persons, during this life, they remain or strengthen themselves in the connection with Him, despite the fact that the body's death seems to be unavoidable." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 21)

"The fact the death is essential to the man who can see his value as unique person, it is shown by the fact that only a few people can chock down they fear or their sadness when thinking at death; this thought shows its importance also its beneficial consequences in the ennobling of the man produced by this thought." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 21)

"On the importance of the thought of death, for the man, the Holy Scripture speaks too. The Scripture presents, on one hand, the man as created by God-Person, as a person, who receives a name distinct from others' (...), and the Scripture presents God as showing the man that he will be exposed to the possibility of dying if he doesn't remain, through obedience, in connection with God and on the road of strengthening his spirit. But immediately after God announced the man about his death (...) He appeases the people by assuring them that they won't die, but they will be "like gods, knowing the good and the evil" (Gen. 2: 17; 3: 4-5)." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 22)

"By eating from the tree of the knowing the good and the bad, the people have become victims of the death. Associating this tragical event, in the human being, to a certain blunting of the man's sensitiveness for the dreadfulness of the death, and with this for the value of the person, it is show as happening soon after, in the act of the killing of a man by another man, namely the killing of Abel by Cain. The one who no longer sees his death as something that mustn't happen, that one won't see either the another's death as such, in his killing. Disregarding the value of the human fellow is connected to disregarding the own value. And the man's value, by and large, is solidary with the conscience of being created by God, as an irreplaceable person. Although, at the beginning, this carelessness was opposed by the conscience of the original value of the man and of the dreadfulness of the death. Cain suffered during the whole his life for the killing he committed. In time, the people have become more accustomed to their death and with killing their fellow humans. Today a man is able to kill millions of people and still justifying his deed as having "good reasons." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 22)

"The preoccupation with the death, but not as a fatality included in the laws of a blind existence, neither only as united with the hope that the death will be defeated through the power of God, but united with the certitude that one can escape the death, it has been brought by the Christian faith, through the resurrection of Christ. In the Old Testament, the victory upon death it was a hope based on the faith in a God superior to the present world, and based on the value of the man created by God-Person, premises which God sent His most beloved Son on, in order to take a body and to defeat the death within Himself. In Christ, this hope and this prophecy has been fulfilled, for He proved to be the Son of God in a created world, and He defeated the death, in His humanity, for all the people. In Christ Who, on one hand, He is the Son of God born out of God's Being from ever, and on the other hand, He makes Himself man, it is thus confirmed the highest character of God as Person, as the God of the interior love, but also the highest value of the man in front of God, since God sends His own Son to make the man as Himself, and in order to defeat the man's death in Himself, by enduring the death." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 23)

"At the basis of the victory upon death it stays the fact that the death doesn't belong to a world which to be the sole and supreme reality, or the death isn't the emanation of an essence which has nothing above, but the death has appeared in a world that has above it a God-Person, namely a God Who shows His attention toward the man not only by the fact that He has created the man, but also by the fact that He has given the man so much value that, when the man uses wrongly the freedom given to him, he falls under the power of the death; after a while God sends His own Son in order to make Himself man able to save the man from death. If the man hadn't been created as person, by God-Person, the death wouldn't have been the fruit of the man's freedom and it couldn't have been defeated, and God would have been only One Person. Consequently, God would have made Himself man because of a necessity, and not out of His love for peoples consequently, God wouldn't have been fully a Person and His embodiment wouldn't have been an act of power and of love of a God Who has in Himself the love and the power of escaping us from death and to provide us an eternal life, for the loving dialogue with Him. In such a case, the death would have been a meaningless eternal fatality.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 23)

“The image of the Word is shown within man, in the man’s dialogue with God. That’s why, if the man doesn’t bring his will too, for communion with God, God let the man in his emptied of content existence, namely lacking the communion’s content, which cannot be given as gift without the man’s will for it. This is the death which man falls into, when he rejects Christ. The man is created as an elastic vessel, endowed with freedom, and meant to endlessly be filled up with the content of the godlike life, and therefore the man wasn’t totally empty either at the beginning. If the man locks himself up, to the living water coming from God, he becomes an emptied vessel and wrinkled in himself, tormented by his void. In such a case the man withers like a non-watered garden, brought off the communication with the life’s river. That’s why, in Christ, the humanity’s vessel has been filled up, with the humanity’s will too, with the water of the infinite life of the humanity’s godlike Hypostasis. And the other people whom the Word’s humanity entered the communication with, for it has been filled up, willingly, with the Word’s godlike life, they are filled up too, with the life of the resurrection and of the happiness forever, if they too accept the communication with Him. Otherwise, the people remain dead in their souls, during this life, and also after their body’s death, which all the people are submitted to, consequently to the general corruption which the matter entered, even when it has become body of certain souls who are attached to Christ. But the other people, they will continue to be even more alive with their body’s death, and after their body endures the corruption’s effects. And on the day of the end of this way of the corruptible world, will resurrected also the ones who remained dead in their souls, but they will be even in their resurrected bodies, death in their souls, and that state will be felt in an indescribable mode in their bodies too.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 28-29)

“The person who reached his death without Christ, by himself, for he broke the communication with God, likewise he remains dead with his soul even after his resurrection with his body.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 29)

“The death, to the ones who lived a life in egotism without repenting for that, and without softening their being in their relation with God and with their fellow humans, it brings a huge aggravation of their state. On the opposite, to the ones who worked well, but they weren’t able to reach the full understanding of the life’s meaning, and of their good deeds’ value, and of their power creator of communion, the death will bring to them a great light by removing all the incertitude and of the overshadowing of the existence’s meaning, by seeing all the things in a much clearer and much deeper light, that irradiates out of God Whom they got close also due to the fact that they were gratefully remembered by the ones whom they did good things.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 73)

“The death is a phenomenon prepared by the weakening of the human spirit. Better said, it is a phenomenon produced by the weakening of the vital and sensorial functions of the body, having the ultimate origin in the soul who broke himself, freely and consciously, through sin, from God Who is the spiritual Source of the life. This weakening of the vital and sensorial functions of the soul, it is the cause of the process of corruption, of the body’s material matter, or of its aging.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 87)

“Saint Gregory of Nyssa says that the definitive union of the soul and of the body, or the resurrection accomplished by Christ for His human nature, it has been extended to everybody. The cause of this extension stays, of course, in the fact that Christ, as godlike Hypostasis of His human nature, He is in unmediated relation with us, and He, by offering us His human nature towards impartation, enters, Himself, the most intimate relation with us as our fundamental hypostasis. That’s why, in the reunion of the soul and of the body of His human nature, by resurrection, it is virtually comprised the future reunion of the soul and of the body of any man who died believing in Him, or being in unmediated relation with Him. (...) Christ allows to take place, in the human nature kept within Him, the separation of the soul from the body, namely the death, but He bring in the human nature, out of His power itself, the eternal life, in order that all the ones who die united with Him, or, while they are somehow inside Him, to be resurrected alike Him. The victory against the death as restitution and definitization of the man’s unity and life, it is a victory of the Person. The person isn’t destined to death consequently to the sin, but the person has also the possibility to use the death, by the power of God, in order to strengthen his relation with other persons.” (Stăniloae 2006: 62)

“Jesus Christ hasn’t exercised and He still doesn’t exercise only the ministrations of Teacher-Prophet and of Hierarch-Sacrifice, but He has also exercise and He still exercises the ministration as Emperor too. He hasn’t taught about and He hasn’t prophesied only about the Kingdom of Heavens, as being the communion of a consummate union with God, through Christ’s Person Himself, and He hasn’t brought a sacrifice to God only His sanctified body, initiating this communion in His Person and attracting in this communion also the other persons who believe by participating to Christ’s sacrifice, and powerfully leading the believers towards the consummate participating to that Kingdom. This dignity isn’t only that one He has it as God since the creation of the world, and which he exercised it during His life into body, but this dignity is the imperial dignity he has received as man too. The Lord admits before Pilate, that He is emperor (Jn. 18: 37; Mt. 27: 11; Mc. 15: 2; Lk. 23: 3). Properly-said, the dignity as Emperor isn't separated from the ministration as Teacher and from that as Hierarch. His yoke was a light one. His power was exercised also in enduring the pain and in overcoming the evil ghosts who were tempting Him through the affects of pleasure and pain. This dignity was exercised even by receiving the death, and that's why there is some kind of continuity between Sacrifice and Resurrection. If He was able to commit acts of power upon nature and upon the illnesses from within the body, this is due to His body cleanness too. The rationalist Protestant theology, because of not knowing this spiritual zone, it declares the wonders of Christ as mythological imaginings. His power is manifested also through His acts as Teacher and Hierarch. Even the death, though it is an act of His quality as Hierarch, through the mode Christ endured it and overcame it, it relates also to His imperial power. Especially about the power manifested in His teaching it is said in the Gospel: "For He was teaching as One Who has power, and not like their teachers" (Mt. 7: 29) From here one can see that Jesus had, like man too, the imperial power before resurrection." (Stăniloae 2006: 64)

"The man preserves the conscience of his dependency on God, and of the seriousness of the death, without admitting that he will be destroyed through death. The man lives the death as a moment of sinking in nothingness, and therefore he sees the possibility that God can destroy him totally, and if God doesn't do that, this will be due to His mercy. Secondly, the man feels that the kind of life he will receive after his death it totally depend on God. The righteous feels that his eternal life comes out of God, and the sinner realizes that the emptiness of life from within him is due to his remoteness from God. If the man hadn't continued to exist, where would have been the subject who to eternally life in dependency on God? Thirdly, the man lives this dependency on God by the fact that his life from after his death it is totally different from his life from here." (Stăniloae 1997: 161)

"To the righteous one, the disappearance of the body and of the cover which the body imposed to the spiritual life, it will fully liberate the rich and deep functions of the spirit, it will bring in actuality all the memories and it will clarify the spiritual sight, and it will enrich the spirit with the knowledge of the reality's widest and deepest dimensions, with the reality's transcendent, fundamental dimension." (Stăniloae 1997: 162)

"Anyway, for both the righteous and the sinner, the life from beyond it will be totally different, so that one can say that the form of life from here it has been lost by them, that this form of life has suffered a catastrophe. But the catastrophe mustn't last for millennia, neither to stretch to its last personal basis, in order the human being to receive a new existence after his death.

That's why the death still remains a fearsome event. On the other hand, one can see that what raises out of death is the integral person of the human being; of the righteous, it will be incomparably more lucid, richer, while of the sinner will be impoverished, emptied." (Stăniloae 1997: 162-163)

Deed

“In the human life’s simple order, there are deeds which, no matter who was the man who did them, they have by themselves important repercussions, upon the other people. A man founded a state, or an institution; another formulated a doctrine, or he realized an art work; all of these deeds still continue to influence, by themselves, the life of other people.” (Stăniloae 2006: 46)

“Between the good deeds and in the faith in Christ there is an organic connection, in both of them being manifested the communion with Christ. In deeds, the communion with Christ is manifested as a development of the communion that starts through faith. The faith in Christ is the faith in the Christ from within us, the faith out of His power as dwelling within us; it is the irradiation in us of the presence and of the power of Christ, dwelling within us in an unseen manner. This faith includes the love for the One Who has sacrificed Himself, and Who has resurrected, and Who dwells within us, for out of His state of sacrifice and resurrected, at our turn, also us to take power to die to the sin and to live, at our turn, a new life out of Him and with Him. Christ Himself fills us up with love towards Him, by His love for us. And the love gives us the power to become like Him: to die towards the sin, to manifest ourselves with love towards whosoever and towards whatsoever. The Christendom is the great mystery of the communion amongst person, which the Occident hasn’t understood. The Christendom is a great mystery of the persons’ growth out of the life of another person and, in the last analysis, out of the life of Christ’s Person, full of godlike infinity.” (Stăniloae 2006: 152)

“Not only in prayer it comes to expression the dialogical bond amongst persons, or the responsibility for one another, but also in the deed of one person in favor of another. In their natural state the people feel that through their deeds of reciprocal help, they fulfill the obligations of a reciprocal responsibility from above their will. But the Church’s members know that this responsibility it has been place upon them by God, and that they fulfill this responsibility not only by deeds, which can be reckoned as belonging to them, but also through prayer which they ask God for help, for others; they also know that without the exercise of this responsibility they fall into some sort of existence emptied of content and of power, into an existence of the nightmare and of the torment. In this sort of existence, of tormented shadow, there falls only the one who is not helped by another and the one who doesn’t help too. This is because of the one who doesn’t remain in the bond of the dialogue with another, by answering that one’s appeal, he falls himself in the void of the loneliness, namely of a phantasmagorical and tormented existence.” (Stăniloae 1997: 220)

“God doesn’t forget any good deed done to others (Hebr. 6: 10), for all those deeds are inscribed in an ascendant line towards a superior state of kindness of the ones who believe. He doesn’t forget, for though the good deeds the believers answer God for the gifts which they have received, answering Him in the first place by impropriating and by multiplying the kindness shown them by Him, through the gifts He gave them or which have been given to them.” (Stăniloae 1997: 225)

“We discover the man in what he has different by everything that is given into the order of massively present things, as matter: like life, like laws, like deeds, especially in the hypostasis of the second person, of you, or only for we have one or other, as such.

Through what the man presents himself to us as being different from any reality from the surrounding world, when we meet him like a second person? We know his body being part between the entities which took place into the order of the seen world, also when we see the man like a third person. His deeds, his emotional manifestations, we see the also to the persons with whom we are not in direct report, and we can enumerate them among the happenings of the world.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“But not only in the wonderful deeds was showed the active presence of the Godhead through human nature, without modifying it, but in all was doing and was telling, in all the time spent among people by Jesus Christ, was something which, without modify His humanity, was showing that it is in Him more than humanity. The crowds remained overwhelmed by His speeches. “Nobody has talk like this in Israel”, was whispering the people. His word was human, but both the content and the atmosphere in which was shrouded, was something more that human. His behavior was human, and though, it was a behavior like hasn’t before and can has it any human.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The deed, especially, it is - like the word also - a manifestation of the intentions of a person, an opening, an overflowing of someone’s love upon us, a bridge which a person stretches to us for communion, a prolongation of that person¹²⁸.

¹²⁸ Widening this sense of the deeds, Eberhard Grisebach sees the general meaning of the work into the establishment of the relations of the communion. The crises of the work and of the worker from today, comes from the fact that nobody know anymore its meaning. “Arbeit wrude zeitweiling um ihrer willen, ohne Beziehung zu einen Boden der Gemeinschaft betrieben 1. Sonlos ist jede Arbeit, welche den Boden der Gemeinchaft verloren hat und keiner Nachfrage mehr entsprich. 2. Sinnios ist die Arbeit, die nur des Arbeitenden willen geschieht, die dem Ertfolg und der befridigung des Subjekts dient. 3. Sinnlos ist die Arbeit

When speaking about the work of somebody we cannot remove the accent from on his person, because the person himself manifest, illuminates, and enters our region through his deeds and words.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“That is why, it is not necessary that somebody to hate you, in order you to feel yourself as being diminished, and it is enough that somebody no longer pays you attention. Of the lack of love of our fellow human we still can comfort ourselves, because he can be wrong in what concerns our deeds. But the absence of God, the lack of the approvingly echo from Him for our deeds, it is an awful torment, it is a frightening punishment. Either this punishment is due to the lack of attention which the divine person pays us because we are not doing what He wants, or it is due to a positive influx of dissatisfaction of His, which we are not felling clearly, the connection between the evil we are doing and the following torments it is produced with a power of a law and this law stays into the positive or negative personal attitude of God. In the punishment of the law, it is not about an extra-divine, but about God Himself, not into an arbitrary attitude, but into a one, which, like in the case of the good that we are doing, it meets the will with the indication of His being.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“How many deeds and words of every one of us do not mix into the deeds and words of the other ones, like influences or like ready made things? The life and the work of every one of us are interwoven with the one of the other ones, forerunners or contemporaries. And, at our turn, we are presents in the life and in the deed of the contemporary or successor people.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The good deeds bring the man into the light of Christ, while the evil deeds keep the man into darkness. The evil deeds lock the man up in his narrow egotism, stopping the man from widely and deeply understanding other persons, and from understanding the loving God Who is the source without beginning, of the existence; on the opposite, the good deeds being directed towards the loving God and towards the fellow humans, they widen the loving sight endlessly. This is for the good deeds make the man communicative, open, and transparent. One can see that man’s interior. He opens himself warmly, to others. He has within him the warmth of the endless love of Christ, for he communicates with Christ. The body no longer locks the man up but it makes his soul seen, and communicative. Through good, the spirit makes transparent the material matter of the body, firstly to wiche Totes wiederholt, eine Wiederherstellung von Formen und Normen versucht, die längst ihre Beziehung zum Leben verloren hat“. (Die Schicksalsfrage des Abendlandes, Bern-Leipzig, 1942, p. 314, 316).

Christ and then to all the ones believing in Christ. But, by and large, the human spirit becomes transparent through material matter and through some communicative organizations the spirit brings into the material matter. But God placed in the whole matter of the universe, and organization that makes the universe useful to the man, and also able to show how wonderful and loving is the wisdom of God. The material matter has been made by God able to receive and to communicate through itself a useful rationality. Through this it is shown that not only the human spirit can see and work through the material matter, but through the material matter one can see God and His works. So, one can know and work the truth through the material matter. The good deeds “work the truth”, namely they actualize towards joy the truth of the connection existing between the man committing these good deeds and his fellow humans, and the good deeds show the truth of the loving God. For this is the truth: the harmony amongst the created things and their union with God through His love. The one who commits the good, he sees this truth and he affirms this truth. And the connection with this true existence it brings him joy.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 202-203)

Deification

“The Embodiment of Christ represents, in the same time, both the descent of God to the full communion with the mankind and the maximum ascent of the mankind. God made Himself a man, for the man to be deified.” (Stăniloae 2003: 36)

“(…) the Christian dogmas express the plan of the deification of all the rational beings who want this, a plan accomplished in its final consummation form, in Christ. In its unfolding, this plan isn’t but the specification and the real fulfillment of our natural aspiration towards the union with God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 80)

“In the Eastern Christendom the meaning of the salvation it is also determined by the inter-Trinitarian love of God. Christ has made Himself a man in order to elevate the man in the communion of the Trinitarian love, in order to deify the man; and this is not being done through an external forcing, which to scare the man, but through the descending love.” (Stăniloae 2003: 230-231)

“The imprinting of the active divine features within us it equals to our deification. But it is in the same time equivalent to a becoming man in us, of God. By becoming God man within us, our deification it means, in the same time, a culminant becoming man, of us. According to the Christian doctrine, by behaving ourselves like the loving of all things God, we behave ourselves like the most accomplished people, for we have our hearty full with the hottest love, namely full with the love of God. This is an almost tearing apart sensitiveness for any foreign pain, a sensitiveness that is greater than that for our own pain. And this is an inclusion of others in us in a potentiated manner.” (Stăniloae 2003: 271-272)

“According to their rank, the virtues receive diverse names. The virtue of love, it represents the kindness, the transparency, and the communicability in a culminant degree. It has concentrated in itself all the virtues or the dispassionate by excellence sensitiveness. It is equivalent to deification, which is in the same time the same with the culminant humanization. Only into God one can reach to be a full man, as the Chalcedon definition shows it us.” (Stăniloae 2003: 273)

“The saints know God in His presence that is working within them and within the whole world. They know Him in the sweetness of the kindness and of the peace, in His power of transformation and of transfiguration and of consummation, within themselves and in all the things. The holiness isn’t something static and individual, but it is a process of endless Christian humanization through deification, that is being accomplished in the relations between people and God, amongst the people themselves, and between the people and the whole cosmos.” (Stăniloae 2003: 285-286)

“The oikonomia of God or His plan regarding the world, it consists in the deification of the created world, which after the sin implies also the salvation. The salvation and the deification presuppose, as first divine act, its creation. The salvation and the deification aim, doubtlessly and directly, the humanity, but not a humanity detached from nature, but ontologically united with the nature. This is because the nature holds on the man, or it makes the man whole, and the man cannot become consummate without reflecting and working upon nature. That’s why through the world it is understood both the nature and the humanity; or, when it is indicated one of them, by using the word world, always is understood also the other one.” (2003: 337)

“God has committed Himself, by creating the man, to bring the man to deification. The man is transcendent by origin, although his existence is entrusted to his own freedom.” (2003: 375)

“The providence and the plan of the deification of the creation and of the human being it is not hindered by the sin that was introduced into world, but the sin only determines that in Providence to be taken in account the conditions of the mankind’s sinful state, and the deification plan to include in itself also the deification of the mankind.” (2003: 511)

“The Providence preserves and leads the world despite the world’s sinful state. This means that the world isn’t compromised and it won’t be brought to the total destruction by the force of the evil, but the world still keeps its value to God and it can be preserved by Him in a state in which the mankind can be led towards salvation and deification and it is actually being led towards this target.” (2003: 511)

“The conveying of the qualities of the deified nature of Christ towards the people it is explained by the communion of nature. The deified body, by being received within the body of the other people, it resurrects and it deifies our bodies too.” (Stăniloae 2006: 23)

“As we have seen, through the whole godlike oikonomia, starting with the creation and ending with the embodiment of the Son of God as man and with the full deification of the human nature, namely with the hypostatization or with the becoming of the human nature as Person in Him, and with His entering the direct relation with the people, He aims the people’s full development as persons, a development which will show its full fruition in the live to come. This development as persons or this full deification, they have as their foundation the deification of the human nature assumed by Christ.” (Stăniloae 2006: 25)

“The Son of God humanizes Himself without ceasing to be God, and He becomes the Hypostasis of the human nature. By this, he impropriates to Himself our modes of thinking and of sensitiveness, in order to transfigure them, to totally humanize them, or to deify them.” (Stăniloae 2006; 25)

“Even in the fact that the human nature hasn’t an own hypostasis in Christ, but is has God-the Word as its Hypostasis, it resides the fact that the human nature hasn’t any ceiling towards God and it hasn’t any separating wall between Christ, as God, and the other people. Christ is the full man to God and to the other people. Christ is in both these qualities, as God and as man, fully humanized and fully deified: fully humanized as God and fully deified as man. And in the relation with Him everybody can be humanized and deified. In Him we see and accomplish the fully transparent humanity to God and the fully given to us godhead.” (Stăniloae 2006: 25)

“The deification does not consist of a physic dilatation, a substantial one, of the human nature, but it consists of spiritual purification and intensification. This is the direction which the anthropology and the mystic-ascetic pedagogy of the Holy Fathers led all of us towards. Their ideal is the purification of passions like expressions of the egotism, in order to make possible the dwelling of the love for God and for people. In both respects the progress take place at once, and not only through the man but also through God. Only the encouragement which God gives us through His divine grace and His love, it helps us to grow up into the rejection of the egotistic passions and into love.

Also, amongst the people, showing us that the lack of love of somebody for us, and our lack of love for somebody, both of them weak our strengths, and it helps us to better understand how the lack of the divine grace like love of God towards us, and the egotism’s sin, they keep our nature asleep like under a bad witchcraft or detoured from its normal path, animalized, precisely like in the fairy tells.

In this way, this state of a great spiritual development of the human nature, by not being but interpenetration with the divine grace, it rightly can be called deification.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The love, of which subject has become the deified one, it is godlike. The man reaches thereby the source of an endless godlike love, namely another God, not by itself but through divine grace and through communion with God; not through an autonomous being, but through uninterrupted participation to the source of godhead. From him irradiates the light like from another sun, but only because he reflects or conveys, like an environment, the light of the unique central Sun of the existence. On the other hand, the man mustn’t be confounded to God; the characters of his nature are not lost, because it doesn't irradiate the divine powers from itself, but it only conveys, through its forms and organs, the divine power which has its ultimate source into the divine nature." (Stăniloae 1993)

"It was said that "in poetry like in religion, it is valuable only the word that has become flesh, and only the flesh that has become word"¹²⁹. This truth has found its supreme fulfillment, from both sides, into the kenosis of the godlike nature and in the deification of the human nature into Jesus Christ. The godlike Word has descended to the human one, but through this the human nature has been attracted to welcome Him, until it has become a godhead revealing word." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Bulgakov relies this thesis on the consideration that, like during the time of the earthly life, likewise after death, the human nature of Jesus gradually evolved to the state of full deification, until raising His human state on the godlike throne, namely to the perfect capacity of irradiating the divinity out of it. Jesus walked, after His embodiment, the road which Adam would have had to walk if he hadn't fallen. He raised His humanity from the posse non mori to the factual immortality; He made His humanity a perfect environment for the manifestation of the godhead. The resurrection was not an act of Jesus, but of His Father upon Him, for, in that moment, He still wasn't in the state of full manifestation of godhead.

Through resurrection, again, He was not placed at once in the state of full glory. Only after the ascension, which is also an act of the Father, He was fully raised from the state of kenosis, of service, and He was actually placed in His dignity like God and man. Of course, though, the resurrection is also an act of Jesus, because the Father can resurrect Him due to His efforts from earth in order to make the mankind capable of receiving the deification¹³⁰." (Stăniloae 1993)

¹²⁹ FR. GUNDOLF, Diether und Helden, at Grigorie Popa, Spiritual itinerary, Sibiu, 1943, p. 91.

¹³⁰ "The glorification belongs to the hierarchal service; it is not shown like a royal service. The glorification is the work of God upon God- the Man and not His self-glorification... The Son of God, in the state of humiliation, He did not resurrect Himself, because He disrobed Himself in a kenotic way of the godlike power... Although, Christ was not only resurrected, but He also resurrected Himself. The created nature of the man – namely not only because it has become sinful, but also because it was made like so by God – it would not have been capable to endure through itself the power which to resurrect it. This one, simply, it would have destroyed it, being in fact for it a new creation, which would have destroyed the anterior one and it would have taken its place. Until resurrection in the life from after death, the human nature must be raised and, not only in the negative sense, through the liberation from sin, but also in the positive one, through its inside deification. On this path to the inside deification, which had to be traveled by the godlike work through the human liberty, it was placed Adam through the trying of his will to obey the divine commandment, but he was shown unreliable. After this fact, the salvation from sin and the participation of the human will to the deification, it was accomplished through the interweaving of the human nature with the godlike nature into the unity and the

“While the Christian general and special morals, it presents the conditions of the Christian moral life (the moral law, the conscience, and the freedom), as also the doctrine, in an analytical form, about sins and virtues, regarded as some state of the self-connected amongst them, The Orthodox Spirituality presents the process of Christian’s advancing in the road of consummation in Christ, by cleaning himself up of passions and by achieving the virtues, process taking place in a certain order. In other words, The Christian Orthodox Spirituality described the mode which the Christian can advance in, from a cleaning up of a passion, to a cleaning up of another, and, with these, to the achieving of the virtues, the virtues being inscribed on a ladder of consummation and culminating in love, the state representing the cleaning up of all passions and the achieving of all the virtues. Advancing towards this peak, the man advances in the same time in the union with Christ and, with this, in knowing Him through experience, and this means, in the same time, the man’s deification.” (Stăniloae 1992: 5)

“In East it is used also, in order to characterize this union between man and God, also the daring term of deification or participation to godhead. The target of the Christian spirituality it would be, so, the living of the state of deification and of participation of the godlike life. The experience, mainly expresses ad state of deification, it comprised firstly two general teachings: 1. The deification represents the last level of the man’s consummation, and that’s why this supreme phase from the believer’s life on earth it is also called as consummation. 2. This deification is accomplished by believer’s participation to the godlike powers, by being poured within him the divine limitless.” (Stăniloae 1992: 6)

“For the deification represents the level of the highest consummation on earth, it means supreme normality and actualization of the human powers; and for it is a state of deification – of knowledge, of love, and of spiritual hypostasis of Christ. «The death could not keep Him», not only because it touched the nature of the Righteous without sin, Who didn’t belong to death, but also because His humanity, by being sanctified in the whole its being, it was deified and it gained a potentiality of the actual immortality. And this immortality was given to it, after, through the power of the resurrection from the part of God.”. “Adam, until the falling, He had the potential immortality, posse non mori, and the potential glory, but he disrobed himself of them through the falling, together with all his descendants... The immortality, like the glory, it could not be due to an act effectuated upon the man, without to be due, in the same time, also to an act of the man himself, by taking through liberty, in a spiritual way, possession over his spiritual-bodily being. This possession was accomplished by Christ through His humanity. He won to the end both in life and in His death, the creatural helplessness of His human nature, bringing it to the sacrifice of the obeying the Father. In this way, through the hierarchal service, through the sacrifice of His life, Christ has earned, deservedly, His immortality... God gives the man the immortal life when the man becomes able and worthy to receive it, but the man becomes thus only into God- the Man”. “God could create the man, without a man for the immortal life, but to resurrect the man, after the man has fallen, to the life without death, God cannot do it without the man, namely without his own inward victory upon death, as basis of the immortality” (C. w. p. 410-413).

force – experienced by the believer, this state is above the limit of our powers, being fueled from the godlike power.” (Stăniloae 1992: 6)

“Our creatural implies the absolute sovereignty of God, by making impossible our transformation in divine substance, no matter how close we would come to Him. Our closeness to God, our raising to understanding Him, it couldn’t be accomplished except if God Himself dresses us up in His own things; but even if we are crossed through by His power, we won’t be able to reject our created being. Our created being doesn’t become uncreated: we become gods by grace, and not by being.” (Stăniloae 1992: 21-22)

“The deification is the consummation and the full penetration of the man by God, given that on another way one cannot reach the consummation and the full spiritualization. The sin has chained up, as in an evil spell, most of the human nature’s powers. We do not exactly know the whole amplitude of the powers which our nature is capable of. The envy, the worry, the hatred, they paralyze our nature’s capabilities. The love we have for somebody, or which somebody has for us, the trust we are granted with or we grant it to somebody else, namely any getting out of the sinful egotism, it unchains within us powers which we haven’t suspected having in ourselves, just like the kiss of Prince Charming awakens Ileana Cosanzeana¹³¹ from the paralysis of an unnatural sleep.” (Stăniloae 1992: 309)

“While this state which the sin had cast the human nature in, it is a contrary of the nature state, we theoretically could say that the first level the human nature is elevated on it is that of true nature, but one cannot concretely distinguish a state of pure nature, because even the elevation of the nature from this state it cannot be done through the nature’s powers, in the sense that the nature will shake off, by itself, its powers’ sleep and it would remain only with those powers, but only through the collaboration with the godlike powers the nature can be elevated to and it can remain in this state. Thus, during the process of deification, in certain regards, the man doesn’t reach for a long time the level of full health of his nature, but in other regards he has exceeded, by the godlike grace, their natural level.” (Stăniloae 1992: 309)

“The light lightens in darkness for a long time. The new man grows up by fighting the remanences of the former man. He lives, ever since it has been sown in him the seed of the new man, namely from Baptism, on one hand a supra-natural life, but on the other hand he lives a sub-natural life too. The deification in a wider sense it starts from Baptism, extending along the entire spiritual ascension of the man, which also the man’s powers are active in, namely along the purification of passions, of achieving the virtues, and of the enlightenment. And if in this ascension the man's natural powers are in continuous growth, in order to reach their apogee on the moment they have reached able to see the godlike light, by receiving as seeing power the work of the Holy Ghost, we will be able to say that the deification which this revival and growth it coincides to the process of the development of the human powers to their limit, or to the full accomplishing of the human nature, but also to their endless surpassing through grace." (Stăniloae 1992: 309-310)

¹³¹ It’s about two characters of a Romanian fairy tale (E. I. t.’s n.).

"The deification never stops, but it continues even beyond the last limit of the human nature, to infinite. We would call this last one as deification in a restricted meaning.

In order to justify this affirmation of ours, we could bring the example of the deification of the Jesus Christ's humanity, which also actually started after His Sufferings and through His Resurrection, when, according to Saint Gregory of Nyssa, the features and the works of the human nature are overwhelmed by the attributes and by the works of His godhead. This has been consummated through the ascent of Jesus to heavens, as man. This has made possible our personal deification too, also understood as an elevation above the human attributes and works and on the level of the godlike attributes and works. (Contra Eunomium, liber V)." (Stăniloae 1992: 310)

"While the deification in a wider sense it means the elevation of the man up on the highest level of his natural powers, or up to the full accomplishing of the man (Saint Maximos the Confessor, Capitulum quiquies cent., G.P., 1189), for during the whole this time there is active within the man the godlike power of the grace too, the deification in a restricted meaning comprises the progress done by the man beyond the limit of his natural powers, beyond the margins of his nature, on the godlike plan from above nature (Saint Maximos the Confessor, Capit. theolo. et oecon. Cent. II, 68)." (Stăniloae 1992: 310)

"The two kinds of deification, namely the deification in a wider meaning and the restricted deification, they differ from one another, but there still is between them a continuity like between two stages of the same climbing, though in order to cross from the first stage to the second stage it is necessary a jump, for through the first one it works the man too, and through the second stage there is only God working." (Stăniloae 1992: 311)

"If during the man's spiritual ascension until a full development of his natural powers through their collaboration, the godlike grace hadn't given another help except that one to help the man's natural powers to be developed up to their limit, it would have been almost unjustified the name of deification given to this process, though it is being accomplished with the collaboration of the godlike power. But as the grace produces within man, even during this ascension, also effects that exceed the limits of the pure nature, this is an even more important reason why the name of deification cannot be denied either to the man's spiritual ascension from before reaching the ultimate limits of his natural powers." (Stăniloae 1992: 311)

"The ceasing of the man's spiritual powers it doesn't mean a total stopping of any activity or of any development of theirs. They continue working, but not by the fact that they could contribute with their natural resources, but exclusively by the fact of receiving the godlike energy. Somehow, the man remains active, but he is active by receiving the ever-increasing power of God. That's why the deification can be still considered as an experience which only the man is capable of. This man's power of receiving belongs to an endless development that, though it doesn't mean an increasing of the power of natural activity, or a widening of the human nature as intrinsic source of power and activity, it still means an increasing of his receiving power of his power of receiving and using on an ever-wider measure the divine energies (Saint Gregory Palamas, Word III, Triad poste; in The Romanian Philokalia, vol. VII, p. 303 (head no. 31)). This is because this increasing of the power of being imparted with the godlike grace, though it is being done through the grace's power too it still presupposes a virtual capacity of receiving such an increasement – and this is in a certain sense a development of some nature's potentialities, of the nature's receiving potentiality." (Stăniloae 1992: 311)

"The man's receiving power mustn't be understood as a capacity of physical widening, but it must be understood in a spiritual manner, namely on the basis of an inward impulse at least virtually existing in the human nature, previously to reaching what it is received as a gift. This gift is described by all the Holy Fathers as lasting and as growing up forever and ever, and therefore the power for receiving it is like that too, though, on the other hand, they say that the man will "suffer" the deification, namely the man will passively suffer it, and the man won't produce it, for the man will have entered the endless resting. In the vision of Dionysus the Areopagite, all the angelic levels are eternally in a dynamic tension towards God, ever-progressing in deification. And Saint Gregory of Nyssa likens this ceaseless increasing gift, and it receiving, to the example of the Moses's climbing." (Stăniloae 1992: 312)

"Speaking about the ceasing of the human nature of working through its powers too, even on the smallest measure, we understand that the human nature has reached its development limit according to the nature, that it has reached its limit as source of power and activity, but not as reception potentiality. The progress in developing the human nature isn't finished, though as source and as subject of own power it no longer has any development, and in this sense the whole its own growing up in godlike works is by grace, and not according to the nature. But the fact itself that the ceaseless increasing and the deification still have as basis also a receiving potentiality seeded in the man's nature, it is being expressed in East by the fact that the man is created in the image and in the likeness of God. Through sin it hasn't been lost the image, but it has been stopped the process of the likeness to God. This process of likeness, by being taken in Jesus, it won't ever come to an end. The man becomes increasingly in the likeness of God, but without becoming identical to God. The man will advance forever in the "likeness" to God, in the ever-tighter union with God, but the man won't ever reach the identification to God; the man will be increasingly capable of mirroring God, but the man won't ever become what God is." (Stăniloae 1992: 312)

"The likeness is different from identity, as the quality of god by grace it differs from the quality as God by nature too. For, by and large, the knower becomes increasingly alike the known, the man becomes and tends to become increasingly alike God, increasingly more of what God is, or, god by grace. Therefore, the process of deification being the same with process of the "likeness", it is in a certain regard a development by grace of a potentiality planted within man, especially because the "likeness" isn't else but a development of the 'image'. (Stăniloae 1992: 312-313)

"This development of the nature, be it even only as receptiveness, it is a new reason why between the deification from the first and from the second stage there is no interruption, though there have been highlighted also incontestable differences between them and a jump from the first stage to the second one, meaning also a going out of the nature's laws by and large." (Stăniloae 1992: 313)

"The deification in a restricted meaning, as process of man's consummation after the natural has reached the limit of its powers of activity and after it has ceased any active contribution from it, it belongs only to the age to come. During the life from here it is only anticipated for short moments, as an earnest." (Stăniloae 1992: 313)

"The most important problem is that of the report between deification and the human nature. As we have seen, the Holy Fathers say that through deification the human nature's works come to an end, being replaced for godlike works, the natural attributes being overwhelmed by the godlike glory." (Stăniloae 1992: 313)

“When looked in itself, the human nature doesn’t become one with the godhead according to the nature. But together with the godhead, the human nature” it is being transformed at its turn in godhead”, and “it no longer remains within its border and attributes” (Gregory of Nyssa). But this takes place only after resurrection, and not with the being. The true life from within body, by not being possible to remain in death, it has elevated by resurrection the body from corruption to incorruptibility. Like the fire hides within wood, but finally it burst up to surface, warming the wood and making it burning, so it has been the godhead hidden within body, until our death and during our death, for filling the body after with its life, as a first fruit of our nature, so that one can no longer discern each nature of His, but, the human nature of Jesus by being transformed through interpenetration with the godlike nature of His, it has received the attributes of the last nature, or the power of the godhead.” (Stăniloae 1992: 315)

This overwhelming doesn’t mean that the man becomes insensitive. He lives himself his new state as “god by grace”, being in the same time aware of his creatural according to the nature. He tastes a godlike happiness, but with his gratitude as creature, he experiences in himself godlike powers but being amazed for realizing that those powers do not come from himself. In other words, he is god, but in the same time he doesn’t cease to be man; he is god through the things he accomplishes, through his functionalities, but he still is aware of being a god by the mercy of the unique and great God. This is the comprising of humanity sentiment which accompanies the manifestation of the godlike works destined to his subject. He lives the clean love, or the spiritual relation with God, on the measure which his bodily sensations have been overwhelmed, of pleasure and of pain, or those of envy or of pride. He lives the clean joy of everything that is good, decent, and harmonious. He is like God, and he is even god, but he still isn’t God. He is a dependent god, if we say by using other words the expression: “god by participation”. The awareness of this dependency it excludes any pantheistic identification of the man to God.” (Stăniloae 1992: 318)

“The man’s deification means the crossing of the man from the created works to the uncreated works, on the level of the divine energies. This is what the man is imparted with, and not with the godlike being. So can be understood what the man assimilates like, the divine energies, increasingly more, without this assimilation eve coming to an end, f0or the man won’t ever assimilate their source itself, namely the divine being, in order the man to become God by nature, or another Christ. On the measure the man increases in his capacity of making himself subject to some ever-richer divine energy, these energies are unveiled to him out of the divine being in a greater amplitude.” (Stăniloae 1992: 318)

“Not only Christ descended to us in order to elevate Himself again within us, but also the entire order of His uncreated truths. From contemplating Christ’s uncreated truths through the sensitive wraps in this life, we are elevated to contemplating in an unmediated manner, but we won’t cease advancing even then, on its endless levels. Their order unveils the Kingdom of Heavens, it is the divine environment uniting us but which distinguishes us, in the same time, from God; it both connects us to and keeps us different from the being of God.” (Stăniloae 1992: 318-319)

“The Embodiment of the Word has confirmed the value of the man and of these images of rationalities and energies on the man’s measure. But His Embodiment has given the man the possibility of seeing in the human face of the Logos, concentrated again, all the divine rationalities and energies. Thus, the final deification will consist of looking at and of living all the divine values and energies thought and irradiated, on the man’s supreme measure, in the face of Christ. But by this, on the face of each man will be mirrored in a luminous manner, through the rationalities and through the energies gathered within the man, the rationalities and the energies of the Logos. That’s why the eternal happiness will consist of contemplating the Christ’s face (Apoc. 22: 4).

“So will everybody be in God and we will see all the things in God, or God will be in all things and we will see Him in all the things, being as real the unitary presence of God in all the things as real and non-confounded to God will remain “all” the creatures gathered within Him. This is the eternal perspective of the deification.” (Stăniloae 1992: 319)

“The faith increasingly actualizes within man, the man’s godlike paradigm, and it makes the man increasingly transparent to that paradigm, increasingly imprinted on the man’s seen face. On this way, the man, helped by grace, he sees more easily in his fellow humans, which stay, at their turn, under the work of the grace, their divine prototypes, through their seen images.” (Stăniloae 2005: 114)

“The divine Hypostasis descended to works which He organized a matter as body of His like, only as much as a human body can show, and He shows of Himself only as much as a human body can show of these organizing works through itself. But in these works, there is the godlike Hypostasis Himself. These works belong to the divine Hypostasis. On the other hand, this body can become increasingly transparent and through it one can penetrate in ever deeper dimensions belonging to the divine Hypostasis bearing them. Although, the infinity of these dimensions it is experienced only globally and virtually, through the circumscribed image of the body. The kenosis of the Son of God it has as reverse the deification of the body, the opening of the body towards the horizon of the infinity of the godlike Hypostasis, and not the body's abolishment. The Christ's face, especially, it is therefore the environment of the uncircumscribed godhead. The circumscribed is made transparent to the uncircumscribed." (Stăniloae 2005: 181)

"For Christ has a body, he can be painted, and this shows the descent of the Son of God down to the last levels of the creation, which the man can comprise them too, in order to save and to deify everything." (Stăniloae 2005: 190)

"In a way or another, the image doesn't refer only to nature, but it also refers to hypostasis. From this perspective, one can speak about a certain unity of the two images in Christ, but this is a composed unity, as also the hypostasis is a composed unit. In other words, the man is elevated, he is transfigured by godhead, but without being the man abolished." (Stăniloae 2005:195)

"There are blessed sufferings and works common to the soul and to the body, which do not attach the ghost to the body, but they elevate the body in the sphere of the ghost. Which are these ones? The spiritual ones, which do not come from body over the mind, but they come from the mind over the body, as it has been said. The ghost's grace through the mediation of the soul it passes to the body and it deified the body, by getting the body away from the evil things. The Stephen's face illuminated like the face of an angel. Namely, his body too, it suffered the godlike things. Behold a suffering and work, common to the body and the soul, which isn't a nail which attaches the soul of the bodily and earthly things, but it is a connection elevating the body too, towards God. This is the character of the mysterious works from within the body of the ones who have dedicated themselves to hesychasm." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 49)

"Palamas said that the sole imitating of God it doesn't deify us; there is necessary the uncreated grace of God too." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 70)

"This deifying grace – and for it deifies, it is also called as the godhead's principle, namely the principle of the deification -, it doesn't have a beginning, it doesn't have an end, it is shareable, and it can be seen in a supra-sensitive mode, this grace has above itself the being above being and above principle, of God. The grace enters the relations with the beings from below itself, and these ones are imparted with the grace; but the godhead being is above any impartation and relation. If the grace had been "an aptitude that consummates the rational nature", then Christ would have come for nothing, and He would have promised us the Ghost for nothing as well. The Hellenes scholars fully had such a grace, and the godhead wouldn't have meant the elevation above nature and the union with God. Or, if the deification is a work of God, but on the other hand if had been created, because of the man having it in it his nature, then God Himself would have been created. There cannot be necessary the nature whose works are created. Barlaam totally rationalized the godhead, because he didn't experience it. The one who has experienced the godhead, he knows that the godhead is untold; and that one can never express the godhead satisfactorily." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 70)

"Only the human nature of Christ has been deified by the nature from above being, of God. That one is totally inaccessible to us, even if God elevates us above ourselves. In the ones who are deified it is only the work of that being. It is not like the art in the created masterpiece: because any producer power is in the created things and it is seen by everybody. But it is like the art in the one who receives the art. That's why the Saints are called as organs of the Holy Ghost, receiving within themselves the work itself of the Ghost." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 70-71)

"The deifier grace of the Ghost it isn't the being itself from above being, but it is that being's work. And neither is that being's total work, though it itself this work is non-shareable. It is not the whole work; for who could comprise the borderless power of Ghost, except Christ, in Whom there was "the plenitude of the godhead"? The God's being is everywhere; everywhere it is the deifying power too, existing in being, as its natural power. But, like the fire won't be seen if there it isn't a matter of a sense which to receive its lighting power, likewise the deifying power couldn't be seen and it couldn't be felt if there isn't a material which to be filled up with the seeing and feeling of that deifying power. Such a material is the rational being liberated of the cover of the diverse evil things. Then the rational being it will be filled up with the light of that sun, and it becomes another sun, shedding the same light out of himself; identical to the mirror or to the water which, by receiving within them the sunrays, they become themselves as sources of those rays." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 71)

"(The deified person, E. l. t.'s n.) he doesn't only receive the light of the Ghost, but he also received the Ghost's knowledge and life. Thus, Paul said that he wasn't living any longer his created life, but he was living the uncreated life of Christ. The godlike power from within man it is non-separated from God. "Not you are the ones speaking, but Your Father is the One speaking within you" (Mt. 10: 20)." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 71)

"It is rightly so, that all the things are imparted with God, but there is a big difference between that impartation, and the impartation of the Saints. The things living only sensitively, or not even sensitively, they do not receive the power of living in a deified mode. And again, God is dwelling in a different mode in the unbeliever people and in a different mode in the people who believe in Christ. Only the last ones are found worthy of an impartation as such. This difference suffices to show us that only the ones who live in a godlike mode receive an uncreated impartation. Apostle Paul said: "I am no longer living, but Christ is living in me". The worthy ones, said Maximos the Confessor, "they no longer bear in themselves the temporal life that has a beginning and an end, but they bear in them the godlike and eternal life of the Word Who dwells within them". This is called by him also as "uncreated deification", as one that doesn't actually have a beginning, but it occurs within us in a not-understood mode. Basil the Great, when commenting the place from Joel about the overflowing of the Holy Ghost, he said: "God poured and He didn't create, He gave as a gift and He didn't make, he gave and he didn't create". "We endure the deification as one that is according to the grace, but we do not make the deification", said Maximos the Confessor too. Our nature cannot either make the beginning of the deification, all the less it can our nature make the deification's consummation." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 138)

"Palamas said that unlike Christ Who had, wholly, both His being and His godlike work, we are worthy only of a part the godlike work, as a drop of water in an ocean (...). But this doesn't mean that the Ghost is crumbled in pieces. The Ghost is shared and he still remains undivided, like the fire can be shared to many but without dividing it in itself. The ghost remains whole and He works everywhere likewise, but we impropriate to ourselves, from His work, only as much as we are able to. The Ghost is undivided in the divided persons. Each eye receives from the sunlight as much as it is able to, but the sunlight remains, in itself, undivided. The Ghost multiplies Himself but still remaining One, and He is shared but still remaining undivided. Not only that we do not objectively divide the work of the Holy Ghost, but the work of the Holy Ghost unites all of us who are imparted with it, with its source, namely with God. One cannot conceive deification without union with God." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 138-139)

"The Holy Fathers called the Light from Tabor as deification too. So did Andrew of Crete on the Holiday of the Transfiguration (f. 276 r.). Andrew of Crete also sang: "This we are celebrating today: the deification of the nature, the changing of the nature in something higher, the exit and the elevating of the nature above the things belonging to the nature". And Maximos the Confessor said: "Christ rewards the ones who obey Him, with the uncreated deification, which isn't created, but it is as a not-understood showing, in the righteous ones". (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 158)

"The deification means here the work which somebody is deified through, and there it means what the one who is found worthy of being deified, he takes. But never is separated the deified one from the One Who deifies. So that there do not take place multiple deifications, as blasphemously said Gregoras. The deification united the believers with God. As Maximos the Confessor said: "By remaining the deified one as wholly man according to his body and to his soul, due to nature, he also becomes wholly God according to the soul and to be body, due to the grace.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 160)

“Without Christ, as God came within world as man, but also remaining God, the world would have been darkness, for the world wouldn’t have prepared us for the eternal life which is full of the joy of eternally communicating with Him, and in that case the world would have prepared us for death, or for the total narrowness, in the eternal monotony and in the endless torment. This is because the world was created out of nothing, and not out of the God’s being. That’s why, the world is filled up with light only in connection with Christ Jesus, and the world becomes thus transparent in order us to be endlessly deepened in knowing Him, and for our communion with Him and, thus, for the communion amongst us too. Only if the embodied God makes the world transparent for Himself, in order us to see Him in things and in our fellow humans, the things being unveiled to us as being mastered by Him, and the people as deepening into understanding and feeling of God, the things will help us to advance increasingly further in the infinity of God and the people will help us to advance in His love; only thus all everything will be filled up with His light. Through love and by communicating with Him, Christ has made Himself both as a path towards Him and as target. He has made Himself path and target as a close to us and true man, but also as God giving us the power to advance towards Him. Though we are only people. This is for He gives us, on Himself, not only as role-model of man, but he also attracts us towards the union with Him as God, and He deifies us, or he fills us up with the godlike powers on this purpose.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 51-52)

“Itself the creation’s material part is elevated to its filling up with the divine spirituality, through the man consisting of conscious soul and body. If the soul transforms the matter in body and the soul makes out of body an environment for God’s works (...) and, through the conscious soul the man calls upon the godlike powers to come and work through himself upon matter, God works too, through the man’s soul, as supreme spirit, upon the man’s body, and upon the material universe, in addition to the fact that he created this universe and He upholds it. The existence’s material plan isn’t separated from God and from His work.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 58)

“Having Christ in himself, the man who believes in Christ reaches to be increasingly more the environment which Christ works through, like the soul works through the body. This is for working the soul into the man’s body, through the man’s soul filled up with the gift from Christ, within the man’s body works a soul filled up with God. All the acts of that man become clean, or that soul is increasingly filled up with the godlike work of Christ dwelling within that soul. One could even say that in that man’s body too, there works Christ, since Christ is within man with His body too, uniting Himself with the man's body. But this doesn't mean that the man's body and soul are put in a passive state. Christ actually works through the works of the man's body and soul. Like Christ was touching, with His hand, the blind man's eyes, in order to that hand's movement to convey His godlike power, likewise he conveys through the hand so of a believer, the godlike power from within His body, His body which is inside the believer too. Christ is in the believer an internal path bringing the man increasingly closer to Christ, and making the man increasingly more an environment of Christ's powers." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 74)

"We will fully have the Ghost of Christ within us – and therefore also the total freedom from the nature's laws and the escaping from death – at the general resurrection and in the future life. This is for we will be then fully united with Christ Who, as God, he fully escaped from death, the humanity He has assumed, in order to convey us too, this liberation, but also the godlike powers conveyed to his human nature, in order to unveil us, continuously, new meanings and possibilities, in the creation seen as continuously advancing into God, and to set those meanings and possibilities in work. Like Christ was able to use any touch with the body as nature, in order to work wonders through it, likewise the people will be able to use the whole spiritualized matter, through their spiritualized bodies, in order to do the desired good, after some of them used as exceptional anticipations, some of their works, on this purpose, in the present life, through the Holy Ghost. This is for in them is extended the work of Christ, lesser on earth and more in the eternal life. Christ worked His wonders through movements of His body, but He didn't work those wonders only through that. Nothing human was done only through human nature, for there was Him as the basis, as God Who was upholding the human nature, and nothing godlike was done only by the godlike nature and it didn't live only in a godlike mode, for Christ did His works through his body and He felt them through His human nature. Christ's humanity was ceaselessly valued in everything that Christ was doing as God. Everything belonging to Him as man, it belonged to Him as God too. And everything that was godlike in Him, it belonged to the One Who has made Himself man. This can be said too, about each deified man in the future life. This is for within the deified people there will be Christ with His freedom from the body's matter and of the transfigured universe." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 105-106)

"The full exit from the darkness of the death and fully entering the life's light, are shown into Jesus Christ as in the first fruit of the humanity, and it will be shown in all the ones believing in Christ, at the general resurrection. But it starts working while the people are still in this life, being shown, partially, in their souls and being extended from their souls to their bodies." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 119)

“Receiving Christ into our body it means receiving Christ’s deified body, His all-holy Ghost totally overwhelming the material matter. Thus, it is explained the hiding of Christ, with His body, during the forty days from after His resurrection, and His coming out from hiding any time He wanted, in front of the Apostles. From this unseen presence Christ accomplishes His deifying work into our soul and body. But in the eyes of the ones who is imparted with the body of Christ, and who has a strong faith, one can see the godlike cleanness, and in that one’s words one can see the full of mystery meanings of Christ, and in that one’s hands one can see the loving-of-people work of Christ. By and large, on that one’s face, one can see the light of Christ.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 126-127)

“The illumination is one with the cleaning up of evil thoughts and feelings. That’s why the saints are true bright lights. The cleaning up of evil thoughts it is a luminous coat which one enters with, in the wedding chamber of the heavenly Groom.

But this luminous coat doesn’t belong only to the soul, but it belongs to the body too. And this cleanness, or this light, it is one with the holiness. The light, the cleanness, the joy, the communion, the holiness, are one and the same thing. The defiled ones, the egotistic one, they are darkened and unhappy.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 130-131)

“The light, the cleanness, the holiness, the joy of the communion, they do not remain locked up within the soul, but they are also into the body too. This shows us, also, that the material matter - gathered and organized by the soul, being possible to be used as malleable and unitary system of organs or the many and diverse feelings of the soul and therefore possible to be sanctified through the soul which is filled up with the godlike energies – it isn’t made in order to remain foreign and rigidly opposed to the soul and to deification, but it is made for expressing the diverse works amongst which it is also the endless illumination shown in cleanness, in holiness, and in transference to God.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 131)

“God created the human being as a being whom He not only listens to, but whom he also can commit His wonderful deeds through, which are above the nature’s powers. God had given the human being a value and a spiritual-corporal structure which are so wonderful that they elevate the human being on His level, or nigh to Him, in committing His deeds which are above the nature’s laws; God makes the human being as god to Him, or God according to the grace.” (Stăniloae 1995: 160)

“The average human being, at his Baptism, he is born again out of the Holy Ghost, but He only remains in the human nature. The human being is born again by receiving the grace of his renewal, or the Ghost of Christ. The holy Ghost Who has entered the human nature out of the Son as God, the Ghost is extended also in each human being who is baptized, renewing the human nature which each human being is born with. The baptized human beings they become, by grace, as sons of the heavenly Father, and not as son by the framing of the human nature in the Hypostasis of the Only Begotten Son. All the human beings become sons while still remaining human beings, but they are united with the Only Begotten Son, through the Ghost extended by the Son's human nature upon our human nature, for we have the human nature in common with Him. The Son of God descended more to our state as human being, than we ascended to Him as God. He has made Himself the real Subject of our human nature; we do not become subjects of His godlike nature. God has made Himself man, in order us to become gods, but not gods according to the nature, as Christ has made Himself man according to the nature, but we are made gods by grace. He has made Himself more man than we become gods. But only by that we are imparted with His quality as Son of God, according to the humanity that He has assumed." (Stăniloae 1995: 179)

"Christ is accessible to us, but we feel Him as full of a power from above us. We live Him as the Person-Absolute, but we feel in the humanity assumed by Him that He willingly lives our weakness and, by that, we feel His real and understanding compassion for us, for he voluntarily submits Himself to all the pains, for us. We know Him as the One Who is above anything that could dominate Him, but also as receiving for us, willingly, bigger sufferings than the ones which we can endure. Just in this benevolent closeness of His, to us, as closer than any human being can be to us, just in this extreme understanding of His, for us, we feel Him as the love's Person-Absolute Who stays, as Hypostasis, at the foundation of His, and our, humanity. We feel within Him as accomplished the highest peak of the humanity for it is upheld by His godlike Hypostasis. We feel Him as a peak Who we must eternally tend towards, as human beings, but without ever being able to identify ourselves to Him. He is our eternal future, and the perspective of our endless humanization, that equals to deification." (Stăniloae 1995: 186)

"Right through eth death endured with His humanity, Christ showed Himself that even as man, He loved God more than he cherished the world's things, and even more than He valued His human life. And, through our mysterious union with the Christ Who is dead with His body to the material things, we impropriate too, to ourselves, His death towards the material things, things which we commit sins through, and we can attach ourselves too, to God, and, by this, we are sanctified. This is a radical mutation occurring in human consequently to reentering the connection with God. "But on you, who were yore estranged and enemies with your cogitation, shown in your wicked deeds, now He reconciled you in the body of His flesh, through His death, in order to place you righteous and innocent saints, before Him” (Col. 1: 21-22)”. (Stăniloae 1995: 190)

“Christ has transformed the death, from punishment for the sin, as means of elevating the human to God, and of strengthening the human. The death becomes the sacrifice which the spiritually strengthened man is reunited through, with God, and with his fellow humans, into love. And by this the human being is sanctified.” (Stăniloae 1995: 190)

“The human is called to ascend, consciously and freely, led by the hypostatical wisdom, that is, in the same time, the Son of God, all the way up to be made the human of the Son’s Person, and by this, all the way up to make Himself as man amongst people, but still remaining the Son, the Only Begotten Son of God. The human being is the crown of the creation for the Son of God has made Himself man. God hasn’t created a universe in order to look at it, from above, or from distance, but God has created the universe in order to make it, through the humanity God has assumed, the content of His life into His Son, and in order to make the godlike life from within His Son, as content of the universe.” (Stăniloae 1995: 56)

“Saint Gregory Palamas constantly repeated that the godlike light isn’t a material light, not even a light of the natural intelligence. It is a light of the love from above nature, in which has been transformed the nature itself of the one who sees the godlike light. It is the state of culminant spiritualization, or of cleanness, or of overwhelming the harsh impulses of the egotism, it is a state of supreme kindness, of gentleness, of understanding, and of love; it is a feeling of the spiritual thinness and lightness. This is the state of deification, of likeness to the godlike Spirit.” (Stăniloae 1992: 308)

Dialogue

“(…) the world’s rationality implies, for its fulfillment, the existence of a superior subject, according to the analogy of the superior rationality of the human person, namely a free Subject Who created and imprinted to the world a rationality on the level of the human understanding, for a dialogue with the man, a dialogue through which the man is to be led towards an eternal and superiorly rational communion with the infinite creator subject. Everything that is a rational object it is only the means for an interpersonal dialogue.” (Stăniloae 2003: 20-21)

“According to our faith, the rationality existing in the universe, it needs to be completed, it asks for an explanation of itself in the person’s rationality. The rationality from the universe it doesn’t exhaust the whole rationality. This rationality, regarded in itself as the sole existing one, it had determined many modern writers and thinkers to go so far than to consider the universe, which leads any person to death, as being a huge necropolis, as a universe of the absurd, of the lack of meaning, of an irrational rationality. But the rationality of the universe cannot be, though, irrational or absurd. But the universe’s rationality if gains its full meaning when considered as having its source in a rational person, Who uses it for a dialogue of love, a dialogue with other persons.” (Stăniloae 2003: 21)

“Through everything, God leads us, as through a continuous dialogue, towards our consummation, by opening to us the perspective towards fulfilling the meaning of our existence in the communion with the infinite God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 32)

“In the continuous dialogue with the people successively brought to existence, the relation of God with the temporal world it gains its full sense. The man is offered the world by God, and God is offered the world by man. The world is seen by God in man, and it is seen by man in dependency to God. Prolonging the existence of the people in the form of ceaseless decisions of will towards the world as object and in relation with the fellow humans, towards whom they live an unconditional responsibility, it shows that they do not exist through the prolongation of a deeper and undefined force, but they exist by the free will of God Who always appeals their will. And the world too is wanted by God for it serves the people’s existence as partners of the dialogue with God, a dialogue of unconditional responsibility amongst them and towards Him.” (2003: 348)

“The texts of Saint Gregory of Nyssa and the entire conception of Saint Maximos the Confessor highlight the fact that God has created the world for man and God destined the leading of the world towards the full communion with him, especially through the dialogue with the man. Only the man can be and can become increasingly more the 'witness' of the glory and of the kindness of God shown through the world; only the man can consciously enjoy increasingly more the love of God, by becoming His partner. That's why the world as nature is created for the human subjects. The world has an anthropocentric character. Only in the human subjects the world unveils its sense. This is for only the people are aware of a sense of their existence and of their physical-biological nature, and only they surpass the repetition of the nature's laws, by being able to elevate themselves to pursuing and accomplishing other meanings through the nature." (2003: 353-354)

"The greatest gift somebody can give to God it is the gift of his own life itself. Of course, this turning back of the gift it doesn't mean despising the received gift. If that had been the case, the gift the man had turned it back to God it wouldn't have been any longer a gift. Turning a gift back implies cherishing it just by the one who has received it. In giving our life towards God our will does a supreme sacrifice, given the fact the human nature essentially wants to preserve itself. Actually, by the fact he gives, the man does something he reckons to promote his being through. The dialogue of the gift between God and man it is that each one gives himself to the other ones. The man, even having his life from God, he can make his life as a gift to God for, though the man can keep his life until God takes it from him, the man turns his life back to God through his freedom, through a higher ministration. Of course, this doesn't mean a refusal of the life received from God. But the one who gives his life to God he doesn't care about his life in an egotistic manner, but he gives his life to God when necessary, or, most often, he puts his life in the service of God. On one hand, the man confessed through anything he offers to God that he hasn't that thing from himself but from God; on the other hand, the man confesses that he wouldn't want to benefit egotistically of the gift from God, by keeping it for himself, but the man shows at his turn the love towards God by giving Him at least what he can give, namely a part from the things he has received from God." (2003: 357)

"God doesn't instill in a readymade manner the meanings and the names of the things He has created, but He waits for the man's effort to decipher them, for which God has given the man the capacity and the internal need. This is because these meanings and usages are the actualizations of some indefinite virtualities. This is one more cause due to which each man learns how to speak through an effort, because he is not given the speaking in an already manner. Only in this way the dialogue implies in itself a spiritual growth and a liberty. We are given the meanings of the things objectively; likewise we are also given our capacity of noticing them. But these meanings have, in the same time, the character of a request from the part of God, and the man must strive to answer it. God expects the man to discover His endless thoughts placed in things and to express in his words increasingly more of the indefinite meanings He wants to tell them to the man through the things He has created for the man. We can combine the things amongst them in countless modes, or we can combine the things with us, and we can place ourselves in relations of always unpredictable variety with others, through the things. Thus, we actualize in various modes, the virtuality of the speaking that has God as requesting partner. The man has the possibility not to make the effort to penetrate at the whole richness of meanings and to the meanings which can develop him in the fullest sense of the word. The man progresses in this case too, but the progress might not be always the true one.” (2003: 368-369)

“According to our faith, the man starts discovering the rationalities of the things by discovering their material use, but concomitantly to this also by searching for their higher meaning, by explaining their purpose. The things are rational on this double purpose: in order to be useful to the man for biological survival, but also on the purpose the man to increase spiritually by knowing the meanings and the increasingly higher conformity of the man with that purpose, and or the things’ ultimate meaning Who is God, Who answers the fullest to the man’s thirst for fulfillment. The meaning of the things widens to the man by the fact that they constitute the content of the common thinking and of the verbal communication with the others, and therefore of the increasingly intimate communion in by and large, of the accord based on things that the man realizes it with the others, of the reciprocal spiritual enrichment and union. But in this communication the people unveil also what is above the material needs. They unveil themselves as subjects searching for a supreme spiritual meaning of the things and of themselves. This communication unveils in itself not only a permanent rationality, but also some increasingly higher meanings. And in the same time with this, the things themselves unveil continuously new meanings in maintaining and elevating this communion.” (2003: 369-370)

“Above all, the things unveil their meaning for the rationality is seen by man, as having its source unitarily in God as Person, for the things are seen as means of the love of God, and therefore of the dialogue of God with us and of the dialogue amongst us, a dialogue God leads us through to a increasingly more profound knowing His thinking and His love, and to a growth of our own thinking and love in the relation amongst us and with God.” (2003: 371)

“The dialogue with God through things, it contributes to our development, for the things are seen as images, or as symbols, or as transparent images of the rationalities of God, of the meanings He pursuits by creating the things, meanings He wants to lead us through, increasingly more towards Him and towards our own development, on the condition that us to discover these meanings and to achieve them. Thus, we grow up through things for through them we know increasingly more the loving intentions God has with us. The better the things are known, the more as known are the wisdom and the love of God towards people, and the more these ones are known, the more profound are the meanings seen within things.”(2003: 371-372)

“Within world it is accomplished a dialogue between the work of God and the work of the human being. The work of God requires our work as corresponding answer to His work; the work of God is a helping and encouraging work, some other times pedagogically punishing, a work that opens to our being new useful ways of working; sometimes the work of God strengthens our work and crowns it with success, and some other times it impedes our work, or it bring failures and pains consequently to our work, and this is because of our work doesn’t correspond to the line of the true development of the man. God makes Himself always known and increasingly known within world through a work that mostly of the time isn’t distinguished or it cannot be distinguished as a work that differs from the automatic work of the nature, which is the work of God too, Who is the Creator and the Preserver, but only as a frame, a frame that is on one hand predictable, and on the other hand is elastic because of the free work of the man and of God Himself.” (2003: 388-389)

“The conscious supreme Spirit talks to the created conscious spirit like to some kind of alter ego, but a created one. The supreme conscious Spirit cannot but have a character of subject. The conscious created spirit is image of this conscious uncreated spirit. Consequently, also the created spirit has a character of subject. But a conscious subject is always in dialogue with another conscious subject, or with other conscious subjects. The content of the supreme conscience it is common in a way, but the subjects are several. The human soul is made on the image of God as Person, both through the human soul’s conscience and in his quality of subject amongst subjects, with some kind of content of common human conscience. This is for the Subject of the supreme Logo, Who thinks the rationalities He materializes as unities of the nature, He has the ground of a dialogue with the created subjects just in the dialogue with the other divine Subjects, with some kind of common content of conscience amongst Them, as it is common amongst Them also the content of conscience of the created subjects, who, to a place, it is common also to the one of the divine Subjects, These Ones sharing the people the eternal rationalities of the things” (2003: 394)

“The purpose of the Creation is fulfilled thus, by bringing to existence the created conscious person, for the Creator is a Person too, and for the Creation has as purpose the accomplishing of a dialogue between the supreme Person and the created persons.” (2003: 294-295)

“The new human persons are born out of a pair of other human persons, through the power of God Who enters in dialogue with them.” (2003: 396)

“God calls other and other persons to the dialogue with Himself, and to the continuation of the world’s elevating to the state of transparent environment of His, by bringing them to existence. But in bringing the new persons to existence God collaborates with the act of love of the human persons, who commit themselves with their most serious responsibility in bringing to existence and in raising other human persons to their state of conscious freedom, conveying them their dialogue with God and with the fellow humans and all His teachings. Thus, each person come to existence represents a new and continued modality of manifestation of the human liberty in the dialogue with God and with the fellow humans, through nature, which they organize and develop correspondingly, but it also represents a framing into the common responsibility of all the people for this work.” (2003: 404)

“The dialogue between God and man is destined to last continuously. Through the sin the clear communion is being darkened, but for the rational soul remains within man, there remains also a certain relation with God, even if God is no longer known as a Person, but only as truth and as impersonal good, which spring out of His covered face.” (200: 410)

“Our being in quality of image of God remains permanently participant to divine, to the godlike light, even if doesn’t see that light enough clearly.” (2003: 410)

“The dialogue of acts of the believer with God, accomplished through cosmos, it doesn’t exclude a certain participation of the angels.” (2003: 464)

“The creation has been organized in order to be a place God can speak within it, and God can work within it, in order to achieve the goal of full love between Him and people, a place where we can answer God by our word and deeds, by engaging ourselves on the road of this developing communion, a communion that God wants it. The creation fulfills its purpose as long as it remains a place where our being can maintain a dialogue with God, and only if still remains, even partially, seen as a gift from God, as basis of the superior gift of the salvation, through which the creation will be escaped from the present state of corruption and death.” (2003: 495)

“This always increased dialogue and accord aren’t meant to be a purely intellectual dialogue and accord, but a dialogue and an accord of increasingly fuller love, given the fact that the human subjects receive through things, from their Creator and Caretaker, not only meanings, but also vital goods, material and spiritual goods, and by processing the things and by their behavior towards God and towards their fellow humans, in diverse circumstances, the people receive from their fellow humans and from God and, at their turn, they offer not only deciphering of new meanings of the text, but also the adaptation of the things to their needs. So, one can advance in the communion with God and with his fellow humans. The things cannot be understood and used except by being processed and deciphered in a common collaboration, imposed by circumstances, from amongst which isn't absent the guiding, thinking, and speaking processing of the godlike Word. This constitutes the world's history. All the people collaborate thus to adapt the things and the circumstances to their superior needs and to ever deeper and ever more nuanced deciphering of their meanings, to enriching the language and by doing this, enriching their own spirituality. They speak about things and circumstances, about the fact that they need those things and circumstances, about the help they ask for and they give it, for they need to give and to receive the things to/from one another, in an always increasing love, in a spiritual growth of everybody. In this concomitantly practical and intellectual dialogue, a dialogue promoting love amongst them and opening of the meanings and of the existence as gifts of the supreme Person. In all of them the people decipher righteous laws of life, as some laws from God, which they conform themselves to." (Stăniloae 2006, 6-7)

"Thus, in a certain way, the godlike Word communicates through creation and by developing it, led by Providence, meanings, and norms, but He communicates Himself in another manner with His loving attention, in order to lead the human beings towards an ever deeper and nuanced knowledge of Him, and towards an ever-increased conformation and communion with Himself." (Stăniloae 2006, 6-7)

„Because of their self-pride, the people have fallen from seeing, through things, the creator and taking of care Person. They haven't wanted to consider the things as images of the rationalities of the supreme thinking Person, neither as words of His love. They have started to consider the things as rationalities in themselves, because of they have reckoned that thus they could understand the things and they could manipulate them to the end, in a fully autonomous mode, by becoming they (the people) like God. By this, they have exited from the living relation with the Word as Person, by all the things and circumstances – images of His rationalities and words. The man have found himself alone, facing a world of objects, closed to him in a "meaningless" rationality, or with a meaning limited exclusively to the earthly life, without a prolongation into eternity; the man has found himself outside the relationship with the supreme Person, Who gives meaning to the rationalities from within things, and meaning and life to the human persons He has created, and a continuous novelty; the man has seen himself facing a world submitted to some processes of uniform repetition of the continuous making and of the unmaking of the world's unities, this meaning death to the human persons. The rationality remained within the human being and the rationality remained within things, no longer having these rationalities within them the transparency of the godlike Logos, the man no longer had in them a helper against the irrational impulses and against the passions born out of these impulses. But objectively, the godlike Logos as Person, He continues to manifest His presence through the man's rationality and through the things' rationalities. That's why a number of antiquity's philosophers reached at the idea of a unique God, and the Stoics reached at the idea of His presence within world through the "seminal rationalities" and at serious morals based on rationality. The Eastern Church followed to honor them, later, as prophets from outside and painted them on the exterior walls of some monasteries and churches. And many amongst pagans were fulfilling, by nature, the law of God, for they had it inscribed in their hearts (Rom. 2: 14) as natural law, advancing on the line of accomplishing their true humanity." (Stăniloae 2006: 7)

"The Logos like Rationality as Person, as subject of the loving thinking, he hypostatizes in Himself the human nature, by having as consequence a culminant human accomplishment as Person. This is because of the human person is "created in His image", the model implies in Himself, potentially, also His Image, which he accomplishes, in a subsistent manner and in a culminant degree, by assuming the human nature as an image unfolded in Himself, as an image inseparably united to the model. His human image as different partner of the dialogue with the Logos, it is no longer such a different partner in Christ, but the Logos Himself is in dialogue with the Father, both as godlike Son and as man, and in dialogue with us, both as man and as Son of God. As man in dialogue with the Father, Christ elevates His human responsibility on the maximum human level, but this is for He is elevated as man, on this level, by His simultaneous quality as Son of God, Who has the conscience that He isn't only the Son of God, but he is a man too. And as God in dialogue with us, He is lowered on the level of maximum love and intimacy with us, but this is just due to the fact that, by being on this human culminant level, He doesn't cease to be God too. Like God, He makes Himself transparent and proven in His humanity; like man, he put a note of maximum closeness in His quality as God in relation with us, and in His quality as obedient Son in relation with the Father. One and the Same calls us to the maximum responsibility as God, and he manifests a maximum responsibility towards the Father, for us. He commands us and He prays together with us and for us. He asks us for obedience and He prays us to accept His love and to follow His full of humbleness, of gentleness, and of serving example. Through both of them the man is being consummated, but the man is being consummated for the same is God too." (Stăniloae 2006: 16)

“The man is fully constituted ever since the beginning of his existence through the breath of life blown by God, namely through the Holy Ghost. All the more He constitutes, on Himself, the Word of God, like man, by the together-working of the Holy Ghost. By the work of the Holy Ghost the man is constituted as subject, through whom the spirit is being affirmed as a superior factor to the nature, and therefore not as an object; by the work of the Holy Ghost, the man is called to a dialogue with the Logos. In Christ, the man founds his supreme fulfillment of his identity, as subject, with the Logos as divine Subject, by the presence of the Ghost Himself as Person.” (Stăniloae 2006: 35)

“The truth imposes itself with the whole power when it directly communicates about itself. In His act of Self-communicating, God imposes, on Himself as truth, powerfully. One can feel in any word of God, the totality of the living truth, identical to the Person of God. The integral truth is shown in Christ as living Person, Who has made, on Himself, Hypostasis of the human spirit. By this fact, the human spirit notices the truth in the whole its fullness. In addition to that, for Christ has assumed Himself the human mode of communication, He communicates, on Himself, in the most directly and in the most accessible to the people, manner; He (the Truth) presents God in maximum closeness, for amongst the degrees of presence, the presence of the dialogue, it represents the presence of the ones being, in the most direct manner, in the maximum closeness of the partners. God is present in Christ in this maximum presence of the partner in the direct dialogue as man. This is the more accessible and the fullest closeness of God. God is available in Christ to any man, in the virtuality of this maximum closeness, as partner in human form, in an eternal dialogue, and He can lead the man for infinitely knowing Him as God.” (Stăniloae 2006: 50-51)

“The Word of the embodied God communicates, on Himself, to us, not only by words, but also through deeds of love, of sacrifice, and of power, deeds which are, at their turn, words.” (Stăniloae 2006: 54)

“The bread we bring as wafer to God, it is what keeps the people’s life, and therefore the community announced through this gesture that it gives its life itself at the disposition of God. But the people have the bread, as their own lives too, from God. Therefore, in the bread the people return to God this gift, or the condition of their lives, and thus their own becoming. But by the descent of the Holy Ghost the bread or the life offered as gift they are transformed in the Christ’s body, which being given to the believers, as a superior gift, it elevates the whole believers’ life to a deified state. But, in order to transform the bread offered by community, in His body, Christ must take it in Himself as a sacrifice of it. Thus, the Eucharist is a dialogue and a meeting between people and God, in Christ, as a culmination of this dialogue and of this encounter. This dialogue unfolds not only in life, but also along the entire Liturgy, being elevated to the culminant level it reaches on in Eucharist.” (Stăniloae 1997: 73)

“The man has come to existence out of nothing, as subject called by God in order to remain forever as full subject in the dialogue of love with God. But the man has weakened in himself the character as subject and thus the man has fallen under the shadow and the power of the death. In Christ, the Logos, the model of the human subject, He makes on Himself the subject of our nature and he defeats the death. Any man, by becoming again as subject by entering the dialogue with the divine Logos, Who is the supreme Subject and the model of the man’s subject, the man can defeat the death and he can resurrect with Christ, namely the man can receive back his image or his face for eternity. Any man can become as subject only through the calling of another subject and through his willing answer, but fully and in the last analysis the man becomes as subject only through the calling of the divine Subject, Who is the man’s model and foundation, and the man can also do that by willingly persevering in the deeply responsible dialogue with God, namely not through acts which to be exercised upon the man as upon an object. Through icon, we confess the eternal persistence of the human face, nigh to us at maximum and in dialogue with us, of the supreme Subject, of the model and of the foundation of us as subjects; we manifest the power of the feeling which we receive of answering as subjects to the divine Subject, Who has become human subject and Who remained in dialogue with us for eternity. And we receive this power for Himself remains as Subject or as human face.” (Stăniloae 2005: 172)

“The human image hasn’t disappeared in Christ, for Christ hasn’t’ ceased to be full human subject and therefore He hasn’t ceased the intimate dialogue with us. His flesh and bones haven’t been changed in the godlike nature.” (Stăniloae 2005: 172-173)

“In asking for the mercy of God it is active both a light that wants to awake the person from his sins and a light urging the man towards correcting himself. That’s why Saint Simeon spoke about a dialogue of the man with God, a dialogue taking place during the whole work for correcting the man. The man asks God for not to hide His light from the man, and God answers the man that he doesn’t hide His face from the man but the man hides himself from God’s face (Hymn 53, op. c. p. 672).” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 116-117)

“The words of God addressed to us, they are both appeals and helps to us, in order to deepen His image within us, in order to make us like Him, and these ones are appeals to our love, and to us in order to answer His love.

Only thus we increase in the union with God. The One Who speaks and the one affirmatively answering Him, they accomplish by this, between them, a union. The One Who speaks, he helps by this, the union with Him or the one whom He speaks to. If in His words God communicates us, on Himself, in His creator and life-giving power, we will have to show and to bring forth fruits of this life received from Him, by answering Him with our love, namely through our corresponding words, for our words are a form of our self-giving. Only thus we impropriate to us the life that God gives us. And only thus we bring Him joy. His words which He gives, on Himself, to us, as Truth and Life, they make us answer Him, by thanking Him and by our self-giving to Him, through the praise we bring Him by confessing our joy for the life we've received, and by asking Him for even more life. If we had been only some objects, God wouldn't have addressed us His words. Neither could have addressed us words, a "God" Who hadn't been a Person, but Who would have been only an unconscious essence. God creates us as subjects, and we are not only capable of receiving His words, but we also want Him give us those words and we are capable of answering those words. God creates us in order Him to rejoice for we receive His words and for we answer His words. If we hadn't been created capable of answering His words, with the conscious joy that we produce Him a joy by doing that, we wouldn't have been made as His partners, we wouldn't have been made worthy of our answer to be listened to, by Him, or worthy of Him to receive our self-giving. God makes us partners of the dialogue with Him, as persons, for Himself is a Person. Both partners of this dialogue are persons, and they rejoice of one another. He descended Himself, by creating us as speaking beings, to the state of the One Who rejoices of listening to our answer, or Who rejoices of receiving our self-giving, as answer given to His words, through our words. And He hasn't founded this dialogue with us and He doesn't uphold it, for He would need the joy we bring Him by this dialogue, but He does all of these out of His love as Father and as older Brother Who rejoices of love of the child of or His younger brother, no matter how smalls and how helpless that younger brother would be. He wants us to grow up, through this, towards increasingly understanding His love, and towards the will of answering His love with our love. By this, He has given us the honor of holding us accountable in from of Him, for our growth, and for others' growth, towards the even higher levels of this state. God-the Word is perfectly able to take care of all His creatures. But, if he hadn't called us to this responsibility for ourselves and for other, He would have treated us as on some objects. But, by giving us too, the responsibility for ourselves and for others, He has made us capable of answering the care He asks us for, for ourselves and for others. By this, He elevates us on the level of together-responsible, with Him, or as accomplishers of ourselves and of others, by His power. Without our answer to His appeal of taking care of ourselves, we cannot be saved, namely we cannot receive the eternal life; and without the answer He asks from us, for taking care for others, sometimes the other's salvation could be endangered, but ours it surely is. The others' salvation doesn't totally depend on us, because in such a case they wouldn't have had the quality as responsible subjects, but their salvations till depends on our collaboration with Him in our care for others, our salvation being shown in the fact that we are free and self-standing subjects, and that we must behave ourselves as such, and not as passive objects. This is for the human person's mystery doesn't consist only of the inexhaustible richness of meanings seeded in him, and received by the human person through the Word of supreme communion, by the fact that He is One of the Trinity's Persons, but it also consists of the thirst for communion and of the duty of the human person of receiving and of communicating those meanings. In this implies the need of each person for answering for himself, and also for others, freely, in front of a supreme Subject. The accountability for himself, of the human persons, it includes both his character as ultimate decisional forum in what concerns himself, and also the dependency of his salvation on the supreme Subject." (Stăniloae 1995: 114-115)

"The human being has been placed in the dialogue with God, since his creation. But the tilting towards a life nourished mainly from his own knowledge than from the dialogue with God, it has weakened this dialogue. This is because the dialogue requires also listening, namely humbleness. When God spoke to the human being after this one's falling off the direct relation with God, the human being hid in the nature's bush. If the human being still hears the voice of God, he hears it as rebuking, and without seeing God." (Stăniloae 1995: 146-147)

"The human being is thirsty for elevating himself on the level of the fullest encounter with the Person-Absolute, without being confounded to Him. But the human being cannot reach that, only by his own initiative and power, just because the true Absolute is Person, and, that's why, it is necessary His will too, and, more precisely, it is needed His initiative in order the real dialogue to be accomplished between Him and the human being, as between persons. God entered such a dialogue with the human being, through patriarchs and through prophets or through the Revelation of the Old Testament. But that dialogue wasn't the fullest dialogue which the human being was thirsty for, and, so, it wasn't either the highest level of the God's Revelation Who doesn't openly unveil Himself except in a dialogue." (Stăniloae 1995: 162)

"For the supreme level of the dialogue, that is the dialogue of the supreme love too, and also of the fullest unveiling for the human being's possibilities of perceiving, it was necessary that God Himself to descend on the level as human partner of the human being, but still to remain God. But, in order this supreme dialogue to be accomplished, it wasn't necessary the man to be made God by nature, because that would have annulled the human being, and it would have been contrary to God's love for the human being, and it would have been shown, the human being, as the bearer of a God's act of will. Only a God made Himself man, lowered on the level of the human being, but without ceasing to be God, he could elevate to the fullness of His dialogue with the human being and He could bring His unveiling to an end, without giving others, from on a superior level, the assignment to speak to the people about Him, and about His love, and just by this He showed His unequivocal love for the human being. This lowering on the level as partner of the human being, on the human being's level, in the dialogue with the human being, it was required both by God's love for the human being and by the human being's thirst for the total love of the Person-Absolute." (Stăniloae 1995: 162-163)

"Accomplishing this truly intimate dialogue and this full unveiling in the mode accessible to the human being, it couldn't have been done except at the initiative of God. Only God could unveil Himself in the surest mode as what He is, as loving of people Person, insomuch that He descended on the people's level." (Stăniloae 1995: 163)

"The unity of the Person-Absolute with the humanity He has assumed, and the way we feel Him through the humanity He has assumed, it is made possible by the human being's quality as image of God. If the image has the endless aspiration towards the absolute Good, namely towards His Subject, towards the full dialogue of love with Him, then the human being will be somehow open to Him." (Stăniloae 1995: 180)

"The fullest and the clearest transcendence, towards the uncreated Absolute, it was done when God Himself came as man, for encountering the human beings into Christ, and by this He has forever entered the dialogue with them." (Stăniloae 1995: 203)

"God has created us for this dialogue with Him, by making us as His images. Being image of God and remaining image of His and developing as such, it means being a dialogue partner of God. And the man by being made communicative dialogue partner to God, he is made towards the eternal existence. The love of God doesn't forget anyone who once entered the dialogue with Him, and therefore God doesn't let that one to definitively ceasing to exist. God dialogues with us through His Word. That's why through His Word God also restores us, when we weaken in the direct connection with Him, as dialogue partners; he makes Himself man but He remains God too, for through the mediation of the connection with us, as man, to make us feel the direct relation with us which he has come back into, as dialogue Partner." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 19-20)

“The indelible persistence of the man’s quality as image or as dialogue partner of God, even in the man’s fallen state, it is shown by the fact that even those greatly doubting the faith, they feel the need to address themselves, when crossing difficult moments, to God, and they do that more intensely than they ever address to the people.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 20)

“One can separate himself from any man, but one cannot totally separate himself from God. Sometimes, just in that total forsaking from people you feel that there is Someone nigh to you, and you do not hang above a total void, in the metaphysical loneliness. But that means that only when you Find God through man, you will find in man a firm support, which doesn’t let you in the void of the total helplessness. When you meet another in the experience of the ultimate common support into God, this experience will be strengthened to you. This unites my loneliness with the loneliness of another – or yours and mine need for supporting each other, of course without a total success, because of the insufficiency of the communion amongst us the people – with the dialogical encounter with God. You feel God coming in dialogue with you, even when you no longer feel any man in real, sincere, deep dialogue with you – actually, you feel that especially then. This is shown to us by the case of Job too.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 20)

“In Christ we encounter God directly, even in human communication. God has descended to the mode of human communication, and the human has been elevated on the level of direct communication with God. In Christ have been united the human closeness with the divine height and consummation of the communication. And the communication amongst us it can achieve this quality from Christ.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 20)

“God Himself asked the man to speak, for He urged the man or He has placed in the man’s nature the need to discover the words He has communicated him through things or through the meanings ha has given to the things.” (Stăniloae 2003: 357)

“If the created conscience is brought to existence in ontological connection with the materialized rationality of the world, which the Logos, after Creation, he continues to think it efficiently and to lead it towards the state the human conscience could exist and function in it. The Logos uses towards this also an impulse of development placed in the world’s materialized rationality itself. The Creation reaches thus the state of complex organizing, close to the one of the body adequate to the conscious soul brought to existence by the supreme conscious Spirit. Then the conscious soul is brought to existence through the special creator and initiator act of the dialogue of the Logos with the soul.” (Stăniloae 2003: 394)

“When creating the man, the creator work of the Logos no longer consisted only in a new impulse and in a new power given to the general rationality, in order to produce new analogue forms of the divine rationality of the Logos, but He entered Himself as subject in dialogical creator relation with a created subject, who is seen image of His spiritual subject, bringing to existence the human soul in the same time with the body. Thus, it could be concentrated in the new subject not only the expression of the whole materialized rationality of the world, but also his quality of conscious bearer of this rationality. The divine Logos started speaking to a created image of His, as subject, as hypostasis, by creating him or by calling him to existence, and this image manifested ever since the beginning in a biological organism, which started to be formed. Through this, the man stays in a conscious relation, in a conscious dialogue, in order to produce in the world all kind of wanted transformations, in the likeness of God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 396)

“God instills in the biological organism the spiritual support of the spirit who His call is addressed, and in the same time God gives the soul the capacity to answer. God, by breathing into the man, he starts talking to the man, or He assures the man that God is the One speaking to him and the man must answer. In the same time with the soul God gives the man the conscience that God is the one speaking to him and he must answer Him. Through the breath of God, within man appears an you of God, who is ‘the image of God’, for this you can also say I, but in a biological organism. The spiritual breath of God produces an ontological spiritual breath of the man, namely the soul rooted in the biological organism, in conscious dialogue with God and with the fellow humans.” (Stăniloae 2003: 409-410)

Dispassion / Absence of the Passions

“By restraining ourselves from pleasure we have made the first step towards the spiritual force of the dispassion; by suffering the upset, the pains, and the troubles, we have undertaken the second and more decisive step. For, as I said, the enduring and the restraint do not represent something negative and they do not weaken the human nature, but they rather strengthen it; they set the human nature free from the most accentuated passiveness, that of the almost impulsive tendency towards pleasure and of the totally impulsive contraction when facing the pain. The dispassion which the restraint and the enduring lead towards, or the state of lacking of passions, though it is called by using a negative term, it represents, a contrary, in the same time with the cleanness, a state free of passiveness, and therefore it is a full liberation of the spirit and a full self-control. The dispassion isn't an impulse, a neutrality of the human nature, but it is a state intertwined out of all the virtues whose gradual achieving it isn't but a getting closer to dispassion. And the virtue means “manhood”, deriving from the Latin “virtus”. The dispassion isn't passiveness but it is a focusing of the spirit on the domain of good and of the spiritual world. Of course, this cannot be done through impulses. That's why this focusing is, related to the impulsive agitation, a resting, an appeasement.” (Stăniloae 1992: 140)

“The dispassion is the peak which the whole effort of the ascesis and which all the levels of the virtues lead towards, for the whole ascesis has as its direct purpose the purification of the body and of the soul of passions.” (Stăniloae 1992: 150)

“The dispassion isn't a negative state, for the absence of the evil cannot be reckoned as a negative state. The dispassion is “a state of peace of the soul”. The one who has reached the dispassion he no longer easily commits sin with the deed, neither with the thought, nor his anger and lust easily moves towards sin. That one has almost totally quenched the passions from his soul's faculties of the anger and of the lust, and neither can he be easily stirred up by the memory of his sinful deeds. We couldn't say that the passions have become to him almost an ontological impossibility, as they are to God. But the passions are to him an almost a moral impossibility, as, for instance, about a man who avoided stealing for decades, it is impossible to think at him as indulging himself to such a deed.” (Stăniloae 1992: 150)

“The dispassion would be that state of the soul, which the soul overcomes any temptation in. Immediately the soul has accepted the temptation either from inside or from outside, that soul has fallen from the state of dispassion. Of course, though this state has become a habit, it still hasn't become an inalienable state of the human nature, as it is to angels, or as it will be to us in our future life; though being mostly facilitated by the habit penetrated within human nature, the dispassion still needs the support from will. So, one can lose his dispassion anytime, though this has become very improbable, almost a moral impossibility. Usually, we are not at once consolidated in the state of dispassion, but by repeated elevation to it, after ever shorter falling from it, each time remaining increasingly more in it. That's why Saint John Climacus, when declaring the dispassion as "the heavens from the mind's heart that looks at the devils' plots as to some toys", he admits several degrees of dispassion. According to him: "there is dispassionate man, but there is another more dispassionate than the dispassionate one. The first one strongly hates the evil things, while the second one enriches himself endlessly in virtues." (Stăniloae 1992: 151)

"The state of dispassion will imply a positive strength, if it is capable of defeating any passions. This is no other strength but that one of the virtues. "That soul has the dispassion that is imbued with virtues. The dispassion isn't but the shirt of the total cleanness woven out of all virtues." (Saint John Climacus, The Ladder, Level XXIX)" (Stăniloae 1992: 151)

"The dispassion is the previous condition for contemplation, which is the direct purpose of the entire purifying asceticism. Of course, the total absence of the passions it still isn't equivalent to the contemplation of God. The contemplation of God needs a special unveiling of God. This unveiling cannot take place until the soul's eyes of the man still are disturbed and as long as the man's preoccupation is still attracted by passions. The absence of the passions gives the man the capacity to look at things and to remember the things in their simple meaning, without associating them to some passionate interest." (Stăniloae 1992: 153)

"The state of dispassion doesn't mean also a state of permanent contemplation of God. It is right that, without the permanent thinking at God, without remembering His name, the state of dispassion cannot be achieved and it can be preserved only with great difficulty. But this remembrance of God it doesn't totally remove the other ideas from the man's mind, neither it absorbs them, nor make them to disappear; they even aren't to the mind a permanent transparent which the mind to contemplate God through." (Stăniloae 1992: 153)

"The dispassion was reckoned by Evagrius Ponticus and by Saint Maximos the Confessor, on one hand, as that state of the soul allowing the soul to receive and to think at the things in their "simple" meaning, namely not-conjugated with a passion, and on the other hand, as state that doesn't exclude the love, but it implies the love. These two requests are completed on the following way: the absence of the passion in looking at and in thinking at things, it means the absence of the egotism. The dispassionate no longer looks at and no longer thinks at the things from the perspective of the passion that needs to be satisfied by those things; the dispassionate no longer does out of things exclusively objects related to himself, or simple means of his unsatisfied egotism. To the dispassionate, the things no longer appear as gravitating around him, but they appear to him as having their purpose independently from his egotism. The human persons appear to the dispassionate as being, who have purposes in themselves, and who ask him for help. Of course, the dispassionate doesn't stop here. Through the meanings of the persons and of the things he will see God; he will see the persons and His things and as His requests. But it is previously necessary him to see that he isn't the center of all things, in order to be set free from the illusion that the things gravitate towards him, and in order to ascertain then that the things gravitate towards God. And by looking at God, he then sees the things as being eternal into God and, as he loves God, he loves them too, as gifts from the divine love and wisdom. But this seeing of the world in its "simple" meanings, with disinterested love and, implicitly, with interest in his salvation and in the salvation of his fellow humans, it doesn't cause him a disturbance as that caused by the egotism's passions. The dispassionate knows that he influences his fellow human more by his quietude, as sign of his deep certitudes, as example of the strength given by the trust in God and by the cleaning of passions. The dispassionate works for the people's salvation, with the steadfast trust in the plan God has for each soul." (Stăniloae 1992: 154-155)

"The dispassion can reach dizzying heights. Through victory upon passions, as affects' - exaggerated and contrary to nature - movements, one can be elevated even above the natural affects and needs, at least intermittently, anticipating the state he will have after resurrection, when the body won't need anything, when we will live only spiritual joys as pure minds, when will no longer be any sadness or pain. This is the saints' lives, who can lack for a long time even the strictly necessary food, and who aren't harmed even by the viper's bite. The dispassion means, in the first place, the restoration of the human nature from its state of illness which the passions lowered it at, and then to be elevated above nature." (Stăniloae 1992: 156)

Dwelling of God within Human Being

“(....) when the people are prepared for feeling the irradiation of the Ghost through the human nature assumed by the Word, when this nature is elevated to so much capacity for divine than it is able to receive the Ghost with the whole sensitiveness and it can irradiate the Ghost towards other people, those ones themselves become capable of perceiving the Ghost through human. The Holy Ghost has made His center of action and irradiation, together with the Word of God, within the human being.” (Stăniloae 2003: 45)

“The full coming back of the Holy Ghost within the human being it takes place into Christ, for into This One, the godlike hypostasis itself of the Word it becomes the hypostasis of the human nature, showing the human nature capable of the highest union with God. Since now, the Holy Ghost has His irradiation center in the Word become man, or in the man Who is God too. This represents the highest spiritualization of the human being.”

“We live the mystery of our being as person, as subject. And the mystery of our person, as source of unimaginable states, feelings, and thoughts, we live it in an alive and actualized mode, in the relation with the mystery of the persons of our fellow humans and in the same time with that. The mystery of the godlike image of our person and of the other persons, it is unveiled and it is actualized in communion. In the communion with the fellow humans, it is unveiled the most, though, the mystery of the interpersonal divine presence. The interpersonal communion is an image of the Trinitarian communion and participation to it. Therefore, the godlike image within man is an image of the Trinity and it is shown in the human communion.” (2003: 419)

Egotism

“The vital reports with the fellow humans place the man into a state of much more seriousness. But he can easily descend even those, through his selfish attitude towards them. They cannot constitute a true border in the face of egotism, or an unshakable base of responsibility.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The greatest and the continuous impediment in the way towards love it is the egotism. Until you haven’t totally killed the egotism you won’t have true, pure, and full love for anybody. You must let far beyond yourself the waves of the ocean of egotism, in order to feel yourselves caressed from all quarters by the air coming from the love’s kingdom. He who loves on himself, he who is full with self-appreciation, he who reckon on himself as being the paramount reality, he won’t be able to love others. Loving others means forgetting about you, it means surpassing yourself, and it means reckoning yourself as nothing. The love for others is being consolidated within us through repentance and uninterrupted humbleness. The egotism sees himself inflated to proportions which cover the whole reality. He considers anything as a good that must belong to him, and he weights out any person interested in making that person useful to himself, or at least with the worry of avoiding the danger that could come from that person to his own supremacy. In all his things, in all his actions, the egotist projects his own person, he sees there his own person, he serves his own person, he worships his own person, his god is his own person, or better said his person is to him an idol replacing God. His authentic being is being drowned in egotism. His attention paid to others it is only a tactical maneuver, still serving, actually, his interests. By filling up thus, in a mysterious manner, the whole his horizon with his non-authentic ego, by fencing himself up from all quarters with his liar self, it is obvious that he cannot see others for themselves, in a disinterested manner, with true love, as he cannot also see his authentic self-framed in the loving ensemble of everybody. In any of his impulses towards others, he is impeded by his non-authentic self, and any bit of generosity is poisoned by an egotistic preoccupation. The love is the getting out of the magical and illusory circle of the selfishness, a circle extended as in a deceiving dream, to infinite. The love means getting out and launching and true relationship, in communion with others. The love means getting out from the dark dungeon of the self and entering the life of community, of solidarity, in the kingdom of love, which comprises all of us.” (Stăniloae 1992: 111-112)

Embodiment

“About the summarization and the making whole of the presence and of the work of the Word before the embodiment, both in nature and in the Old Testament, in the embodied Christ, a presence that is not suppressed by the coming of the Word into body, but it is made luminous, the same Saint Maximos said: “The Mystery of the Embodiment of the Word it comprises in itself the meaning of all the riddles and of all the types of the Scripture and the science of all the seen and thought at beings”. (Stăniloae 2006: 9-10)

“The unity of the Person of Christ in the two natures it has a series of consequences or of implications in which not only that it is even more highlighted, but it is also show more explicitly the savior consequences of the embodiment of the Word, firstly directed towards the human nature He has assumed, and then towards us, through the intimate relation the man is places with God in.” (Stăniloae 2006: 25)

“(Through the consequences of the embodiment, t. n.) it is shown the savior work of Christ, in its basis aspect, directed towards His human nature as belonging to His Person. If Christ had manifested Himself purely godlike – through the features and the acts of His godlike nature towards us - He wouldn’t have saved us; neither would have Him saved us, if he had been purely human and having only features and acts of His human nature. In both such cases, He wouldn’t have elevated His human nature to collaboration for His human nature’s salvation and for our human nature’s salvation. Even more, in both cases, he would have remained inaccessible to us as God, and therefore the union of the two natures in His Person would have remained unknown and inefficient.” (Stăniloae 2006: 25-26)

“Some of the consequences of the Embodiment of Christ are more than implications of the union of the two natures in His unique Person, as for instance is the kenosis as basis of the Embodiment, or the quality as Birth Giver of God of the Holy Virgin Mary, for they stay at the basis of the hypostatical union of Christ. Other consequences of the embodiment, as the deification, of the kenosis through Embodiment, or the lack of sin, they are rather more than consequences, for they are actualized through embodiment and they represent Christ in accomplishing the work of salvation in its fundamental.” (Stăniloae 2006: 26)

“But, if the simple human person is - more than any force of nature, or more than any principle - the quality of transcendence like border and like spiritual source to me, God, making Himself accessible to me through transcendence, He takes the most suitable form, namely that of a human person. All the human person has like secret power for confirming and stimulating my existence, it is used by God while revealing Himself to me, but, moreover, He adds to this power of human the person His infinity of authority and of divine reality, but in this form of the human person who creates the personality within me. God, by revealing Himself into a human person, He makes possible to me to enter and to persist into a living and concrete report with Him, a veridical experience of a reality from outside me, which I am communicating with, through continuous transcending from me and over me, and which I feel like a limit and like an absolute authority of me, but, in the same time, and right because of that, I feel it like the absolute support and like the source which gives my intimacy continuous growth and depth.

He who had once such an experience, he can no longer cannot affirm that there does not exist any divine reality in front of him, but it is all a myth, a subjective creation.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The Son of God, the one eternal and the Only Begotten One, He has come to place us also into the report in which He is with the Father – though we are created – and therefore, into a report brother-to-brother with Himself¹³². This was also wanted by God, through Creation. Only in this sense, whereas the man is capable of this report, it can be said that the man has or he is capable of some conformity with God.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“It suffices here to highlight that the embodiment of the Son of God took place not only on the purpose that God to come in maximum closeness to the man, but also to give, through substitutive sufferance, that satisfaction to the moral order which to produce into the people`s souls the necessities repercussions to theirs real restoration. Therefore, it wasn`t sufficient the closeness of God to the man, in order to reestablish the communion, but it was also necessary on this purpose the sacrifice for people.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Thereby, whether through embodiment, God does not come into a maximum closeness forever and ever, through the death on the cross followed by His resurrection, He has snatched us off from the spiritual death in which we were, and He has raised us to the capacity of the communion, of which basis He has put through His embodiment. His sacrifice has so much claiming power, upon us, that it kidnaps us from the state of spiritual numbness, and it brings us with it outside of this obdurate existence, where we meet Him eye to eye, like God. And this means the new Life. Golgotha is by consequence, the last step of the loving movement of the ¹³² Saint Gregory of Nyssa, G.P. 46, 628 A. See also: Aufhauser, Die Heilslehre deshalb. Gregor von Nizza, München 1910, p. 116.

God towards people. Through it is consummated God's communion with us." (Stăniloae 1993)

"What could the Son of God to the man could come closer to the man like? The closest reality to the man is his fellow human whom the man stays in communion with. In nature the man will feel himself stranger if he hasn't a fellow human. The nature is mute, it is not capable to communicate its intimacies. Actually, the nature doesn't even have any intimacies.

The nature isn't the way God speaks clearly to the man in, neither intimately. Closer to the man it is the being, which is like him and which can communicate in a generally human language, what it has like him.

It is insufficient, for this maximum closeness, only the simple dwelling of the Son of God into a man. The one who, in this case moves directly among people He is a man. The ones who call Him as you, they do not call like as Son of God. The Son of God remains, somehow, behind this man, like a third person. He does not directly tell His word to the people, but His word is repeated by the one in whom He is dwelling, so that the people's ears are reached by the word of a man, even though the content and the certitude are from God." (Stăniloae 1993)

"There is not a pure closeness, neither a presence of God around the man. The majesty imposes a distance. A king, if He descends in all His shininess among the poor people, in order to establish a communication between Him and they, the fear will keep the souls of the people under lock. A descent of God in His entire splendor it would overwhelm, it would blind the people, and it would restrain them to move freely. And God wants to gain them through their liberty, through their voluntary decision. This is the faith. He does not want to force the people to accept Him through the almighty violence which He imposes Himself with. If that has been the case, the communion wouldn't have been accomplished. The man must elevate himself at the communion from his inside, this being his true growth. From outside it comes only the help through calling, through incentive, through love, and the help according to the liberty of the man.

Besides this, an unveiled presence of God nigh to the man, in case it is not a force to overwhelm him, it is indistinguishable, inaccessible, inconceivable to the human powers. It is a faraway God, no matter how close will Him be. Because not through the spatial distance is Him faraway from man, but through His existence onto ontological plans which are inconsistent with the intimation power of the man. From the nonphysical realities, the man cannot have direct experience but only about his own subject and other people's subjects. Only the subjects of his fellow humans represent, beyond him, a distinguishable ontological plan, an objectified one, for him. Until here has the Son of God to descend in order to be really close but though not to restrain the free unveiling of the man's life.

In order to fulfill these two conditions God neither used a camouflage under human appearance, into a Monophysite sense. That wouldn't have been a real descent of God onto the human subject's ontological objectified plan. The Son of God's human appearance wouldn't have been in such a case a real man, equal partner to the man in communion. The distance it would have remained. God had wanted to overcome the distance, otherwise He wouldn't have resorted either to its illusory exceeding. The man also wants it removed, but it can be really annulled. The problem of the maximum closeness between God and man it has not received a solution, but only an apparent solution, a covering of the distance through an illusion. Besides that, the Nestorianism means the belief into the impossibility of really exceeding the abyss which separates God from creation, and the Monophysitism accepts such an exceeding, only with the condition of merging the creation into God." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Through His embodiment, the godlike Word has started the work of gathering the humankind into a kingdom of love. By making a hypostatic center of it to coincide to a hypostatic center of Godhead, the work of the human nature is reinstated in the frame of His person on the line of the manifestation of the most complete intimacy with God, and of the most complete intentionality for the communion with the fellow humans. The divine-human hypostasis does not direct the work of the human nature, but only how would have to direct it any hypostasis in consummate communion with God and with the fellow human. The liberty of the human nature from within Jesus Christ, it is not restrained at all, but it consents through the divine-human hypostasis to everything it means the leading of it. Like divine-human hypostasis, Jesus Christ experiences, on every step, both His liberty like man, and the liberty of the human nature which he represents. But this liberty of Him like man, it entirely orients according to His will like God, and only this is the condition of the full human liberty. However, Jesus Christ is the link through which entire mankind is placed into a virtual connection with God, remaining on the account of each individual to contribute to the activation of this connection, in order to reestablish his hypostasis on the natural purpose of the full intentionality for communion with God, and through God with his fellow human.

The divine Logos is the most complete subject and this means that He is the most intensive and the most penetrating love. By making Himself man, by descending the intensity of His love among the human subjects, all of them have been by the efficacy of His love. In the same time, it has emerged a human hypostasis into whom the intentionality towards communion it has reached the supreme intensity, by making the people to feel Him like the true attraction center of them.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The Son of God, by making Himself Man, he has become one of the internal agents of this common fund of human efficiency. He has become even the central activation agent of the common human fund, by the fact that in Him the subject, by being godlike, He is not carried by any centrifugal selfish tendency. He has directed on the right road the vast treasure of energy of the human nature and He has given and He gives the most considerable impulse to it.

All the human subjects, how many come into the world, they experience the impulse and the guidance which is given to the common fund of human energy by this divine-human agent of it. The wave of cosmic spiritual energy, borne by the countless created subjects, it is borne with a particular efficiency by the divine Subject, by crossing it by the divine energy and by transfiguring it, by doing the most intimate closeness and interpenetration between God and His creation, which is the ultimate purpose of the embodiment of the Son of God.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The moment which the process of the embodiment is started on, the Son is already in a hypostasis state with the conscience and with the power immersed in pure potentiality. That’s why He does not make the conception, but another godlike hypostasis makes it: the Holy Ghost; He does not come, He is sent. He only starts to be (to be actual, of course). The acts of humiliation, of diminution, of depletion of power and greatness, they are committed before the embodiment, into transcendent. The Golgotha – the thrilling sacrifice – it was committed into heavens, the one from the earth is only a consequence of that.

Interesting considerations are made into the book of the priest S. Bulgakov regarding the growth, the development of the self-conscience of God into Jesus Christ. “His self-conscience is being actualized through the human conscience” (p. 247). “Here we have the most misunderstood and the most thrilling self-diminishing of the eternal godlike hypostasis of the Logos Who immerses into transitoriness and succession, for – after He extinguished Himself into subconscious, through the «time spent into the Mother’s blood» - to raise up at the surface, into the sleepy conscience of the child who will «grow up» (Cited place 2, 40), arriving to the «measure of full growth of Jesus»” (Eph. 4, 13), (p. 260).” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The expression: “Who was in the image of God”, it obviously refers to the Logos from before the embodiment, according to the opinion of the great majority of the exegetes, and it doesn't refer to the One from after the embodiment, because that One has changed "the godlike form" for the "servant form". "The godlike form" which He has changed it is interpreted by the most of the commentators not like the godlike being, but like the imposing appearance, like its glory. This was changed by the Logos with the non-imposing form of the man, servant of God. "To be just like God" it would mean, according to the exegetes, exactly what it means also "God's image".

Big it is the discussion in what concerns the word "kidnap". O. Bensow gives six possible meanings of it, each of these meanings being accepted by one or another of the exegetes:

- an act of kidnapping (actus rapiendy);
- means through the kidnapping is done (Mittel zum Entführung);
- thing which has to be kidnapped (res rapienda);
- kidnapped thing (res rapta);
- thing which has to be retained (res retinenda);
- found thing (res invenita).

Bensow thinks like being probable the second and the third meanings and less probable the fifth one, but the first, the fourth and the sixth, they are certainly improbable.

According to the second sense, the sentence would sound like this: the Son of God didn't considered, before His embodiment, the equality with God like "a means to kidnap" the people's honoring, to come into the godlike form in order to force people to worship Him, but He came humiliated and in the form of a servant and on this way, He gained their veneration, by arriving to consider Him "Lord" of all of them. Before the embodiment neither any creature knew about the Son, nor worshipped Him, and He didn't looked for showing them His divine majesty in order to force them to recognize Him.

According to the third meaning, the sentence would be understood in this way: The Son of God didn't consider, before the embodiment, that He has to kidnap the recognition of His godlike dignity from the people, like something that have to be kidnapped from them (res rapienda), but He humiliated Himself by making Himself a man, so that, voluntarily, they recognized Him this dignity by being just like the Father is.

According to the fifth meaning of the word, a less probable one, the sentence would show that Jesus in His pre-existence wouldn't have wanted to retain at any all cost the state, of being just like the Father, but He renounced to it and He humiliated Himself.

Agreeing what Bensow said, that the senses number four and six do not match at all the ideas connection of the sentence, we are noticing that the number two and three meanings do not oppose the meaning which we give to the kenosis, like it will be seen further on.

Bensow, however, he placed them into interpretations which have some insufficiencies. Especially the fact that, out of all of them, the Son appears too much preoccupied to impose Himself to people like being just like God. Whether Ansell of Canterbury reduced the meaning of the embodiment too much to the thirst of the Father for the repairing His honor, the Benson's interpretations put an accent, unjustified by Scripture, on the tendency of the Son's apotheosis in front of the creature. The Son would have been embodied only because this had been the most appropriate way to be recognized by the creation. It is true that consequently to His embodiment and sacrifice, the Son has gained the highest place into the honor of the creation, a name above all names, but this is the gratitude, it is the coronation of a work which didn't directly intended to gain this thing. The humbleness of Jesus Christ, of Whose praise forms the heart of the sentence, for being shown to the reader of the epistle, it becomes, after the interpretations of Bensow, a simple methodic camouflaging of the Son, in order to reach the so much desired target of His recognition and glorification from the man's part.

The true sense of the expression "not kidnapping considered to be just like God" it seems to us as being the one which is much less remote from what emerges directly, non-masterly, from the grammatical and syntactic construction of the text. Let's just pronounce the word "kidnapping", in an accentuated manner, like the apostle wants through the previous place which he gives to it and to reconstitute the character of a noun of the construction "to be just like God", how it is in the original text. Let's say, therefore: "not kidnapping considered the state of God" and the true meaning will emerge by itself. The Son has not interpreted the state of God like as consisting into the kidnapping of power, a constraining one, into an act of kidnapping. The godhead consists of something else, namely of love. This interpretation escapes the supposition of some ellipsis in expression. (Bensow has affirmed that the expression is elliptical, and he didn't consider the equality with God like means of kidnapping the honoring of the people or he has not considered the equality to God as something which has to be kidnapped from people. Kidnapping can be interpreted thereby like substantively attribute like it is intentioned into the text. (Parallel: not lordship considered the state of king). Thereby we don't need to transform the word kidnapping in order to understand it.

And the word "considered", if it is a judgment of the Son before the embodiment, it has an eternal character. The Son didn't not see the godhead, like we people do, in constraint, in direct almightiness like towards objects, but in love. If the godhead hadn't consisted of love, He wouldn't have embodied Himself. But (for the godhead consists of love, and for He considered the godhead as consisting of love) He emptied Himself, by taking the form of a servant. Only by interpreting this sentence like this, the embodiment has a more profound reason in godhead and not a simple wish of the Son for being recognized by the people. Only on this way the human nature, which He has assumed, it didn't imply a need for changing of the human being, or at least of the human being's works. The adversative but (ἀλλὰ) from the sentence, it expresses an overturning of our opinions about the being of the godhead and, just because of that, it doesn't produce any change of the human nature through embodiment, but it produces a confirmation of the human nature. The Son didn't confirm the opinion that the godhead consists of a direct almightiness, but He showed that the godhead consists of love and, for that, He didn't manifest Himself among us, in the form of His almightiness, but emptied Himself, meaning that He remained in accord with the godlike being.

Though, towards people, the godhead is not compelled to manifest Himself through love. Because the people are creatures, by the nature of the things, God is in an almightiness report with the people and He appears to them like this. But, through benevolence, He places Himself towards people in a report of love, according to His internal nature. So, there was needed free "discernment" from the Son, consequently eternal and explicated through the being of the God Himself, in order no longer to appear them into an aspect of an overwhelming almightiness.

Thereby, by being the embodiment a consequence of the way of being of the Son into His own godhead, like intentionality towards communion, He forsook τὸ εἶναι ἰσα θεῷ, His godlike state.

Though, because towards people He appeared in a form of almightiness, this being "the appearance of God the Almighty in front of the creature", He turned also His love to them, by taking the familiar and close image of the man, and not into contradiction with, but appropriate to the godlike being.

"The godlike image" is an aspect of the godhead and it remains so, but, because it is the report of God towards objects and towards people like beings, when His love turns towards them, in order to make them His sons, the godlike "form" is dresses up, it intertwines, it is covered with the "form of a servant", of man, without abolishing the man, but following to work towards man, through the man. It is therefore a difference between "images", and the adversative particle "ἀλλὰ" (but) expresses also this report, but not a report of excluding one through another, but by of a intimate togetherness, on the basis of a profound reason, indicated by the eternal life of the Holy Trinity. The ones from the people who can see in the depth of the divine love manifested in "the image of a servant", they can at least partially see His godhead and, so, the almightiness and the brightness of the Creator in front of the creature, “the image of God”.

In the meaning which we give thereby to “the image of God” and the report with “the image of a servant”, even if it would take the second meaning of the word (means of kidnapping), it can be framed, and it can be subordinated to the first meaning. In fact, God comprises a complexity of meanings, and not only one alone, without they contradicting one another. Thereby, the sentence would sound like this, sub-summing the second meaning (the one which refers to “the image of God in report with the people”) to the first meaning (referred to the internal godlike life): Who being towards people in report of almighty God with the creature, He didn’t consider that the state of God in itself it consists of constraining force, but it consist of love, and therefore, to didn’t manifest in an unveiled manner His godlike report with the creature, in order to snatch the veneration from the people, but, by wanting to enter the communication with them, He turned the love towards them, by crossing Himself this appearance of His, through love, and by consequently taking a human form, which He interweaved with the godlike one, according to His being indication.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“

“The Son of God, by making Himself human in order to come in a maximum closeness to us, He has remained in the same time God, in the fullest actuality, for in communion with the man Jesus to experience the communion with God Himself like ultimate transcendence which sets a border to our passions, and it amplifies our positive powers. The Protestant kenosis thwarts the meaning of the embodiment like an overflowing of the divine energies into the world and into history.

The possibility of the dwelling into the same hypostasis, of the human and of the godlike features of the works, though difficult to understand in details, it is given in the man’s conformity to God and, in general, in the fact that between Him and world, like a reality created and sustained by Him, it takes place a continuous union, actually worn by the divine Subject, like the ultimate source and sustainer of His uncreated energies, and of the created energies of the world. In fact, God is the ultimate Subject of the entire divine and created reality, without any of the two losing something of its character. Rightfully, the Holy Fathers widened the meanings of the Chalcedonian terms: “not separated” and “unmixed”, by applying them to the general report between God and the world.” (Stăniloae 1993) man, but He had united Himself with a man, and on the other hand, by taking a human individual, it would have been closer to him than by all the other human persons.

“The Son of God hadn’t taken the nature existing into an own individual, because this would have meant, on one hand, that He hadn’t made Himself

The hypostasis establishes an own domination on what is common. Jesus has taken the human nature, about which we all can say that it is ours, and He didn't take a human individual, who makes from the nature that he has, first of all, something that is his. The hypostasis of the human nature, Who is God-the Word and, for God is equally close to all people and He Has a humanity which is not of one more than of another, Jesus Christ is closer to us than any man.

Thereby, it can be said that Jesus, without being entirely the "natural" man, it is the central man, because His humanity is not confiscated by any human individual, but it remains equally close to all, as being the environment which God comes close in, Who has not the egocentric tendency of the human individuals, but He is the care taker of all of them. One cannot use the humanity of Jesus egotistically.

Through the humanity which He has assumed, Jesus has embraced the human kind. His Humanity, more than that of any human individual, it belongs to everybody. Of course, the attribute as Son of man, has, among other profound meanings, also this one. Because He has not made Himself the Son of a man, Jesus is the Son of the mankind, of the Man by excellence. Through His humanity He activates into the ultimate intensity, the attribute of serving, characteristic to the Son. "Even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister" (Mathew 20, 28)." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Jesus had to assume a human nature, impoverished by the capacity of the irreproachable passions, for, in the victory over them, to harden that human nature, and to spiritualize it from inside out." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Because the Son of God has embodied Himself also on the purpose to make Himself teacher to the people, He has brought the form of the teacher to its ultimate consummation, namely to the interweaving of the word with the love." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Jesus, by embodying Himself, He has come close to us, helping us experience God like a person in direct communion with us. The experience of a subject at the second person, it means, by and large, our claim, our raising on the ethical plan, into the state of a subject and of faith. In front of Jesus, we feel ourselves claimed by the supreme You, by God.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“But a signification of the embodiment of the Son of God it is that He has sanctified the history, that He has made the history a possible frame for a life without sin. For this, He fully entered the history. But, in the same time, through the assistance which He promised to His followers, He has shown that only through power from above it is possible to live into history without sin. He has broken the borders of the history seen like a river which flows into the tube of the natural. It is possible to live the history in communion with the heavens. The death, though, it remains into the human being even to the ones who are living so. The proof it is the fact that Jesus has taken the death upon Himself. But, in His case the death is not interwoven with a personal sin. It remains like a solidarity in sufferance, with the history like a whole, with the history’s sin, like the supreme gesture of assuming the responsibility for others. So that, the death remains, actually, like an element of the actual structure of the history and who dies he gives the supreme proof of his identification to the history, a proof of his character as a historical being.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The effect of the supreme spiritualization, in freedom, of the human will in God, it bounces in a spiritualization of the entire human condition, which the spirit elevated to such a vigor with the help of the divine power, he elevates the human condition out of corruption.” (Stăniloae 2005: 20)

“Even less obvious it seems the fact that the Embodiment of the Word would have been a necessity for the world as unfallen into sin. It is right that God has created the world in order to bring it to the happiness of as full as possible communion with Him, to what the Holy Fathers called as deification. But it seems to us that we shouldn’t exclude the possibility that God could have the world this happiness even without the Embodiment of the Word. It seems to us that if we considered that God, once he created the world, he should necessarily oblige Himself to the Embodiment of His Son, we would restrict the freedom of God in His reports with the world.” (Stăniloae 2005: 71)

“Without any doubt, we do not exclude either the possibility that God, by creating the world, He decided too, to Embodiment Himself, in order to deify the world and therefore the Embodiment of the Word would have been done also without the man’s falling into sin. If we had excluded this possibility, we would have restricted, again, the freedom of God. But we must not reckon this decision as the only possible one, to God, once He decided to create the world, namely we mustn't reckon this decision as an inevitable conclusion of His decision of creating the world." (Stăniloae 2005: 71)

"This liberty of God in what regards the act of the Embodiment of His Son, it seems to us as being reflected withing the world too, even after the world's falling. If the necessity of the Word's Embodiment had been included in the creation's act, the world would have felt an obvious tension after Embodiment. The world, in its entirety, it would have manifested the character of a messianic, prophetic symbol, and not only that one of a symbol, by and large - and therefore all the things from within world, without a special choosing of some of them through the Revelation of God. But this didn't happen. It was necessary the light of being chosen by God, to fall upon certain things, in order they to receive the meaning of messianic symbols and thus to become objects of the cult of the Old Law, which the messianic waiting was kept through. It wasn't, for instance, self-understood, that the stabbed lamb fore-imagined the crucifixion of the heavenly Lamb Who decided to embody Himself and to let Himself be crucified, in order to save the world. But is was necessary an acts of Revelation done by God, which to promise this Embodiment, and to make it intuitively by and act committed within world, by stabbing the lamb, which receives thus a prophetical signification, and it becomes a special, prophetical symbol." (Stăniloae 2005: 71)

"The death's transformation from punishment for sin into means of crossing to the life into God, it has been done by Christ, by the fact that, by being Him the Son of God, He has made Himself man out of the Virgin Mary, in order to bring Himself as sacrifice, for the people. If Christ hadn't been created without the man's union with the woman, Christ would have inherited the ancestral sin and, as such, he would have endured the death as a necessary consequence to the inherited sin, namely for His own sin, and not for the sin of the people, and His birth wouldn't have even been the birth of God as man. The Christ's birth as man, out of Virgin, it was an act of God, out of free love, and therefore it was a manifestation of the power and of the love of God." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 87)

"The birth of the Son of God as man from Virgin, it is the beginning and the prima condition of the man's elevation from the sin's darkness and of man's elevation into the light of God through sacrifice and resurrection. The Son of God made Himself man, out of Virgin, in order to elevate the man to this state." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 89)

"The birth of the Son of God as man, out of Virgin, it is an act of decisive creation of God, for the people, an act of love and almightiness. Only this birth made possible other creation acts, amongst which the Christ's sacrifice as man for the people and, by that, the defeat of the death, and the ensuring of Christ's full communion with the people, and the people's eternal happiness. If Christ hadn't made Himself man –not out of natural necessity, but out of free love, namely out of Virgin – Christ wouldn't have made possible any of the eternal savior acts of the godlike light. The birth out of Virgin is an act of the God's conscious will and almightiness, as cause for elevating the human existence from the sin's darkness, to the eternal light, into God. Just the act of Christ birth as man, it has brought out the humanity assumed by Him, from under the law of a natural necessity fallen into sin, and he communicated to the people too, through their faith in Him, a new birth, out of their will, in the Mystery of the Baptism. By and large, by being Christ born out of Virgin, he showed that the mankind can be elevated from under the fatal law of the birth towards the definitive death. But that, Christ showed that, by being Him born without sin (...), He wasn't submitted either to the law of the unwilling death for a sin that he would have had, but He received the death willingly, out of His love for people. He did that in order to elevate the people, after resurrection, to the birth anew, through His Ghost, for preparing them in order to defeat the death, or a means for crossing through death to the union with Him, the One resurrected forever. The birth out of Virgin it is the initial act of elevating the humanity out of the law of the birth towards death, namely of the meaningless birth. The mankind has been brought out of the dogmas of the nature submitted to the total necessity, dogmas formulated as dogmas of the science. Without that liberation from the nature's dogmas, through God made man, the whole existence would have been inexplicable. The nature's dogmas are overcome through the act of the love, by the God's freedom, and they are replaced for freedom's dogmas, through the love of God. All the things are out of love and the love is freedom. The Son of God has made Himself man, out of the love that is amongst the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost, a man in full freedom, not submitted to sin and to death, but a man capable of assuming, out of His love, the people's guilt, and to receive, while still being free, the death for the people. This act was transparent to His godhead, or to His godhead's luminous light. The neo-Protestant groups, by not admitting the birth of Christ out of Virgin, they do not grant importance either to the cross. But such a Jesus wouldn't have received the death for other, namely willingly, but out of necessity, and that's why he wouldn't have been either Savior, or Christ, or God, but he would have been a simple human prophet. According to some neo-Protestant groups, there is no God above the nature's laws. Those neo-Protestant groups do not speak either about Christ's resurrection. Only a death received willingly, it can be savior. This is because only such a death doesn't belong to the usual sinner, but it belongs to the Son of God." (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 89-91)

“The Son of God has made Himself man amongst people, in order to give Himself as gift, to God, as really savior sacrifice for the people, in order to be fulfilled what was promised through the symbol of the animal sacrifices, and, especially, of the lamb of the sheep from the Law. The promise made in the Law in the form of the lamb of the sheep, as image escaping from death the firstborn of every family, and, consequently, the future sons of all the families, namely all the people, it didn’t escape them from death, except for a while. Now, the Son of God has made Himself, to us, the conscious Lamb, God and man Who escapes all the people from death, and forever. He isn’t the firstborn as man, but He is the firstborn of the Virgin and He is the Only Begotten One of the heavenly Father. A such, He bring Himself as sacrifice to God, being the first and One born by Virgin, and innocent, but also being the One Begotten of God.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 93)

“Such a descent of God on the people’s level, couldn’t have been accomplished except by Him assuming the human. By this was shown also the great honor God granted to the human. It was an honor that couldn’t have been shown only in the fact that God spoke to the man from distance, though remaining Himself exclusively God, but it couldn’t have been shown in the fact that He make Himself man but without ceasing to be God too. If He hadn’t remained God, he would have shown Himself as a God Who needed to make Himself man, so that He wouldn’t have been, in essence, above the human being. If that had been the case, the human being wouldn’t have received an honor from Somebody from above, neither would have been the human being really elevated to the dialogue with God through the powers communicated him by God. Thus, the godlike Hypostasis Himself made Himself as Hypostasis of the human too. His Self hasn’t remained only a divine Self, but it has become a human self too, to any you from amongst people. He descended to be experienced by us as an unmediated You, as any human you, but still remaining to us as a divine you, and until making me through that, He Who is God, a you on His level. And nothing is closer to the human being, through knowledge and affection, as his fellow human in his position as you or as me, that makes him a you.” (Stăniloae 1995: 163)

“One could object that, in the Old Testament, God, by getting closer to the human being as God, He made His godhead felt in a more overwhelming mode. God made then felt His presence through thunders and lightnings, or as sitting on a heigh throne, around Him being the singing seraphs. But, by that, He still remained in a mist, or He showed Himself for an instant, on a throne, distantly, in a house rapidly filled up with smoke. In Christ, though, God comes with our live and with our countenance, close and gentle, and even as a servant of ours, washing the feet of His disciples, and going in His love to the Self-sacrifice. He is served by His Angels, but as the One Who suffers for us (Mt. 4: 11; 11: 22, 43); He shows Himself into light, but as having a human being face, and speaking after, about His sufferings for us. He shows us that the complex and conscious face of the human being, by being illuminated with understanding and love, lived humanly, it can be an adequate environment to the God's greatness. In the waves of the gentleness irradiating from the human face, it is unveiled to us the infinity of God's superiority, more than in the quake and in the fire which scare us, as said Prophet Elijah (III133 Kings 9: 11-12). For a short while, God was rather a foretelling of His future embodiment, and not a real assuming of our human, and forever. The human being still wasn't mature enough for understanding such a great honor given him by God, by Him taking the human life and countenance. One could have been tempted to idolatrize the human. It was necessary the man to realize that God can take human being countenance, and forever, but without Him to be confounded to the human; the human being must reach to realize the spiritual depth from beyond human being, as spirituality that can be expressed through the human face, not a pride face, but rather a spiritualized face." (Stăniloae 1995: 163-164)

"The God's embodiment shows the human being as the most capable of becoming environment to the God's showing. The embodiment shows that there can be intuited, through the human being, the infinite depths of God. The human words impropriated by God, and understood by me, they open me infinite horizons, and they communicate me absolute claims. The human being is the most accessible to us, and still the most revealing for the absolute Mystery, from above us. But not any face and not any words are as such, but only those elevated on the highest spiritual level." (Stăniloae 1995: 164)

"The Son of God by making Himself as a You, on my level and to me, and the self who makes me as a you on His level, he remains to me, unlike any other purely human you, a You Who, though not being only human, it still is to me in the immediate position as You. It depends only on me to live Him as such, always in direct relation, even if not being something visible to me. This is for, by being God too, He is as hypostasis of the human always in front of me and to any other human." (Stăniloae 1995: 164)

"In order to heal the human beings' helplessness of receiving the Son of God, through the human nature that He has assumed, it was necessary that That One to take His humanity in a state lit itself by the Ghost of the clean love." (Stăniloae 1995: 165)

133 In KJB we have I and II Samuel, and I and II Kings; In the ROB we have I-IV Kings (E. l. t.'s n.).

“Given the fact that is difficult to a human being to restore the communication with the Person-Absolute, since the human being is unable even to restore a consummate communication with his fellow human, the Person-Absolute didn’t limit Himself to the teaching given through creation, and through the prophet’s words, or only to such an unveiling of His from distance, through other people, and he has entered a totally direct relation with the people, by the fact that He has made Himself consummate man, in order to enter by this the communication of maximum intensity and of total love with the people, or to attract them to such a direct communication with Himself, through his full power of human communication. That’s why he has come in maximum closeness to the people, as One of them, as speaking Himself to them, and communicating them the power in the form the people communicate the power to one another, but still showing them that He hasn’t ceased to be God, or that, in His quality as consummate man, quality adopted by Him, he communicates them, from Himself, a direct teaching, and an example of full life of the human being into God, and a love that only God can communicate through the human being, namely in the human and immediate form, accessible to the people.” (Stăniloae 1995: 165)

“Jesus did that in order to convince the people that through His humanity speaks and works God Himself. He did that in order to help the people to encounter in His consummate humanity, assumed by Him, the presence of God, and to communicate them through His humanity, the godlike power toward elevating them, which ends in the people’s resurrection and eternal happiness. That’s why, the Son of God has taken our humanity, inherited by us from the first people, on one hand in order to enter, with it, the “natural” connection with our humanity as The One “of the same being with it”, and, on the other hand, in order to accomplish, on Himself, as man, and that within us too, the supreme transcendence towards Absolute, from the human side, and the maximum descent of His as God, to the people. The human body itself, by that, it has been made as transparent organ to the infinite mystery of God.” (Stăniloae 1995: 166)

“The son of God descended, but He didn’t lose His quality as Absolute and as not obeying the nature’s laws, especially the laws from after the falling, starting with that one according to which the human being is conceived through the union between man and woman, associated with a passionate voluptuousness. Only thus He healed the people helplessness of seeing God Himself, through their fellow human’s face, and the helplessness of that face of showing God, through itself. In order to do that, He took his humanity out of a human person, who made efforts in order to be elevated above that law who was dominating our nature, through pleasure and violence, bringing from the human part the required contribution, in order the full connection between human being and God to be restored and consummate. Thus, He communicated to other people too, through the nature He assumed, the power of a rebirth in the full cleanness and transparency to God, through the Holy Ghost. On the mentioned purpose, the Son of God descended to us, taking our nature, but elevating it, from the beginning of its forming, from the full cleanness and in the impulse of consummate self-giving, by the fact that he has taken it from a clean Virgin, a consummate Virgin, given as gift to God, and He framed the nature He has taken in the godlike Hypostasis Himself.” (Stăniloae 1995: 166)

“The Son of God makes on Himself and He gives birth to Himself as man, with both sides, for He conceives Himself out of a Virgin, but He also has taken the true humanity out of a true human creature. Being made, He is without sin, as Adam was before falling; being born too, He has, though, the corruption from within Adam from after Adam’s falling. He unites both of these for He is born out of Virgin. Thus, He saves the human being by His dying for the human being, but also by His resurrecting.” (Stăniloae 1995: 167)

“The Son of God has assumed our humanity out of Virgin, and so also out of God’s power, and therefore without sin; but by assuming His humanity out of a woman who belonged to the mankind from after falling, and who inherited the affects from after falling, and the death, so He received from Her these affects and the death. That’s why He used the suffering and the death, in order to defeat them in His humanity that he received through His birth, due to His sinlessness that He received by being made. So, He conveyed to His brothers into humanity, a humanity He has received through His birth as man, His cleaning power that He has for He is made, when they are rebirth out of Ghost. So, He has made Himself as man too, free of the enslaving powers of the sin, and by this, the human beings are liberated from the enslaving power of the suffering and of the death, which they receive through their birth. He has open to the mankind, the possibility of living the godhead, through His humanity that He has assumed through His birth out of Virgin. This is for His humanity is united with the godhead, since His conceiving, in the same Person, but also due to His sinlessness that He received by being made, namely through the cleanness that no longer can be separated from God, due to the fact that His humanity is united, since His conceiving out of Virgin, with the Godhead, in the same Hypostasis. But this fact or this union was possible due to the fact that Christ’s humanity was conceived out of Virgin, or due to the fact that this conceiving was the consequence of the humanity’s framing into the divine Hypostasis. By that He assumed the affects, but by not receiving the sin, He defeated the affects. He accepted to suffer the affects of pain and of death, in order to defeat them in His humanity, and He resisted the affects of pleasure, by being, due to His conceiving out of Virgin and due to His humanity’s framing into the divine Hypostasis, and that made Him lacking the sin which to tempt Him towards pleasure. He endures the first ones and He resisted the last ones, not allowing them to drive Him to sin. He received the resting and the food, necessary to His body, but He remains as not conquered inwardly by some sinful pleasure for them. Thus, as man, He liberated Himself from affects. He lived with victorious power, by having His humanity united with the Godhead, in His godlike Hypostasis, and born, without sin, out of Virgin. He defeated as man, any fear and any pleasure, which could determine Him to worry for Himself, by being and by remaining without the sin's egotism. He was giving Himself wholly, as gift, to the people, with the love He was spreading and which He was impropriating, into His humanity, out of His godhead, a love that wasn't weakened by any sinful egotism. His humanity was elevated to the state that our authentic nature aspires to. He couldn't have been conceived out of Virgin, if the hadn't been the Word's humanity, and He wouldn't have been sinless, if He hadn't been conceived out of Virgin. And, by being sinless, and by being assumed by the Word, His humanity was environment of the entire communicability of the Word." (Stăniloae 1995: 167-168)

"Our humanity has reached its peak in Christ. This is for it has been participating to the loving communicability and to the absolute character of His godlike Hypostasis, and, by that, it has been participating to His absolute freedom from anything that could egotistically enslave it. By that, we also can find the help in order to climb the peak that the humanity is on. He makes us too, for we are, according to humanity, of-the-same-being with Him, as persons capable of a consummate communion, and free of any egotism." (Stăniloae 1995: 168)

"Christ places Himself, as man, wholly in the people's service, due to the fact that He is in total Self-control; by the fact that He is the Son of God Himself Who humbled on Himself, He has placed on Himself, in the people-s service, through His embodiment; and His humanity born out of Virgin it hasn't been born with the pleasure's sinful egotism of the ones who are born in natural way." (Stăniloae 1995: 168)

"Christ's humanity has been elevated on the level of supreme transcending for Himself into God, above the worry for the Self and in full obedience to God, being assumed as humanity of the godlike Hypostasis, but without being confounded to Him. He is that humanity's Subject, and that humanity participates to His quality as Subject, without being lost as humanity. That's why the Holy Fathers spoke about Christ's composed Hypostasis. Christ lives with His humanity the depth of the human mystery into the depth of the supreme mystery of His Godhead. That's why, the godlike Mystery unveils, through the assumed humanity, His depth as springing out light, and He consummates His humanity too, as fully mediator and revelator mystery of the divine Mystery." (Stăniloae 1995: 168)

“Christ placed Himself as Whole Man in the service of the people’s salvation in order the people to be saved from the sin’s slavery, namely He elevated His humanity on this supreme level, for us, and not using it as an object, but by giving our humanity too, the honor of wanting that. This is for He took it without impediment and without the shadow of the sin and ready to collaborate through its will on that purpose, for since the first moment He conceived on Himself out of a Virgin Who decided to remain forever a Virgin and Who kept Herself like that, and even more than that, She opposed willingly to any personal sin, or any inherited habituation, which drive the human being to any kind of sin and to interrupt the connection with God. The Person-Absolute, or the Son of God Who dwelled within Virgin, He encountered this consummation of the Virgin, and He strengthened Her preparedness and He gave Her the power to give Him the humanity. By this, He took from within Her not only His clean humanity, but he also accomplished with the first human being who differed from Him, the full dialogue of love, a fact that equaled the cleaning of the ancestral sin from the Virgin.” (Stăniloae 1995: 168)

“Into Virgin, our humanity has accomplished the highest transcending above the law entered within our nature through sin, a transcendence towards the Person-Absolute, with His together-working. And through His descent into Her, He effectuated the fullest descent to human being, by taking itself His humanity from within Her, with Her collaboration. Thus, the humanity He has assumed out of Her, with Her consent, it is the fruit of this full descent of the Son of God to a human being, and of the maximum transcendence of that human being towards Him, with His help.” (Stăniloae 1995: 168)

“In Christ, God descended, to the maximum extent, to the people, by making His own humanity into our humanity, or by becoming the Subject of our humanity. And the humanity is elevated into Him, at maximum, into God, God making our humanity worthy of being His humanity. The hypostasis is the state of the human nature into Christ, and this state is received by the state of the godlike nature of God-the Word. The hypostatical self it is the Self of infinite depths of the godlike Word. But this Self takes human traits too, and He endures the human limitations as His, penetrating these limitations with the rays of His godhead and opening these limitations to His Godhead. By that, He has made on Himself, the deepest our foundation, or as hypostatic center of all of us, the bearer of the most felt care and responsibility, for all of us, and, by that, communicating to us too, as much as we can receive, out of His feeling for our fellow humans.” (Stăniloae 1995: 168-169)

“In conceiving and forming His humanity out of Virgin, The Son of God was in a work of untold efficiency. But that work didn’t exclude the work of His humanity and of the Virgin. For, the more efficient was the Godhead's loving of humanity work, the more was felt by His humanity and by the Virgin's humanity, namely the more was strengthened in their own work of loving collaboration. The human soul of Christ was working too, to forming His humanity, as the body and the soul of the Virgin were working too. But, in order the Son of God to take clean or fully loving humanity, it was necessary not to be the work of some human initiative, uphold and accomplished only by a pair of human being, too much and too blindly focused on one another, into the pleasure of one of another. It needed the godlike "conceiving", but with the Virgin's consent, and She was focused only towards God. That's why, the humanity's conceiving and birth take place out of the initiative and with the collaboration of the One Who has made Himself man. Himself formed His humanity to Himself, but that didn't exclude the birth of His humanity out of a Virgin woman, namely involving also the "conceiving" of the One Who was born out of Her. Here the godlike "conceiving" had an overwhelming role, and that's why His birth too, it was out of the initiative and out of the work of God." (Stăniloae 1995: 170)

"A "conceiving" of the humanity, by God, it is not totally absent after the falling, either in the bringing of any human being to existence, but on the other hand, the birth of the Son of God had a human collaboration too. Besides, each human being's birth is a mysterious event, produced by the work of God and by the human beings' collaboration, since the first moment of the conceiving. The son of God made Himself man out of woman, but She was Virgin, so that the "conceiving" in His case had an untold greater role than in the case of the other people. But this was shown too, the fact that He has in Himself the capacity of making Himself His human image (Phil. 2: 7), and by this He has elevated His humanity to the supreme height. The fact that His humanity doesn't have a special hypostasis (in Nestorian sense), it doesn't diminish it, for the divine Hypostasis Himself makes on Himself as hypostasis of the humanity and humanity's capacity of becoming nature of the divine Hypostasis too. The divine Hypostasis as bearer of the divine Being, it unites with Himself the human nature too, and He makes Himself as the Hypostasis of the human nature too. As in the quality of the average man, it is present too, his unit as distinct person, likewise it is in the common godhead as also in the common humanity of Christ present in the same Hypostasis, the Same distinct Person. It is accomplished, within Christ, a unity of contrasts, but of all contrasts in the tightest unity, of the most extreme sides of the reality, in a unique Hypostasis. This divine Hypostasis give Christ's humanity the possibility of actualizing, in the highest mode, all the resources of the human nature, unlike in any other simple human hypostasis, the simple human hypostasis eternally remaining in movement towards this accomplishment. But these resources are kept integrally and unaltered, as human. The divine Hypostasis, by becoming hypostasis of the human nature, His humanity becomes participant too, to

His quality as Subject, to the committing by Him of all His deeds, to living His integral divine-human life.” (Stăniloae 1995: 170-171)

“In the case of the embodiment of the Son of God, upon His humanity took place the breathing of the Holy Ghost, even since the beginning, as in case of Adam too, but to an untold greater extent. This is for the One Who was conceived as man wasn’t only a man, but he was also Himself the Son of God, having in Himself, from eternity, the Holy Ghost. This is for the Archangel said to the Virgin: “The Holy Ghost will descend upon You and the power of the Highest (the Son of God) will overshadow You” (Lk. I: 35). He received the Holy Ghost since His conceiving, as man, for the One Who was conceiving on Himself as man He also existed as godlike Hypostasis, consciously, from before, and He started forming His nature as such, so that He was able to receive also in his quality as man, from the beginning, the Holy Ghost, by Himself giving the Holy Ghost, as God, to Himself as man, but also giving the Holy Ghost to His Mother, in order Him to conceive, on Himself as man, within Her, though She was a Virgin. The Holy Ghost determined Her, in the same time, to consciously and assertively consent to that act, with the steadfast belief in that act, by knowing that He was from above nature, namely out of the godlike power.” (Stăniloae 1995: 174)

“The new Adam, having the Ghost not as a simple human being who can part with the Ghost, but as a man who being in the same time God, He cannot lose the Holy Ghost, and He will communicate the Ghost to all His brothers into humanity, through the seen mediation of the water. That’s why He was baptized in the River Jordan’s water, having the Father and the Ghost united with Him, in order He to receive also the Holy Ghost through Baptism, when He deepened Himself in the water of the Baptism in the name of the Holy Trinity. WE also mention that the Holy Ghost, communicated by God-the Word to His humanity ever since His conceiving out of Virgin, making this humanity sinless, as the first Adam was too, at his creation, being in the same time communicated to the Virgin, it get Her too, out of the ancestral sin, insomuch that Her was able to give out of Her body and of Her blood, the human body of Her Son as lacking the ancestral sin, and also in order to be able to born Him while remaining Virgin.” (Stăniloae 1995: 174)

“Only the High One can lower Himself and, in somebody’s lowering, it is present the feeling of the height of the One Who lowered Himself.” (Stăniloae 1995: 181)

“The Son of God made Himself man in order to elevate again at God, the human estranged from God, and not only within Himself, but within all the ones who attach themselves to Him, by faith.” (Stăniloae 1995: 194-195)

“If the Son of God hadn’t made Himself man, our transcendence out of creation towards the transcendent God, it would have remained a simple aspiration of ours, a simple tension never to be fulfilled. Our jump out of creation couldn’t have been accomplished. Likewise, the union amongst us would have remained always insufficient, because it hadn’t been the union amongst us in the same unifier Brother and in the same One valuing each of us. Only for Christ came, God makes Himself, in a real mode, everything in all the things, and we can be gathered together, with our bodies, in the Holy Trinity, and we can live, in the fullness of our being, the loving presence of the Holy Trinity and our presence in one another, without being confounded to the Person of the Holy Trinity and amongst us. Since the humanity has received in the Hypostasis of God-the Word an eternal hypostasis, each human person has in himself an existence for eternity, as person being in a real or possibly eternal dialogue with the Word made man, and together with the him, with the Father, into the Holy Ghost.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 37)

“The fact that the human nature has been constituted within Christ Jesus as human Person, it has a great signification. The son of God, by making Himself as hypostasis of the human nature, He has given the human nature the function as environment of the God’s love directed towards all the people, and as environment of the love of the One Begotten Son, in human form, towards the Father, by making on Himself the most loving man of the heavenly Father, out of whom it irradiates this love towards all the people, in order to make all the people capable, at their turn, of His godlike love in human form, towards the Father and amongst themselves.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 71)

“By taking our human nature in His hypostasis, and not as a limited process, like all the other human hypostasis, Christ is through his human nature, as God, in an intimate connection with all the people, and as such with the whole creation, an intimate connection as could be accomplished by the human persons together, at maximum, and even much more than all the human persons together. The Word of God Himself Whom was created the creation through, and Who upholds the whole creation in a special connection with God, He has come through embodiment in a new connection with the creation’s entirety. He is no longer only Creator and Providence Provider to the creation, and to the people as persons differing from Him, but He is hypostasis of the common humanity of all people. It is something else to be in connection with the people from outside yourself, and it is something else that that something to become part of your person. On the other hand, like the man, as person, by possessing a body, he has as a more general body the whole cosmos, as like the Son of God, much more, He has made through body the whole creation as His body, in a wider meaning of the word. He has made, on Himself, the central hypostasis of the whole mankind and creation.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 71)

“The general humanity and the entire creation become, through His embodiment, as His own, but in the same time as belonging to the One Who is in the same time their Creator, by the fact that He has made, on Himself, their Person, and He also elevates them, by the fact that He has made, on Himself, their Subject on the highest level. The human lived by the divine Subject as His own, it unveils and it actualizes all his powers, while the cosmos unveils all its significations and transparencies, for it is watched and used by the Son of God, Who the cosmos was created by, through His humanity. Properly-said, His human is potentiated through His godlike power to the highest human works and to the maximum possibilities of union with the godlike works.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 71)

“It is accomplished a maximum union between divine and human, but without confounding them, but each of them being lived by One and the Same Person, at maximum intensity, in a reciprocal interpenetration of theirs: the human will be lived in the actualization of all His potentialities, by being penetrated by the divine, but this is only if the human has been deified. And to all of us, it is open this perspective of the endlessly experiencing the union of the human with the divine, of being penetrated by the divine, of using the true human by deifying the human, and of endlessly knowing God through the penetration of the human and of the cosmos, by the divine. The Son of God, the supreme Son and Word, He makes, on Himself, with His rationality and with His affectivity as Son, a Subject of the human in communion with us, by opening us the endless perspective of the truly rational living, and in the same time an affectionate living, with all: with God, with our fellow humans, and with the nature. This is for, only where there is clean affectivity, there is also true rationality. Only where there is kindness, there is rationality too. That’s why the Romanian people call the irrational person as “insane” (Ro.: nebun (ne-bun) = Eng.: non-kind, non-good (E. l. t.’s n.)), namely unkind. And that’s why too, the old Romanian translation of the Patristic texts call the virtue as: “kindness”. Only the kindness is rational.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 71-72)

“It is accomplished a maximum unity between divine and human, but without confounding them. The divine is used to the human end He created, being thus shown the true purpose of the human’s creation. But the human too, he can use and live at maximum intimacy the divine and the power and the god things of His, thus being shown again, the purpose the which the human was created on.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 71)

“It is “natural” that God manifests Himself also through what He created. The first effect upon the human nature as made nature of His hypostasis, it is the restoration of the human nature in its normalness, from the egotistic crookedness and locking up, which the human nature has been brought in, by the persons bearing it, through their sin. The human nature it brought back to its state of cleanness of sins, just from the beginning of Jesus's forming within His Holy Mother. By that, the human nature has been placed again in the normal state of openness towards God, its Creator, and it has regained by this the force of reestablishing the communicability with all its concretizations within the human persons. Christ becomes thus the man one communicated the most easily with God, and Who communicates, on Himself, the most generously to all people, by giving them too, as they want, this brotherly communicability. And this hasn't been done by the Son of God, only by using His godlike will, but also by using the will of the human nature that He has assumed. This is for He had two will, but there He was a sole One, wanting through them; He wouldn't have manifested Himself as integral divine-human Person, if He hadn't manifested Himself with His human will too. He has brought back to the full agreement, the two wills, since, as God-the Creator, He has endowed the human nature with a will in harmony with the godlike will and with a sole normal will in all the human persons who want that, or since God Himself doesn't want something contrary to the human nature, or to the right development of the human nature by its own will (Saint Maximos the Confessor, G.P. 91, col. 81)." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 72)

"When the Son has made Himself man, the Father's rejoicing of the Son as man, and of all the people united with the Son, it has together the Ghost's rejoicing too; and the rejoicing of the embodied Son and of the people united with Him through their Faith into the Father, it is strengthened by the Ghost's together-rejoicing." (Stăniloae 1995: 16)

"The human nature taken by the Son of God, it was wholly ours, "except the sin". The ancestral sin does not belong to the human nature, but it was added later like a curtailment of it. The Man-God neither had a personal sin, not only for He didn't want to commit sin, but for He neither was able to make any sin.

Andrutsos (The Dogmatics, Romanian translation, p. 200) deduces the lack of sin at Jesus Christ as coming from the hypostatic union, into the sense that the unique subject of Him, being God-the Word and He, handling the human will, might not do any sin.

The assertion of some of the Holy Fathers that the lack of sin at Jesus it is due to His supernatural conceiving, Andrutsos interprets it also in the sense of his thesis, because, as he says, the supernatural conceiving is not but an effect of the hypostatic union. "Because the supernatural birth supposes the hypostatic union, of which effect is, obviously, that the conceiving from the Holy Ghost it does not constitute the main cause of the lack of the sin, but it is only a more special indication of Her.”

It would seem, from this sentence, that Andrusos recognizes the lack of sin at least as a secondary cause of the supernatural conception. But, by continuing the exposure, one can see that he explains it only through the fact that the wanting Self in Jesus is God—the Word.

The lack of sin, though, must be brought into a connection with the supernatural conception, even if this is not but an effect of the hypostatic union.

From the fact that the speaking self in Jesus is God-the Word, one can directly deduce only that He didn't commit personal sins. But the question about how He can receive a human nature deprived of the ancestral sin, it can be answered only by the supernatural conception. Of course, the supernatural conception it is reduced to the hypostatic union too, to the fact that not through human initiative is formed the individual reality of the human nature of Jesus Christ, but through the initiative of His preexistent Person. But only through the supernatural conception it can become real the lack of the ancestral sin. The birth with the ancestral sin it is due to the fact that it is the product of the initiative of the man. And in this initiative the man does not manifest like an individual, but like a case. Any birth is a prolongation of the human species and it is attributed to the human species. Therefore, even the individuals who conceive are cleansed of the ancestral sin, like the Christians are, the one who is born as being a prolongation of the human nature, through an own initiative, he is born from sin. The first apparition of the man into existence it is anterior to any own initiative, but not to the initiative of the human nature in general. If it had been able to jump before any human initiative in general, but though it has been able to exist, it would have been brought to existence directly through another initiative than the human one, and it would have not come into world with the inherited sin. Just this happened to Jesus Christ through His conception from the Holy Ghost¹³⁴.

But Jesus did not have a rigid nature, foreigner to the human one. According to the Holy Fathers, the passions which burden the human nature are of two kinds: some imputable, sinful, dishonest, and some 134 Karl Barth deduces exactly like Andrusos, the impossibility of sin in Jesus, from the fact that the Subject was God. “Gewiss, als sein Menschsein wurde es sofort ein anderes als das unsrige, sofern die Sünde, das heißt der Streit des Menschen gegen Gott, in ihm weitergehen konnte. Von dieser einen einzigen Bestimmung abgesehen ist es doch ganz und gar dieses unser bekanntes Menschsein; mit seiner natürlichen Problematik nicht nur, sondern mit der Schuld, die auf ihm liegt und die es zu büßen hat, mit dem Gericht Gottes, das über ihm steht, mit dem Tode dem er verfallen ist. Der Sohn Gottes konnte nicht sündigen – wie könnte Gott sich selbst untreu werden? – aber das alles, den die heilige Schrift eben damit meint, wen sie den Menschen Fleisch nennt, hat der Sohn Gottes auf sich genommen in getragen, indem er Mensch wurde. Und gerade insofern ist er wirklicher, echter, wahrer Mensch, vor Gott stehender Mensch geworden“, W. c. P. 45.

irreproachable, which are simple punishments for the sin. Jesus did not take the sin but He has organically, existentially, and ontologically impropriated the punishments for the sin.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“It is difficult to understand that the Son of God can make Himself man too, and that He can accept the death of the assumed human body. But it is even harder to understand that the peoples’ spirits would have been brought to existence by a blind law, in order to disappear one at the time. It is therefore more rational to cogitate that the death too, it can be framed in a positive meaning of the existence, and that the people do not die definitively with the whole their being but they only die with their body, and that they can be brought back to full existence, namely with the body too, through the love of God.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 162)

En-Humanity

/ En-

Hypostatization

“It is to be noticed that in the definition it is insistently confessed the fact that Jesus Christ has existed as Son of God, therefore like godlike hypostasis or person, before the embodiment. This is for Jesus Christ, born out of Virgin Mary according to His quality as human being, and He is One and the Same with the godlike hypostasis born out of the Father before the ages. The confession doesn’t say that Jesus Christ, as person, He had been constituted only by the birth out of Virgin Mary, by the meeting between the godlike nature and the human nature, and He wouldn’t have been a person before that. This aspect was explicitly highlighted by Leontius from Byzantium, the theologian of the Justinian époque, amongst other things also in order to scatter the doubts of the pre-Chalcedonians, who were refusing the definition from Chalcedon, because they imagined that the affirmation that “the two natures are together-flowing into a person and into a hypostasis” didn’t express sufficiently the unity of Christ as Person. Leontius of Byzantium used, in order to express the fact that Jesus Christ is the Same, as Person, with the Son of God from before embodiment, the term “en-hypostatization”. The hypostasis of the godlike Word hasn’t united Himself with another human hypostasis, but he has formed to Himself, by embodiment, a human nature, assumed and framed in His eternal Hypostasis, and, by this, he has made on Himself also the Hypostasis of the human nature.” (Stăniloae 2006: 17)

“In Jesus Christ, though, the human nature has received the concrete existence not as own center, but in a pre-existent center, in the unity of the divine Hypostasis of the Logos.” (Stăniloae 2006: 19)

“There cannot be about an autonomous subsistence of the human nature in the frame of the superior and wider unity the human nature has come to existence in. If that was the case, the human nature it would affirm itself as a different hypostasis. Keeping it in a state of pure subject it cannot be also, because of the human nature cannot exist as such, namely the human nature doesn’t exist not-hypostatized, therefore it doesn’t exist as non-person either, or as non-subject, or lacking the character of a subject. In addition to that, Jesus Christ wouldn’t be, in this case, a “full man” too. The subject modality, of the subject valence of the human nature, it is not accomplished, though, in the case of Jesus Christ, as a modality in itself, as an autonomous subsistence, but it is accomplished in the divine-human hypostatical whole, being a part of it. The features of spontaneity and conscious recording of the outside acts, features which are virtually comprised in the human nature, are no longer activate by the human nature in isolation, but they are activated by the divine-human whole that includes the human nature too. The godlike subject becomes human subject too.” (Stăniloae 2006: 18)

“Not only the human nature has found in God-the Word its subsistence as general humanity, but it has also received in the Word and together with Him the supreme modality as human person differing from other human persons. This is for like the Son of God is a Person differing in His godhead from the other godlike persons, likewise, on one hand, He imprints His assumed humanity with f His quality of Son of God; on the other hand, He imprints His quality as hypostatized or His quality of Person, differing from the other human persons. Of course, the human nature being a Person in God-the Word, and bearing in the case of Christ the imprinting of the Hypostasis or of the Person of God-the Word, in His case the human nature has a width, a comprehensibility other people don’t have it. Like the godlike nature cannot exist on a concrete manner except in special persons, likewise the human nature assumed in the Hypostasis of the Word it receives its special features as Person, differing from the features of other human persons, and forming, in the same time, a unique person with God-the Word.” (Stăniloae 2006: 18-19)

“By the fact that the aspect of spontaneity of the human nature of Jesus Christ it is activated by the hypostatical aspect of the Logos, Jesus Christ didn’t lack anything in order to be a full man too. But this full man doesn’t coincide with His quality as full God. The human nature has had in Christ the whole hypostatical - or as person - actualization, which he has got while existing as real subject in the other people, but not like an autonomous actualization, neither in a confrontation of the hypostatized – or as person - human nature with the godlike nature.” (Stăniloae 2006: 19)

“Jesus differs as man, from the other people, by the fact that He, as man, He isn’t an autonomous center of acts and reactions; but the human center of His acts and reactions it is in the same time also their godlike center and the center of His godlike acts. The whole His human nature has been centered through this, not outside God, but into God-the Word.” (Stăniloae 2006: 19)

“Amongst people has stepped a man Who has been no longer centered in Himself, but in God – He is, as Person, identical to God. The relations the other people are in with This Fellow Human of theirs, these relations aren’t lived outside God, but they are relations they have with God Himself, for this hypostatical center has a power of attracting towards God and of irradiating the good, a power that surpasses all the purely human centers: He is our center. In the middle of the creation has been placed, for eternity, a human center as Person, a center that is, in the same time, a godlike center too.” (Stăniloae 2006: 19)

“Jesus Christ has the quality of such a central man, by the fact that now the human nature’s potentialities are no longer activated by a human hypostasis, but by the godlike Hypostasis, Who embraces with His infinite love all the people and all the things. Consequently, there is no longer the danger that the human nature's potentialities to be activated in a individualistic manner, contrary to other people, as there is no longer the danger these potentialities to be activate contrary to God. Christ activates what is characteristic to the human nature without the danger these possibilities to be activated through decisions and deeds unfavorable to other people and contrary to God. For this activation of the human nature according to the will of God, the Creator of the human nature, and in accord with the other people, it is the most characteristic activation of the human nature, in Jesus Christ our embodied nature has found its true activation. The nature, in its generality, it belongs to everybody, and in this nature are included the favorable tendencies of everybody, namely the reciprocally converging tendencies. This doesn't mean, like I said before, that Christ doesn't hypostatize the human nature by imprinting it with his features as Person, which differ from the ones of the other persons. But Christ as divine hypostasis, He actualizes the human nature's tendencies favorable to us, by the fact that, being in divine hypostases, His human nature isn't endangered to be narrowed in its manifestations as human autonomous hypostasis, which to be able to activate this human nature in an individualistic sense." (Stăniloae 2006: 19)

"One can say that only in Christ the human nature is activated in its authenticity and in its fullness. The human nature brings into Christ too, its natural will. The mode this will is activated it is chosen by the divine Hypostasis Who does never activate it contrary to the human nature. Saint Maximos the Confessor says: "It isn't the same thing wanting and wanting in a certain way". The last thing is brought by the subject." (Stăniloae 2006: 19)

"In Christ the human nature's will and the tendencies aren't narrowed or bent by an autonomous subject driven by individualistic impulses, but by the divine Hypostasis Who gives them an actualization favorable to everybody, but also conform to the will of God. And God-the Embodied Word, far from impeding or altering the tendencies of the human nature's will and potentialities, just Him was able to authentically actualize them, in their conformation to His will. And for He has actualized these tendencies in the fullest favorable way to the other people, one can say that He has made the human nature as person in the most authentic mode, if we consider the human person as a unity always referring positively to the other persons." (Stăniloae 2006: 19-20)

"Christ has actualized in the most characteristic to the nature mode, the nature's will, and He also has made it Person in the most authentic manner, and this is because it cannot be a nature actualized except by making it person. And this authentic actualization it means an actualization according to the will of God, a fact that results out of the fact that the Hypostasis of the Word has made personal, in the most authentic mode, the human nature He has assumed, and this is for, in Himself, as model of the man, it is virtually included the potentiality of the man's character as person; in addition to that, the hypostasis is the mode of the nature's concrete existence, and the Logos is the ultimate foundation on which the each man's nature subsists concretely, as hypostasis." (Stăniloae 2006: 20)

"Christ has restored not only our will in its activation, but he also has restored our rationality. This is for the Word of God is also the right supreme Rationality of Him as Person, according to which it has been created the rationality of each man, in order to think the things' rationalities as images of the rationalities of the divine Logos, together with the godlike Persons' rationality, and in a dialogue with that rationality. According to the connection God was maintaining with the human rationality before the Embodiment, a connection weakened by sin, after the Embodiment the divine Rationality as Person has made Himself the hypostasis or the subject of the human rationality, by bringing the human rationality to the full conformity with His divine rationality. The human nature in Christ is made, by will, to obey His divine will, and this is for His human's nature rationality is lightened by His divine rationality, as model and as source of it, and His human rationalities sees the things, the human persons, and the relations between them in a right manner and in all their profoundness." (Stăniloae 2006: 20)

"The human nature sees itself fulfilled on the ontological rationality's plan too, in the Hypostasis of the divine Rationality. The human rationality and will the Hypostasis of the Logos has assumed, not consisting in an individual human hypostasis who could individualize the use of the rationality and of the will in a manner contrary to other people, but being hypostatized in the divine rationality and will as Person – these divine rationality and will being their true model – the human rationality and will are actualized as rationality and will in a way that is favorable to all the human natures, and they have a great power of attracting the human natures towards unity." (Stăniloae 2006: 20)

"For it has been fulfilled in the divine rational or supra-rational Hypostases, the human rationality of Christ it has been opened to the infinite horizon of the divine reality and of its knowledge. The humanity of Christ is transparent to the Godhead and to the other people, by not having an own hypostasis as a possible opaque wall in front of the reality of God and of the other peoples. Christ is, in the supreme degree, the man for the people, for He is the man for God, or the humanity fully opened to God." (Stăniloae 2006: 20)

“In our middle it has been placed a human center as Person, by the fact that the Word-God Himself has done it amongst the other persons. He has made on Himself the restored Man, in conformity to God Who wants and Who fully rationally thinks at the good of everybody and, that’s why, and in conformity to all the human persons, and in solidarity with them, and with the understanding and with the will of serving the unity of all the human persons.” (Stăniloae: 2006, 20)

“If the person alone is the center that irradiates the spiritual and unifying live and warmth, the center of irradiation of a loving life and of a unifying power that is endless and undiminished by any shadow of egotism, that Person won’t be other but a godlike person Who has entered the unmediated relation with the people, as human person Who has been fulfilled in the culminant mode.” (Stăniloae 2006: 20-21)

“All the human hypostases have the Hypostasis of the Word as their ultimate hypostasis. But the human nature of Christ had God-the Word as Hypostasis in such an intimate mode, that it no longer has an own hypostasis, like in all the other people. Only on this way the people can have God-the Word as ultimate hypostasis, at their turn, in a fuller manner. In the same time, their hypostases are being strengthened through the relation with the human nature’s firmest hypostasis, for this is the one Who opens the human nature the most, and by doing so, He opens also the people’s hypostases as open windows towards God and amongst themselves.” (Stăniloae 2006: 22)

“Like in the body, the man is framed in the horizon and in the liberty of the human spirit, but without being annulled and by being fulfilled in his purpose, likewise in Christ, to the human nature is opened the infinite horizon of the divine life and the possibilities of the divine liberty in the divine life, but without being annulled, and by being the human nature’s aspiration fulfilled. Towards this horizon aspires any human being, and, in some measure, any human being aspiring to this horizon is imparted out of it through the relation with the not-embodied Logos. But in Christ this horizon is being opened to the human nature not through the relation with the Logos as a relation with another person, but in the unity of the divine-human person, to which the human nature is part too. And Christ is being communicating this horizon to us too, in a more direct mode, by the fact that the Logos is now in direct relation with us, a relation we are each other with our fellow humans.” (Stăniloae 2006: 22)

“The human nature is made for the living in a not-confounded manner in boundlessness, while existing apart, as hypostasis, the human being lives this tendency of his, but he doesn’t fulfill it at once, but he eternally advances in it. But in the real existence in the Hypostasis of the Word, the human being lives at once the whole real openness towards boundlessness, but the human being is not merged to the godlike boundlessness. Like man, Christ always knows that He is being imparted with infinity, that He is resting in infinity, but He know also, in the same time, that He isn't the source of this infinity like man, but like God." (Stăniloae 2006: 22)

"All the human persons are being strengthened in their quality as hypostases, by the fact that they enter the relation with the Son of God Who has become, as Hypostasis of the Human nature, in a more accentuated mode, their ultimate Hypostases. Before the Logos has become to the human hypostases - by assuming the human nature in His Hypostasis - the more accentuated ultimate Hypostasis of theirs, the human hypostases lacked, in some measure, a close hypostatical support. By receiving in Christ, the embodied Logos, as closer ultimate hypostasis, He gives the human hypostases the full hypostatical consistency and openness, out of His power of supra-consistent and of supra-conscious Hypostasis, of all the human hypostases. The people's humanity still wasn't full before the embodiment of the Son of God as man, before He has become the Hypostasis of the human nature, said Nicholas Kabasilas." (Stăniloae 2006: 22)

"The supreme closeness of God to the people, and therefore the supreme revealing of God in Jesus Christ, as also the supreme glory of the en-humanity of Jesus Christ and of all the righteous it is shown in the state which we are elevated at through judgment. This is waited for even by the angels with fear and tremble." (Stăniloae 1997: 298)

Epektasis

“The infinity of the Godhead, or of His life, which becomes life of the one who has reached in God, it ensures that one’s eternal stability, just because he can move and he eternally moves around God, or in God, rejoicing without getting fed of God’s borderless love. The infinite identity of God, around Whom the soul is moving and Whom he is imparted with, it removes the time. This is for “the time is circumscribed movement” by a border, at which the creature finds his end, in a world which is at its turn a space, of a limited content.” (Stăniloae 1997: 304)

“The creature’s existence above time isn’t like the eternity of the One Who is always the Same. It is movement around the eternal One and it isn’t unmoved like That One; its “stability” is due to the “moving” around Him. The creature doesn’t have by himself the eternity, but is has is only as participation to the eternal One. That’s why, the eternity penetrated the creature’s temporality, or the stability penetrates the creature’s movement, on the measure the creature advances in God. But the full existence above time, of the creature, it comes at the end of the creature’s existence in time, and it never reaches to be the same with the existence above time, of God. In the creature’s eternity it is preserved the result of the time and the creature moves further towards the eternity of God Who doesn’t come from time and Who doesn’t move towards something.” (Stăniloae 1997: 304)

“When reached from the temporal movement in the eternity of the union with the borderless God, the creature will still continue moving towards Him, but in a stable movement, which doesn’t transform the creature but it endlessly deifies the creature.” (Stăniloae 1997: 305)

Eschatology

“After their resurrection (the people, o. n.), when they too will wholly become light, when their body too will be overwhelmed by the Ghost, they will perceive the body of Christ – through the spiritual sensitivity of their body, increased to maximum for the unseen presences – overwhelmed by spirituality or as a fully transparent organ of the Ghost. (...) this state (of transparency, o. n.) it will be achieved by the whole creation.” (Stăniloae 2003: 46)

“At the end, not only the time will be surpassed in a double immobility, but also the space. The times will be surpassed through the stability in the infinity of the communion with God and amongst the people united with him, either through the impossibility of advancing any longer towards God and towards the fellow humans, so that the time will become inutile. Likewise, the space will be surpassed through the transparency of God and of any fellow human all over the space, through the accentuated seal put of each person by the Person of God, either through the impossibility to any longer advance towards the communion with God and with the fellow humans, because of the hostile transparency of the evil angels and of the fellow humans who are hostile to us, all over the space. The presence of these ones will throng us so much, or the space will be so much marked by them, that there we will no longer perceive a space, like no longer will perceive a space the ones who will be in the perfect communion with God and with the fellow humans. Of course, the thronging of the ones who will be in hell, because of the hostile faces of the evil angels and of the fellow humans from there, it won’t contradict a terrible loneliness of the person being there. The “ugly” face it causes to you the “ugliness” with the sense of loneliness. The loneliness in case of everybody is indifferent to you it is less tormenting than the loneliness caused to you by everybody’s enmity. In the first case you are in a space you know you can surpass it. It is a remediable “ugliness”. In the second case you no longer have around you a space you still are to meet somebody in, somebody who is interested in you. The “ugliness” in this case is definitive.” (Stăniloae 2003: 214)

“Like in the supra-temporal happy stability it will be accumulated the whole experience gathered during time, likewise it will be accumulated in the supra-spatial existence the whole experience of the acts committed within space. The supra-temporality of the creature it will be the eon in which the time will be wrapped and filled up by the eternity of God, and its supra-spatiality will have wrapped in itself the whole space. In the light of the face of Christ and of all the things which will meet us, it will be reflected all the good things we have done, whilst in the dreadful face of satan and in the enmity of the ones from hell there will be reflected the whole evil we have done and the torment of our conscience. The time and the space we have lived in, they do not disappear without any trace, but they remain like joy or like torment.” (Stăniloae 2003: 215)

“The distance between us and God it is surpassed by Christ not only in the descending of God to us, but also through our ascension to God. And in Christ all of us have surpassed the distance between us and God. But, though, not in an actualized manner. Only Christ has surpassed also as man, both virtually and in an actual manner, the distance to God. But towards people Him too hasn’t surpassed in an actual manner the distance towards everybody, because some people force him to remain at distance. But we can only in Christ to surpass in an actual manner the distance to God and the distance amongst us. In Him it is reached our eschatological target that we also can reach: the overcoming of the time and of the space. These ones are overcome not only between us and god, but also amongst ourselves as human beings; this is for we are recapitulated in Christ and there is no longer a distance amongst us too.” (Stăniloae 2003: 218-219)

“We cannot know where it could reach, in eschatology, the overwhelming of the natural laws through the work of the human freedom, enormously potentiated by the divine work, the two works being combined. Therefore, we cannot know where it can reach this overwhelming either in the course of the present existence of the world, in some exceptional cases, namely of the wonders, effects of the force of the human spirit strengthened by the divine spirit, or of the divine spirit working directly upon nature or upon man.” (2003: 388)

“The consequences of the sin make impossible to the nature to reach its ultimate target during the terrestrial life, even within the ones who, after the coming of Christ, they are spiritualized at maximum by the faith in Him and through a living according to His example. The wonders are considered as exceptional anticipations or the eschatological state, in which the order of the repetition will be overcome on all the extend of the transfigured nature, which will serve as perfectly transparent and elastic environment of the communication amongst people, and between people and God.” (2003: 390)

“Until eschaton, the nature’s repeating order will be maintained as a screen, that continuously asks us to make it transparent, as a predictable frame, us to plan our work in, but upon with to also exercise the efficiency of our transforming and spiritualizing work. Until the end of this world, its natural order will continuously exist, while penetrated mysteriously by an order that is above it, like the spiritual life penetrates the more or less steadfast reality, and therefore not abolished, of the life into body.” (2003: 390)

“Infinitely increasing into the communion with God it means infinitely increasing in knowing Him and in participating to Him. Whilst during the earthly life this increasing it moves from a step to another, for on each step is felt the infinity of God, but it is not tasted, in the future life, the man who believed, he will be sunk with the knowledge and with the living in the divine infinity so that he won’t pass from a step to another, but he will eternally rest himself in this infinity.” (2003: 413-414)

“The Church affirms also an impartation with the sacrificed and resurrected Christ, in the future life, which is anticipated by the impartation in the present time, with the same Christ. In that eternal impartation the oikonomia of the salvation, as eternal union of the people with God in Christ, it comes to an end. The Eucharist in the eternal life is, as crowning of the godlike oikonomia, that consummate union between creation and Christ, in which “God will be all in everything” (I Cor. 15: 28)

“The eschatology is the final part (τα εσχάτα – the last part) of the creation’s existence. It is the final part not in the sense that after it there follows the total end of the existence, but in the sense that this part lasts forever, not being followed by any other stage. According to the Christian faith, the creation’s existence has three stages: the one from creation to Christ, that on in Christ or determined by Christ to the end of the present form of the world, and that one following after this end. Individually, for the one who didn’t know Christ, it has only two stages: the one from their birth to their death, and the one after their death (for the ones having a different belief); for the other ones it has three stages, for even they have received Christ soon after their birth, through Baptism, the one from before Christ it differs from the one in Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 143)

“The last phase of the existence, the eternal one, it is happy for the one who received Christ and who developed the communion with Him, the happiness consisting of the consummating the communion with Him; or it is unhappy because of, though they have received it through Baptism, they didn’t develop during their earthly life the communion with the resurrected Christ, cause which they will be deprived of it for, in the future life too.” (Stăniloae 1997: 143)

“The whole life in Christ, on earth, it is for this final stage; for it Christ embodied, and He died on the cross, and he resurrected and called us, and He has remained through our co-working in communion with us. The whole godlike oikonomia, even from before eternity, it is for this final phase. Towards this consummation in God, the world would have advanced, if the falling of our ancestors hadn’t had place. Therefore, God has created the world for this target.” (Stăniloae 1997: 143)

“If this final stage hadn’t existed, our earthly life with Christ it would have been in vain. The Christian believe that the purpose of the life itself it has been accomplished in Christ, for he has given the possibility that one to reach the final consummation and the eternal life.” (Stăniloae 1997: 143)

“Of course, the other religions too, they believe in eschatology, and by this they attribute a sense to the earthly life. But one can affirm that only Christ Who resurrected, He gives us an objective surety regarding the future life, and that only in the communion with Him, embodied and resurrected as man – communion with the eternal godlike Person, embodied forever as man and entered, as such, the intimate relation with us -, it is a communion which ensured us as persons for eternity, so that He ensures us a true eternal, conscious, and full happiness.” (Stăniloae 1997: 143)

“To the Christian faith, but also to the objective judgment, the future life which we will be maintained as persons in, it is decisive for the sense of the earthly life, for it has not only the form of a happy life for the ones who have accepted Christ as full sense of their earthly life, but it has also the form of an eternally unhappy life for the ones who haven’t accepted this meaning.” (Stăniloae 1997: 143)

“To the Christians, the eschatological plan, or the eternal life after death, it is not, though, something belonging only to the future; the eternal life has started through and in Christ, who resurrected, as man, from dead. And for Christ remains with the believers in an intimate bond, or even within them, the eternal life has already started for them, as earnest. That’s why in the New Testament it is said that in Christ we are “to the end of time” (1 Cor. 10: 11; Heb. 9: 26). Since Christ it has begun “the end of the ages”, for these ages has been filled up, through Christ present in them, with the earnest of the eternal life. The ones who believe in Christ, they live out of His Resurrection, by being somehow dead to the sinful life and to the ages from before the eon of this world. “Amen, amen, I am saying to you, that the one who hears My voice and who believes to the One Who has sent Me, he has eternal life and he doesn’t come to judgment, but he has moved himself from death to life” (Jn. 5: 24).” (Stăniloae 1997: 143-144)

“If only the eschatology makes the earthly life having a sense, then the death it will be inscribed as a necessary and meaningful moment on the life’s trajectory started at birth, by making our earthly life to pass in the eschatological phase, where the full sense of the earthly life it will be fully revealed.” (Stăniloae 1997: 144)

“If he had lived eternally on earth like persons, our life would have remained meaningless. The death is the mystery which we must cross through, in order to enter the life’s full meaning, equal to the life’s plenitude. Even the hell implies, from a certain point of view, a meaning, by the fact that it get us out from the ambiguous mist from earth. In hell, there is surely known that there is a paradise.” (Stăniloae 1997: 144)

“Thus, the components of the universal eschatology are these ones: the consummation of the world crossed through its present form; the second coming of Christ; the general resurrection of the dead and the changing of the bodies of the ones on earth; the universal Judgment; and the eternal life into happiness or into unhappiness. From those ones, at least the first three of them will take place simultaneously. But the produce of all of them it will be the second coming of Christ. Or, Christ will come for the second time into glory in order to cause all the other components. But because of being the first seen, the first component it will be the end of the world, though its hidden cause is Christ coming for the second time.” (Stăniloae 1997: 238)

“The Christendom affirms that the present form of the world it will come to an end.” (Stăniloae 1997: 238)

“In the Orthodox teaching, unlike in the Catholic teaching, the universal judgment at the end of the world it keeps an own importance, by bringing a important plus to the wholeness of the happiness or of the unhappiness for the souls crossed through the individual judgment. That’s why the end of the present form of the world, which the final judgment is related to, it is not waited for only by the living ones, but it is waited for, by living and dead, with a supreme interest. The souls of the dead are waiting for it in order to receive the whole eternal happiness or unhappiness.” (Stăniloae 1997: 238-239)

“Of course, we cannot imagine that God retains arbitrarily a part of the happiness or of the unhappiness due to the ones who die before the end of the world. That’s why we must admit that the full happiness or unhappiness of each person it depends organically on the end of the world and on the of the activity of the whole mankind within world, and thus also on the result of this activity, a result being made eternal in what it will have good, in the Kingdom of Heavens, and in what it will have evil, in hell. And this isn’t only in the sense that the integrity of the happiness of each person it is conditioned by the happiness of all the ones who will be partakers to happiness, and the unhappiness of a sinner it is completed with the unhappiness of all the sinners – for if it had been like that, on the measure that more people are dying, the happiness or the unhappiness of the ones who died before it would have increased, and on the other hand it would have been sufficient at the end an individual judgment of the ones who have been living when the end of the world had come, in order the everybody’s happiness or unhappiness to be completed -; but, also in the sense that the fullness of the happiness or of the unhappiness of each person it depends on a new and final judgment which everybody will be submitted in common to. And this means a judgment or an appreciation give upon everybody depending on their contribution to the fulfilling of the plan of God with the world and with the human life, a plan consisting in making the world and the human life transparent to God.” (Stăniloae 1997: 239)

“The ones dead yore, they will be judged again in the light of their contribution to the God’s plan accomplishing, contribution that will be seen in the final result of the plan only at the plan’s end, after everybody will have been brought their contribution, good or evil in this regard. In front of everybody, everybody’s deeds or thought will be shown plainly, in order to everyone to be judged for his contribution to those deeds and thoughts, of for the part taken to them by the human life that has come to an end. The people from yore will see the fruits brought by their thoughts and deeds in the generations which followed to them, and the ones living at the end they will see the inheritances of their forerunners which they have fructified or which they have left them fruitless. The ones from yore will be judged for the facts from after them, and the people from the end they will be judged for they have fulfilled or not the facts from before them. We will be judged for all the good calls made to the entire world by the apostles, by the martyrs, by the saints, and for all the examples given by our forerunners and not followed by us. We will see the intensity of their feeling, upon which we have laid the layer of our lack of sensitivity, for the false development of our humanity. The ones from yore, they will be judged for all the evil seeds they seeded within world, and they will be rewarded for all the good sees which they seeded within world, seed which will be proven fructified or not, at the end. The entire history will be again in front of all of us, not only with the facts happened on the visible plan, but also with the facts happened on the invisible plan, and even with the facts that could have happened or which couldn’t have happened, burdening or rejoicing everyone, with its totality for what was good or evil done within it. Then we will see that the past hasn’t died. The Christian teaching about the bodies’ resurrection and about the universal judgment it has, amongst others, also this sense that it gives a last appreciation, valid for eternity, of everything that has taken place, that nothing is left to perish in forgetfulness. The universal judgment is a factor urging to do the good within world, as also the thinking at death is for the individual life.” (Stăniloae 1997: 239-240)

“Everybody will be gathered together in an eternal joy for everything they did good, endlessly increasing in the gift of God. Only a lack of end of the history it hands over what is more important within it, and in its past, namely the persons and their living as persons, to the eternal death. A contrary, only at the end of the history in a consummation of everything that took place and in an eternal joy for the done and made eternal good, or in an eternal torment for the done evil, the creation is taken out from the relativism which otherwise it would have remained eternal, and the good is place as immovable criterion of our deeds and the eternal value of all the person it will be revealed.” (Stăniloae 1997: 240)

“Nothing from the totality of the human life on earth will remain covered, not noticed, not valued, not appreciated, or not condemned, but for all the things everybody will be take accountable in good or in bad, and everybody will be imparted with a new understanding of all things. Properly-said, only at that judgment the meaning of the human history it will be unveiled, namely only in the light of the glory of Christ – glory not only as that of the One born out of the Father, but also as of the One Who has made Himself model man – it will be shown what the human life on earth and all the deeds from within it had to tend towards, and what measure they tended in. Many history’s events and many deeds of the people during history will remain covered until then, by equivocal, and many people who participated to them or who were authors of them won’t be able to realize until then if they were wrong or right, so that they won’t be able to full rejoice or get sad for them.” (Stăniloae 1997: 240)

“The divine judgment by no means will orient itself only according to the external and far from man facts, and not according to man’s inward state. The godlike light will show then what the man’s whole contribution of good or bad to the development of the mankind it stays like in a tight connection with the own state which determined that contribution or it has been determined by it. Each one will show implicitly in himself - like a shell bears the sounds of the sea – the echo of the entire history, his report with the entire human life unfolded in the world. But the meaning of the integral human life on earth, its finality, it cannot be deciphered clearly only by looking at in at the end. The new light from the end won’t be only a light resulting from looking at the entire unfolding of the human life, but also out of the revealing of a light which won’t see in itself. This is for not through itself this unfolding gives itself a meaning, but God Himself aims the accomplishing of His union with the world in order to make the people able for eternity.” (Stăniloae 1997: 240-241)

“Origen and Saint Gregory of Nyssa, starting from the verse 15: 28 from the Epistle 1 Cor.: “When all the things will be submitted to Him, then also the Son of God will submit all the things to the One Who submitted Him all the things, in order God to be everything in everybody”, they conceived the unfolding of the human life within world as the interval of time which the people have to obey Christ by conforming themselves to Christ in, by being filled up with His consummation, in common. Only then, when Christ will obey the Father together with all the people and with all the things, it will result this act of supreme happiness for the entire creation. Until then, the world will still have something from an immanence exterior to God and so, something from an imperfection.” (Stăniloae 1997: 241)

“Given the man’s freedom, the end of the human life on earth won’t be necessarily equal to the incorporation of everybody in Christ, but only of the ones who want this. With this rectification, a quite important one, one can recognize that the world’s life is influenced by Christ’s participation to it, by His sufferance with the limbs not-fully made whole in His body, by the attraction exercised upon the people on earth by Him, and, by this, by His aspiration towards the full obedience to the Father, together with the ones brought to the spiritual union with Himself.” (Stăniloae 1997: 241)

“Of course, Christ as Person is obedient to the Father even now, but in His will be gathered together all the ones who want to be recapitulated in Him, all the ones who decide to maintain and to consummate their humanity, by bringing their godlike image to full likeness to Christ.” (Stăniloae 1997: 241)

“It is affirmed a profound and mysterious Christ’s solidarity with the entire unfolding of the human life on earth. Christ suffers together with the whole mankind and in the mankind, it is manifested His endeavor for our consummation, even if He doesn’t always encounter the collaboration of our endeavor. He strives for all of us to be framed in Himself, in order Him to submit us as a whole, namely with all the limbs of His body, to God-the Father.” (Stăniloae 1997: 242)

“Christ, since the moment He was crucified, He won’t be drinking the wine of the joy until He will drink it together with everybody in the Kingdom of Heavens (Mt. 26: 29). He is actualizing His sacrifice until the end of the world. The whole life on earth, in its endeavor towards God, it is a road of the Cross, a climbing towards Golgotha, and a crucifixion of the life together with Christ, through the power His crucifixion continuously pours it for the world - but the human life can be also a refusal of this road. The human life on earth is a continuous impartation with the Cross of Christ but, fighting this impartation there is also a continuous refusal of it. The human life on earth is an admixture of sticking to the evil and of fighting the evil, or repentance for sins and of overcoming the sins, but also of committing the sins. It is a life with Christ and out of Christ’s power, but it is also helplessness and a refusal to walk on Christ’s Road.” (Stăniloae 1997: 242)

“The saints, like Christ, they aren’t only in a passive waiting for the end of the world, but they too contribute through the power of their sufferance and of their love, to maintaining and developing the Christian truth in it.” (Stăniloae 1997: 243-244)

“Not only Christ hasn’t entered the full joy while the life of the mankind on earth is still lasting, but neither the saints have. They too are crying for our sins. In this sense they are imparted with Christ Who is sacrificing Himself. That’s why the happiness of the souls from the provisory state it isn’t a full one.” (Stăniloae 1997: 243)

“Not only the saints are waiting for the end of the world, but there is also an aspiration towards the end within the believers on earth, as towards the point where they will be fully united with the Lord and where they will be consummated in Him and where they will be resting in Him. (...) Namely the Christians aren’t waiting for Messiah as a totally new and unanticipated truth, like the people of Israel do; but to the Christians it is characteristic a waiting and a hope for the full manifestation of Christ and of the glory of His truth and love within world, through the world’s consummation on a plan differing from the present plan.” (Stăniloae 1997: 244)

“The Orthodox teaching has a confirmation about an end of the world it the tendency towards an end and towards a consummation manifested in the world’s historical life itself, through its nature, but which tends towards an end through Christ too.” (Stăniloae 1997: 245)

“One of the interpretations given to the unfolding of the creation as destined to an end as a whole it sees the essential reality of it in the communion of the subject as person with other subjects as persons. Thus, on one hand, the historical unfolding of the creation through the character as subject of the people, as factors of the history, it requires an order of the full liberation of the subjects from the order of the objective and it fight for it, and on the other hand it cannot accomplish it in its frame. This means that on one hand the creation in its present form it must die. But not in order to definitively remain in death, but in order to definitively resurrect into another existence, in order to accomplish there its aspiration towards consummation. “The end of the history it means crossing through death but in order to resurrect.” (Berdiaeff)” (Stăniloae 1997: 245)

“The end of the history as a whole it will be lived as a death, as the end of the man too, and not only like a crossing without interruption of a stage experienced as inferior, into a superior stage.” (Stăniloae 1997: 246)

“The Kingdom of God will come after the creation will have achieved for the totality of the world structures corresponding to that Kingdom of Righteousness, of Peace, and of Equality and, at least for some Christians, the more advance living of these relations in God. The eschatological perfection will come after the mankind will have strived to do everything in its powers in order to come as close as possible to the eschatological perfection. When that perfection will appear, it will understand that it needed just that, namely it will have prepared itself for receiving it with understanding?” (Stăniloae 1997: 250)

“Christ helps to the coming of the eschatological perfection by leading this creation towards Him and it fulfills it in Himself, at its end, not only as a factor working within it and in its totality in a somehow unknown mode, and the Christians in a more conscious mode, but also as final Judge of it. The conscience itself of a final judgment which we are to be present at, it gives the Christians the power for activity within history, for leading the history towards the Kingdom of God. Everyone will be judged in front of everybody, in front of the final result of the history. Through this it will be shown that everybody is called to work the good and not only in the close circle of his fellow humans (in the egotism of the married pair which avoided giving birth to children, in the egotism of the own tribe, of the blood relatives etc. or in the egotism of the nation), but also for the general causes of the mankind. That’s why also the dead ones from before they will be again judged then, for then it will be seen the measure their deed determined on, the ones who lived after them, to work the good or the evil, for the whole mankind and for the mankind’s development.” (Stăniloae 1997: 250)

“The saints and the angels watch, in an exciting mode, how the following people live and end their lives, praying for them, helping them, and keeping the crowns prepared for them. But we too, on earth, we have a duty to contribute to the good development of the history out of a responsibility for our forerunners too, knowing that they will be judged again, at the end, for the result which the history will reach as whole.” (Stăniloae 1997: 250)

“The savior declares that nobody knows the day and the hour which he will come on, “neither the angels, nor the Son, but only the Father” (Mt. 24: 36p; Mk. 13: 32). “That’s why, take vigil, for you do not know the hour when the Son of the man comes” (Mt. 25: 13; Mk. 13: 33; Lk. 12: 40). Only to the Father it belongs to appreciate that moment. All the calculations starting from arbitrarily interpreted numbers (Daniel 7: 2; 9: 25; Apoc. 12: 14 etc.) which establish the days, the months, and the times, as precise moments, they overlook the border God has laid to the prediction power of the man, and to establish the real meaning of the Revelation’s symbols, which are prophecies to be fully clarified after their accomplishing.” (Stăniloae 1997: 255)

“Given the border the Savior laid, one can only make suppositions regarding the general conditions of the historical moment which would justify the end of the world.” (Stăniloae 1997: 255)

“The sense of the spiritual progress it can have many meanings, and that’s why the end of the world cannot be foreseen precisely.” (Stăniloae 1997: 255)

“The Church Fathers and the Orthodox theologians presented, at their turn, the moment that could cause the end of the world, as a state characterized by ambiguity.” (Stăniloae 1997: 255)

“Although the history could be considered as ripe for the end, when the history it will have reached the mentioned phase, the end will be actually still brought by God. Only He alone sees when the history is ripe for the end, for the unveiling of its meaning as a whole.” (Stăniloae 1997: 255)

“The apparition of the history’s meaning it is the same with the apparition of the Word of God, Whom the Apocalypse describes as coming on a white horse and being called as Faithful and True and judging and battling into justice (Apoc. 19: 11 and the followings). The Word of God is the Rationality of God, which is as such the meaning of the history’s unfolding. He will show Himself on the open sky. The sky will open in order to burst out of it the meaning, the rationality of all the acts committed on earth, and this Rationality comes riding a white horse, namely quickly overthrowing the whole hypocrite rationality (word) and the whole liar truth wanting to oppose Him. He is faithful not for he believes, but for He is faithful to the world He created for a meaning and which He wants to fulfill in Him; he is faithful to the ones whom He promised the eternal happiness if they will work out of the faith in Him, And He is true, in opposition to all the lie mixed with the human life. The rationality from above, according to which all the rationalities manifested within history have been created, it will appear in order to fully lighten the target which they have been wanting to advance towards, and it will show how much they have advance or not towards it.” (Stăniloae 1997: 256)

“According to the Holy Scripture, though it will be impossible to surely predict the end of the world, there still will be some signs which can possible indicate with some probability the closeness of the end. Of course, these signs are submitted to some ambiguity. That’s why, the Holy Scripture says on one hand that the end will come unexpectedly, but on the other hand, it gives some signs of the end’s coming.” (Stăniloae 1997: 256)

“Saint Apostle Paul presents the ambiguous character of the end’s appreciation, by declaring that people will doubt about it. That’s why the end will come “like a thief”. “You must know that in the final times, the mockers will come with mockery, who will walk according to their lusts and they will say: Where is the promise of His coming? For since our parents passed away, all the things remain as at the beginning of the creation... And the day of the Lord it will come like a thief; then the heavens will perish with a great noise; the natural elements by burning they will undo the earth and the things on earth will totally burn (2 Pt. 3: 3-4, 10).” (Stăniloae 1997: 256-257)

“On one hand the signs of the end mentioned by Scripture seem to be very specific. On the other hand, due to the equivocal that will still persist, neither these signs could be identified with total surety. These signs are: “preaching the Gospel to all the people (Mt. 24: 14); 2) conversion of the Jewish people to Christendom (Rom. 11: 25); 3) multiplication of the lawlessness and the getting cold of the love amongst people (Mt. 24: 10, 12), the falling of many from faith, being deceived by liar prophets (Mt. 24: 4 and the followings), the multiplication of the wars and of the news about wars (Mt. 24, 67), great natural disasters (Mt. 24: 7, 29); coming of Enoch and Elijah (Apoc. 19: 1); 5) coming of Antichrist (2 Tess. 2: 3-11; 1 Jn. 2: 18) who will work with his liar apostles all sorts of signs in order to deceive the people; substituting himself to Christ, he will persecute the chosen ones of the lord (Mt. 24: 5, 11); 6) the showing on the sky of the “sign of the Son of man” (Mt. 24: 30), namely of the cross.” (Stăniloae 1997: 257)

“The end of the world will come when the world will be completed from spiritual point of view, or when the body of Christ will be completed, as a unitary and harmonious spirituality. The unity of that world must comprise the totality of the forms of individual incorporation of the divine-human spirituality of Christ. Of course, the fullness of the union it will be achieved beyond.” (Stăniloae 1997: 258)

“The definite contour of the spirituality it probably refers not only to the limited number of persons in whom it is experienced, but also to the modalities of experiencing and expressing the spirituality of Christ by the world of the created spirits, without excluding the living of the indefinite by them, and an advancing in the Infinite and One Christ done through each modality. The persons group themselves on earth in order to experience richer modalities of incorporating the divine spirituality of the Head of the new humanity, Christ, in various and always changed connections. But in the future world each person, through representing a modality of incorporating the infinite Christ’s spirituality, he will have and he will understand in connection with it all the other in an infinite fuller mode than here, for each person will live the whole spirituality of Christ, of His mysterious body, but in different form. And on the other hand, the entire godlike and human spirituality concentrated in Christ, the Head of the body of the deified mankind, it will be actualized through the limbs of this Body of His. Nothing form the treasure being in Christ will be left unvalued in His mysterious Body, due to the countless natural capacities, elevated by grace, which represent His limbs.” (Stăniloae 1997: 259)

“Combining the reasons for the history’s development towards its end with the reason of history’s stopping when God will want that, one could say that the world will come to an end when, on one hand, there will be no people to grow up within world people who to complete the world from above in order to express someone of the Christ’s features, and on the other hand, when the ones appearing within world they won’t take anything from within world in order to develop the world in its frame. The world will come to an end when within world there won’t be possible any development of the infinite spirituality concentrated in Christ. The exhaustion of the history in this role of it, it won’t be either accidental or forced by the divine Providence, but it will be due to a mysterious convergence and meeting of this one with the divine order, which doesn’t exclude either the human liberty or the godlike work. The refusal of God to reveal new depths through creation, it will coincide with the helplessness of noticing and developing these depths. The exhaustion of the creator or revelator of spirituality power of the history, it will be a sign that the world from above will have been completed. By combining the two causalities in explaining the history’s end, it is answered the eventual affirmation that the history, coming to an end through an exhaustion of its possibilities of noticing and developing within itself the virtuality seeded in it by God, and concentrated, actualized, and unveiled in Christ, it is a failure of the work of God.” (Stăniloae 1997: 260)

“The events concerning the coming of Christ as the cause of the world’s transformation and of the resurrection of the dead are shrouded in the deepest mystery. They have an apophatic-spiritual character. Through them the plan of the immanent existence is being transcended. They will take place somehow simultaneously. The world will be transformed at lightning speed. In the same time, out of the bosoms of the transfigured earth there will come out the pneumatized bodies of the dead and the living bodies will be transformed in resurrected bodies. Simultaneously, there will take place the second coming of the Lord. Properly-said, the light of His resurrected body will transform the mode of existence of this world and it will be the cause of the resurrection of the dead. That’s why the day which all these things will take place in, it is called the day of the Lord.” (Stăniloae 1997: 260-261)

“The word of Apostle Peter that the world’s natural elements will burn (2 Pt. 3: 10), it is itself shrouded in mystery. It could mean that the new world is anticipated by a decomposition of the present world, proving that the way of existing of this world, which has been adapted to the people’s life from after falling, it must cross through a true decomposition in order to be renewed, like the man must cross through death for the same reason. But this act of consumption preceding the apparition of the new way of the world’s existence must take place at lightning speed, for Saint Apostle Paul says that the living ones will be transformed in an instant (1 Cor. 15: 52), and therefore the transformation of the world and the resurrection of the death will have to take place in an instant too. The undoing of the present world's way of existence, it will be in the same time the world's apparition in a new way of existence, an effect that is uncharacteristic to the material fire. This burning at the lightning speed it has a superior cause, and it has as purpose the cleaning up of the world of the slag of the evil and a placing of the world in a state of spiritual transparency. But maybe that burning is a combination of superior and natural causes." (Stăniloae 1997: 261)

"As the Lord comes, on one hand He burns the callous way of world's existence, and on the other hand He renews the world, adapting the world to His resurrected body and to the new bodies of the people, whose resurrection will be caused also by the coming closer of the Lord's resurrected body, through the power irradiating out of it." (Stăniloae 1997: 261-262)

"The present way of the world's existence it is adapted to the necessities of food; in this way of existence the matter is in a continuous transformation. It is a way of existence that is dominated by the laws of decomposition and re-composition. It is a way of existence which the world has taken because of the people, and not vice versa. That's why the creation is waiting for the unveiling of the sons of God, in order itself to show its true way of existence (Rom. 8: 19). In the renewed way of the world's existence will reign only the "stabile movement" of an increasingly greater union." (Stăniloae 1997: 263)

"When the people's bodies will be transformed, being liberated from corruptibility, it will be transformed, in solidarity with the people's bodies, also the world's way of existence. And as the resurrected bodies will be like the resurrected body of Christ, this body of the Ghost present within it in an overwhelming manner, it is the force, the dough which will transform the whole world in its likeness. That's why one can say that the second coming of the Lord in the resurrected body, it will coincide to the transformation of the world and to the resurrection of the bodies, both of them being cause simultaneously by Him. When He will want to enter the full pneumatological-corporal solidarity – not simple and not-full as in the present – with this world, the world will be transformed according to His image." (Stăniloae 1997: 263)

"Without materially disappearing, the world will be bathed in spirituality, so that not the spirit will be seen through matter, but the matter will be seen through spirit, as says Saint Gregory Palamas somewhere. The subject will reciprocally experience one another in an unmediated manner, being they full of a spirituality that overwhelms the matter, like two people experience one another in a consummate communion, by watching one another in the eyes, and by forgetting about the existence of the material reality. This makes the subjects no longer be exterior to one another, but to be reciprocally interior.” (Stăniloae 1997: 263-264)

“From the writings of Saint Simeon and of other Church Fathers it results a gradation of materiality, of corporality, and of sensitiveness in the created world, in its levels and stages. The new world and our resurrected body, they will reach a maximum degree of immateriality and of spirituality through the deification according to the grace, but still keeping the materiality and the sensitiveness according to the nature and all of them becoming environments of maximum transparency for the pneumatized soul, and for the Godhead. Like the man’s face and even his entire body are a spiritualized matter in comparison to the animals’ bodies, which are at their turn on a level of animated matter, in comparison to the minerals, likewise in the state of resurrection the entire world and the human bodies will reach a new and supreme level of solidarity. But it still remains matter, like a sheet of glass still remains a sheet of glass and the solar rays crossing through it receive through it a certain beauty and a new mode of becoming sensitive, given the glass’s capacity to become a special environment for conveying those rays. “For we will become like the angels, not by nature, but by worthiness” (Theophanes Kerameus, hom. 10, P.G., 132, col. 397). The transfigured matter, in the state of resurrection, it still remains matter.” (Stăniloae 1997: 264)

“If the world remains an object to us, it will be somewhat a world exterior to us, but which is consummated through works of art. The world will become - after the end of time, o. n. - of a great beauty, for it will be clean, for the corruptible bodies will no longer need the world for consumption and the people won’t fight one another, full of worries, in order to provide the necessary things out of world. Thus, the beauty conditions and expresses the highest revelation of the personal spirit, of the connection of the spirit with the reality in a communion with other subjects. As much clean spirit is in a song, in a poetry, as much beauty is in it and to this extent, it can become a soul’s content and it eases the intimate communion between persons. The new world won’t have anything within it from a simple exterior object, nothing imposed, nothing to incite to fight and lust, but it will be revealed as means of clean love and of God’s manifestation as Person, as means of communion between people and God and amongst people themselves, the world being fully assimilated subjectively and inter-personally in its pure beauty.” (Stăniloae 1997: 268)

After transfiguration (o. n.) “The entire world will be then a soul’s content in a great degree. By this the world will be eternally new. This is for on the measure we will increase in our capacity of knowing God, we will see increasingly more through the world’s beauty His richness and we will praise Him, knowing ourselves, in the same time, in the whole our undefined richness.” (Stăniloae 1997: 268)

“Unlike the present way of the world’s existence, which the divine light crosses with difficulty through, in order to give the things and the person from the world the brightness of the godlike beauty, the new world will be of a unimaginable beauty through the effect produced in it by the plentiful pouring in it of the godlike light. Everything will be of an untold beauty, for everything will have a deep spiritual signification and it will reflect clearly the infinite Spirit that will be crossing through everything. And that beauty, by being so obvious and ceaselessly new, it will be impossible not to be admired, song, a fact that will make the people then, as the angels too, to ceaselessly praise the Lord, the source of the beauty.” (Stăniloae 1997: 269)

“The world (after transfiguration, o. n.) will be thus a construction of objects, an ensemble of works of arts with a profound spiritual signification and richness, a ceaseless environment of revealing the spirit’s realities, towards communicating the spirituality which the world will be transparent to, it will be like a familiar expression of it, as a means and as a intimate content of his soul’s life, an intimate organ of his spiritual social life, of communion with God and with the fellow humans. Each one will spiritually fully absorb it within himself, and to each one it will be wholly consummately familiar and still inexhaustible, as environment of manifestation of the plenitude of the godlike Ghost. The world will be fully personal to each one, and it will be the common body of everybody; each one will inherit the whole earth. (...) The man’s spirit will no longer feel himself stranger to the seen world, for the seen world will be spiritualized and he won’t be perishable, but eternally in this world.” (Stăniloae 1997: 269-270)

“To the spirituality of this world (the world after transfiguration, o. n.) it belongs the incorruptibility too. The incorruptibility is also solidarity with the incorruptibility of the resurrected bodies. If the resurrected bodies do not eat and do not drink, if they do not receive and they do not eliminate any matter and therefore they aren’t corrupted, the substance of the world must be according to them. Saint Maximos the Confessor says that the present corruptibility of the substance is due to the sin. The world could have in the future life another form of existence and another movement. And the man cannot feed himself out of it otherwise then: he can feed himself with its irradiant and life-give energy. And the world’s life and the movement can be relentlessly revelator and helping to everybody’s increasing in communion. It is a life and a movement through which the world will remain the same, as it is shown by the song we sing, by the word we utter, but which become more intimate to us and reveal us other and other beauties and meanings, and they feed through their spiritual power not only our soul, but also our body too. There will be a movement on the spiritual vertical line, on the line of the spiritual convergences and of the increasingly full assimilation of the matter by the spirit. The undefined faces of the reality must not succeed to one another through the disappearance of other and other, but to coexist, by revealing in themselves other and other depths and complexity in order to be contemplated, towards interior common increasingly accentuated assimilation.” (Stăniloae 1997: 270-271)

“The resurrected bodies will be in solidarity with the renewed world. Methodius of Olympus put the bodies’ resurrection in solidarity with the renewal of the world, on the ground of the argument that God hasn’t created anything in vain. The bodies’ death and the end of the present way of existence of the creation, they are due to the sin which entered them, and their death has the purpose of cleaning the human body and the world’s substance of the callousness caused by sin, in order they to be brought back to existence clean and spiritualized, namely thinned.” (Stăniloae 1997: 271)

“Unlike the ones who were saying that the people will be like the angels and therefore they won’t receive again bodies, Methodius of Olympus mentions that God has a purpose when creating the people as people, and the angels like angels. It will be insulting to God, if we cogitate that God later changed his mind and He will transform the people in angels. Each of them will keep his place forever. Therefore, the people will resurrect with the body.” (Stăniloae 1997: 272)

“It is difficult to determine the way of existence of the new world, and it is even harder to determine the way of existence of the resurrected bodies. Saint Apostle Paul gives us only six general determinations of those bodies, opposed to other six determinations of the present bodies. If the bodies are now: weak, natural or psychic, corruptible, mortal, earthly, and covered in dishonor, those bodies will be: full of power, spiritual, incorruptible, heavenly, and dressed up in glory (1 Cor. 15: 42-52). But each one of these determinations comprises a richness of meanings difficult to determine in details.” (Stăniloae 1997: 272)

“The notion of “spiritual body” mustn’t be understood as a body having only the “form” from this life and not the substance too.” (Stăniloae 1997: 272)

“We must avoid accentuating too much the fact that the resurrected bodies cannot consist except of luminous, sonorous, odorant, caloric etc. manifestations. If that had been the case, they would have been totally mixed together. Each resurrected body has a specific unit, a unitary subsistence, though, on the other hand, they are neither totally juxtaposed nor totally separated as the bodies on earth. Its specific unit must correspond to the specific unit of the human body. This integral and specific unit of the body must be felt in any luminous or sonorous body's manifestations. Like each cell or limb remain irreducible in organism, but all of them are in an internal communion, so will be the bodies too." (Stăniloae 1997: 276-277)

"On one hand the bodies must be so united amongst them, so that each individual to experience the connection with everybody, to rejoice of everybody's life, knowledge, and happiness. But in the same time, each one must have the feeling that his body is different from the others, to taste the happiness of the whole in another manner than everybody, in own form, without being stranger to him the others' forms of tasting happiness. Also, each one must experience in the universal communion each other one as what that one is, not-confounded to others. The universal body cannot mean a sinking of the bodies in a one body. Even in this world there exists an interpenetration of the persons, but no one I confounded to another. I have my ontological definition, but I am not separated from other or from the world. I am in others and they are in me. Even in communion, the units interpenetrate one another. I am in the world, the world is in me, but I still remain myself. Even if it is used the expression of "universal body", in this "universal body" I will distinguish my body from the others' bodies and my unique body it different from the others'. Each person remains as uniquum not only in his soul, but also in his body, in the tightest communion. Where the beauty would have been, if each one had had everything as anyone?" (Stăniloae 1997: 277)

"Berdiaeff sees in the Kingdom of Heavens a becoming subjective of the objective. Florensky, on the opposite, he sees the Gehenna in a sinking into subjectivism, in an extreme weakening of the relation with the objective reality, as you. It seems that the truth is in a synthesis of these states and in this synthesis, it can be expressed too the relation amongst the resurrected bodies or between my personal body and the universal body. Everybody's bodies will be lives by each member of the Kingdom of Heavens as some contents of his, as united with his body, but not as identical to his body, and not as a universal own body distinctively. Each one by making subjective the reality of His fellow humans, he doesn't confound it with his own self. This is for in the same time in this universal body each one distinguishes his personal body, as the visible expression of his self, from the others' bodies, as expressions of the selves of some fellow humans in the supreme communion. This is the aspect of objectivity. There will be a consummation and a becoming universal, of the relation of love between me and you, in which, on one hand, each one feels himself as representing and carrying the dual dialogue, not existing but only as part of this whole, and on the other hand, he distinguishes his own self from the other's self, so that me and you remains me and you. The souls go still in this world further in their unification through love, than the bodies do. We feel the bodies not only like an environment for communication, but also as an obstacle in the way of the full unification. There it will be possible an equally tight union between bodies too, without the bodies losing their individual existence. There will be a union rather through irradiations, through energies, than through substance.” (Stăniloae 1997: 277-278)

“The future life will be an endless Sunday, or the retrieved Paradise, and the inaugurated eschatology, the moment of the aurora with its wonderful “suddenly” and the undying light of the eighth day which God will be everything in all the things in.” (Stăniloae 1997: 303)

“The end of the eternal life isn’t a simple turning back to the beginning, a coming back to a departure point where the temporal cycle can restart, but it is an advancing in the same infinite. It doesn’t mean advancing in a linear endless time, for it stays at the end of the time, but it means advancing in an always tasted infinity, which we will never have enough of. If the life is a movement, it won’t be a “transforming movement” of the beings, says Saint Maximos the Confessor, but it will be a stable movement or a mobile stability, a movement maintaining the creatures eternally in what they are and in the One Who is - in the same time strengthening the creatures and growing them up. This is for it is an unmediated movement around their first unmoving cause, which being imparted with, increasingly, with their cause, they aren’t being corrupted.” (Stăniloae 1997: 304)

“The basis of the future world, as established by Jesus into His Person through resurrection, it stays in connection with this world and it influences this world, preparing it for its entire transformation according to His form. The other world belongs to the present in Jesus Christ, presently hidden, but it is also a reality of the future. The eschatological reality is both present, like a parallel to the history and like a hidden force of the history, but it is also the future, having to begin in its unveiling and full manner, from the final end of the history. The present - but hidden eschatology -, it does not stay separated from the form of this world, but executes over it an attraction. This attraction has two aspects: through one aspect it makes us to feel ourselves close to it in the whole course of the historical life. It is like a light which accompanies us: to some people it is more powerful, more intuited, and to others it is lesser so. Through the other aspect of the attraction, the eschatology is shown to us like a zone which we can fully enter only at the end of the historical life. In fact, the contemporary eschatology of our historical life it is shown close to us only in order to determine us to prepare ourselves for truly finding it at the end of the historical path, which leads us to it not shorting the path with any costs, but by conceiving it like a fulfillment of a duty towards the fellow humans and towards the historical ensemble which we were placed into. The present eschatology is like a friend who makes himself felt from the other side of a wall, advising us to walk parallel to the wall towards the end of it, where we will find our friend and we will be able to embrace him.

Only in this way can be solved the dispute on the question if the eschatology is the parallel reality and opposed to the time, or it is final-historical¹³⁵.

¹³⁵ This dispute is characteristic to Protestantism, which oscillates between a rationalism according to which this world does not wait for anything, knowing only about the communication from history with some timeless values and between a tendency in the style of Luther, according to whom the man in the life from here he does not receive any divine grace, but he lives exclusively by the faith in the future receiving of the grace. Though extremely Lutheran, the dialectic theology has declared itself in favor of a parallel eschatology, and, R. Bultmann, a leading representative of this eschatology, says: "The waiting for a future end of the world in time, it belongs to the mythology" (Jesus, 1926, p. 53). See more details about this idea of Bultman at Paul Althaus, w. c. And for similar ideas, see the works of K. Barth, and also of Fritz Buri, Die Bedeutung der neutestamentlicher Eschatologie für die protestantische Theologie, 1935, p. 42-45. A more just position at the Protestants, in these regards, it presents Paul Althaus. Based on the first three editions of the work "Die letzten Dinge", published in 1922, 1924, 1926, Fr. Buri, w. c. p. 47, he declares the Paul Althaus eschatology analogue to the one of the dialectic theology - namely a timeless one and not a final temporal one. But into the fourth edition from 1933, P. Althaus explains his critics against the final temporal eschatology not in the sense that he does not admit the future life that follows to the present life, but his intention was only to revive the thoughts which were accustomed to consider that the end will not come until all the "signs" from the Apocalypse will be fulfilled, until the history will not be accomplished like an organism. He wanted to show that in the end of the history may come anytime, and how anytime it may come the end of the man, even he is not old. Like the New Testament communities were living with the thought that God will arrive soon, likewise we must live with this thought. ("Die Erwartung der Parusie hat die gleiche Aktualität wie die Erwartung des Todes. Auch in diesem konkreten Sinne, der ständigen Möglichkeit des Endes ist jede Zeit für uns, die wir sie erleben, letzte Zeit", w. c. fourth edition, p. 265). The „signs" which are weighted by the theology to calm down that the end in not close yet, are explained by Althaus like being determined by the events contemporary to the writer of the Apocalypse, though they can have a permanent-historical application. Look how Althaus interprets his position from the first two editions of the book, considered by the critics an opposition to the final-temporal eschatology: "In der Eschatologie die Aktualität der Enderwartung wieder zur Geltung zu bringen, die Eschatologie in diesen Sinne aus der Theorie wieder zur Theologie zu machen, ihr den theologischen Ernst zurückzugeben, war mein eigentliches Ziel von der ersten Auflage dieses Buches an, der eigentliche Sinn, meines Kampfes gegen die endgeschichtliche Eschatologie", p. 267. He highlights in a more accentuated manner the present reality of the eschatology – based on resurrection – and, in the same time, its character of final target which the world is attracted towards, Walter Küneth, in his work "Theologie der Auferstehung", München, 1935. "Into the resurrected Lord it is put the beginning of the eon of the resurrection and, through this, the ultimate and eternal reality takes its beginning. Into resurrected Christ is comprised in advance the entire existence of the new eon, the resurrection of Jesus is an anticipation of the new world of God. Through these, the resurrection of Jesus gains the character of a crossroads of the times, but thereby the old eon is still there when the new eon begins... From this beginning of the new eon in the resurrection of Jesus, it does not result the abolishment of the old one, but there is a relation of opposition and inwardness of them (das Verhältnis eines Gegeneinander und Ineinander der beiden Aeonen", p. 242-245). The eon of the resurrection – like anticipation – is, according to Küneth, so much hidden, then there is not any continuity between him and the old one from the surface. It is not hidden in the sense that we do not even know about it, but beyond the knowledge about it through faith, it does not leak anything from it upon us, over the old eon, which our being is constituted of. (Beide Aeonen stehen in dem Verhältnis der Gegenwärtigkeit in Gleichzeitigkeit in zeitlicher Beziehung, sachlich gesehen aber in dem Verhältnis des Widerstreites. Der alte Aeon ist die sichtbare und gegenständliche Existenzweise, der Auferstehungsaeon dagegen die unsichtbare und nichtgegenständliche Wirklichkeit", p. 245 – 246). But this news about the hidden eon of the resurrection we cannot have it except through a divine grace which comes from it. Consequently, there is a certain communication between the new eon and our world. This communication has, of course, some limits. This eon cannot pass through gradual evolution into the next one. Until the catastrophe of the end, it remains inapt to transform itself into the other one. The power which descends from the eon of the resurrection it does not totally change this perishable world

The influence of the present eschatology over us it does not want to get us out from history, by calling us to retreat, like through reflux, from our historical life, to its bosom, into a state of contemplation. The present eschatology, a contrary, it compels us to walk the path to the end with fidelity and conscientiousness.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“But to the eternal life of the happy communion with God would be partakers only the ones that have become capable of it, through faith and the love for God and for the people, during their life from here.

Only in association with this faith and by serving it, the culture has served to the illumination of the deepest mysteries of the existence. Without faith and love, the culture is blind and blind are they who pass away only with the culture from the life from here.

After these considerations it is now the moment to ask ourselves: when the history will come to an end? There may not be about a determination of the moment which the history will end in, because this must remain hidden to the man, but there may be a clarification of the way which the history will fulfill its role in. Of course, God could put an end to the history anytime He wants, without waiting for a fulfillment of the history’s meaning, but for God, usually, He makes the work of His will to appear also like an effect of the natural development of the human works, the end of the history is most probable to means also an end of history’s possibilities. It is, so, to believe that the history would end when the living into it would have nothing more to offer, either because there will have been exhausted all the possibilities of multiplication of the knowledge of the world and of increasingly noble behavior of the man in this limited framework, or because of, through increasingly terrible sinful decay of the most people, the order could not be reestablished, and an even more prolonged disorder will make impossible the continuation of such a progress.

and the perishable body, in a gradual way, into an incorruptible order. The bodily corruption is the frame which power which comes to us from that order must work into. But into this frame it can be accomplished a huge spiritual-ethical progresses on this earth. The history would be dispossessed of any tension if there wasn’t this possibility of individual and collective spiritual progress in its frame. The earthly destiny of every individual could be considered fulfilled from the moment in which he has had the possibility to decide for faith or for faithlessness. The history is transformed in a static figuration, in this Protestant conception, despite its unrestrained tension for ever higher targets. But into the range of this eon it is never possible to reach an absolutely perfect target, namely the quietude. This world without tension it cannot be cogitated. And this means a permanent relativity. It means that through this world it is not possible to arrive where it tends. The passing in the perfect eon it cannot be but the work of God, not that of an evolution full of efforts, what does not mean, though, that this has not its importance. Walter Küneth is right when he affirms that the end of this world and the showing of the other one, it will not happen in the actual form of the time, but he is also not right, when he considers that in our world it does not exist an effort towards that perfection, helped by the powers which descends from the hidden eon of the present resurrection of Jesus Christ.

The big and the small Apocalypse, like also the experience, until now, of the mankind, they plead for an interweaving of these two cases, in the sense that during the passing of the time, the fight between Christ and Satan and between the disciples of the First One and the servants of the last one, it will increasingly radical, increasingly bitter, until it will be decided in favor of Jesus Christ¹³⁶.

Of course, the history does not pass in a continuous way into eschatology. "The eschatology supposes an interruption, a transcendental - into this stays the idea of the end. Though, according to the evangelical Apocalypse, like also to the Apocalypse of John, the world must become ripe for the end and the history ends inwardly, when the history will have fulfilled its work"¹³⁷. The end does not come like a Deus ex machina. "But the work of the history it is not only an algebraic sum of an endless string of works of the persons isolated into their random chaos, but a positive whole, enchained after an organic law and this law is Christ, "(1Co:8:6) (...) by whom are all things, and we by him". In the other words, the history of the mankind after the embodiment, with all the fervor of the fight between the light and the darkness, between the Christianity and the Anti-Christianity, with all its though dialectical antithesis, it is worked the work of Jesus and are lost the ones who, with their attention absorbed only by the singular moments of the historical tragedy, but its antagonisms, they see it in its totality only under the appearance of Antichrist, of general decay and depravation, reducing it, if not at a zero, to a negative measurement. In any case, not this is the content of the Apocalypse with its figures about the tragic antagonism, but also the victories and the establishing of Christ like a ruler on earth, after the first resurrection, like also the descending of the heavenly fortress at the end"¹³⁸." (Stăniloae 1993)

¹³⁶ To be seen in Fr. Buri, w. c. p. 84-5 similar ideas about the progress of the world in good, but also about the intensity of the parallel growth of the bad, in the so-called theory of the history of salvation (Heilgeschichte), represented by M. Kähler, A. Schlatter and W. Koepp. The work of H. W. Schmidt, Zeit und Ewigkeit, it is an attempt to theologically – systematically establish this conception and to philosophically demonstrate the possibility of the passing of the time into eternity (die Möglichkeit eines Übergangs der Zeit in die Ewigkeit resp. des Eintritts des Ewigen in die Zeit). "Die Halbzeitlichkeit der abgefallenen und sündigen Kreatur mündet Kraft Gottes wundermächtiger Gegenwart ein in die Herzlichkeit der Vollzeitlichkeit", says Schmidt, p. 309 or: „das Heilsgeschichte besteht darin dass Göttlich-Vollzeitlichkeit immer mehr die verhüllenden Momente seiner Offenbarung ausscheidet, bis zuletzt mit der Parusie des Christus das zeit-immanente Ewige alle Zurückhaltung innerhalb des Offenbarungsvollzugs fallen lässt und sein ungebrochenes Wesen eideutig veranschaulicht“, p. 321.

¹³⁷ S. Bulgakov, p. 461.

¹³⁸ S. Bulgakov, p. c.

Evil

“The Christian explanation of the evil it is the only one which doesn’t tie the evil to the essence of the reality, to the essence of the eternal reality, or to the reality created by God, while still taking the evil seriously. And the Christian explanation of the evil is the only one saving the existence itself of the liberty in the reality of the existence. Any other explanation compromises irremediably the existence, and it denies the freedom, namely the human dignity itself. If the evil had been created by God, the evil would have been tied to the essence of God and to the essence of the creation, as it would have been eternally tied to existence.” (2003: 471)

“On the other hand, neither the existence of the evil from the world and from within man couldn’t be explained only through the human freedom. If we want an explanation which takes in consideration the size of the evil, but it doesn’t see the evil as an attribute of the reality which overwhelms any hope of the man to get rid of evil through freedom, we will have to admit as supplementary origin of the evil the freedom of some spirit which are more powerful than the human spirit is, capable of a much bigger evil; though, not an origin of the evil in the freedom of the divine almighty spirit, because of this would make impossible the salvation of the world from evil and God would no longer be God.” (2003: 471-472)

“Although there are some people who succeed not to be subjects of the evil, actually, many people remain subjects of the evil. It seems to us an incontestable fact that this evil it is bigger than the sum of the evil things the people do to one another, that there are some amplifiers above the people, which amplify the evil committed by people on such a measure than the people cannot get rid of evil only by themselves. The threads of evil which tie the people to one another are twisted and thickened to composing a complex of connections which is impossible to undone.” (2003: 472)

“The evil manifests proportions and powers which cannot be explained only by our freedom. But, on the other hand, the man can keep the evil under control, and the man can be delivered from evil almost entirely, as subject who commits the evil, but not only through his own efforts, but through his efforts helped by the power of God. So, the evil isn’t undefeatable by man, in his quality of evil doer subject.” (2003: 472).

“As long as he is mastered by evil, the man almost always still preserves in himself remnants of good, which exist against evil, and powers to turn back towards good, powers of restraining the evil and of repenting for committing it. The Christian faith considers that only the demonic ghosts no longer preserve within them any remnant of good. The evil has become to them a “second nature”. But even the evil caused by the more powerful ghosts, it still appears as having its origin in their freedom, and not in their being, the evil being relentlessly consented to by the evil ghosts' freedom. But this lets us understand that, even if all the people had ceased to be subjects of the evil, the evil would have still blown upon their life from other voluntarily sources, from above the people. But the people's possibility to be set free from their quality of subjects of the evil, it shows, in the same time, that the evil they people would suffer it doesn't belong to the essence of the reality, but it comes from the freedom of a more powerful beings." (2003: 473)

"Just by the fact the evil doesn't belong to the essence of the reality, to ens, or to the essence of a part of the reality (a fact that, actually, it would have irremediably compromised the whole reality, for it is impossible to separate a part of the reality from another), it is proven as not lasting from eternity and as having within it a certain weakness." (2003: 473)

"The evil that hurts and that torment the most, it is the evil a person produces it through his freedom. The physical evil, or the evil committed unintentionally, it doesn't hurt so much the one who suffers that evil, as it torments on somebody the evil somebody commits it still being aware he could avoid doing it. The evil as physical fatality (death, illness, disasters), or as product of some superior forces, or a consequence of the committed evil, it can sustain a sentiment of the tragic and it can be endured like a cross, with a patience that spiritually fortifies and that is savior. Only the evil intentionally done by a person, it causes within the one who suffers it a moral pain, a sentiment of injustice, of misunderstanding, and in the doer that evil it causes the torments of the regrets, or a moral alteration when these torments are absent." (2003: 473)

"The Christian teaching says that the evil, in its proportion that is biggest than the one explainable through the human freedom, it has its origin in the free decision of some created spirits which were good in the beginning." (2003: 473)

"Explaining the evil through the personal freedom it expresses only one of the evil's aspects and not the other one too, which is stronger after the evil had been installed into existence." (2003: 473)

"The evil isn't only a lacking of content act of the freedom, but it is also an act the content of which it consists in a use of the powers of the human nature but in a manner opposite to this nature." (2003: 473)

"The evil means also a minus in existence, a minus that continuously grows up. Seeing this, the Holy Fathers said the evil is a non-existence (μη ον), or that it is an existence without consistency. The evil isn't a total absence of existence, but it is a blunting, it is an essential weakening of the existence, a depriving of the existence of what truly constitutes the support of the existence (to ov). By this, the evil that entered the existence, it distorts the being and thus it weakens the existence. Though, this distorting and this weakening it has its origin in freedom, and the duration of it is has its origin in consenting to the freedom. The evil isn't installed within being without freedom and it is not maintained without the consent of the being. Through will, the being can be healed, but only through the will helped by the grace of God, which is an act of His will, having its source in His being, and which cannot be crooked or weakened." (2003: 474)

"The crookedness and the weakening of the human nature it is shown in the passions caused by the acts contrary to the good, namely contrary to God. These passions master upon the man, they show a weakened nature, in which are moving impulses, which the man cannot keep them under control. This is the result of the evil. The devil has too, such a passion. That passion is not a bodily one, but it is a purely spiritual passion. It is in the beginning the passion of the pride, and then of the hatred towards God and towards the people." (2003: 474)

"The paradox of the evil consists on one hand in the fierceness of these passions, and on the other hand, it consists in the weakness of the one who is mastered by these passions. He cannot get rid of these passions, of their force. The devil cannot get rid by any means, while the man can get rid by the help of the godlike grace. It is about a strange mix of weakness and of the will of remaining in that weakness. And the weakness has in it a mix of violence. The weakness it consists in the fact that the one enslaved to it, he cannot get rid of his passions, he no longer has the power to work differently. The envious cannot get rid of envy, and he cannot see what it is good in the envied one. The evil is a violent helplessness, or it is a helplessness of the violence, unsure of existence." (2003: 474-475)

"The evil is violent not in building up the existence, but in diminishing it and in destroying it; this is the violence of the helplessness of strengthening in existence, the violence of the greediness of strengthening on account of others. It is a reality's avalanche of collapsing towards nothing by wrongly searching for its enriching; it is the violence of a reality which wants to keep itself in existence but without God, the source of the existence, and without the voluntary and loving contribution of the others, which he doesn't ask for because of his pride. But the collapse has its cause in the free will and it is sustained by it." (2003: 476)

"The pride explains the rebellion and the disobedience of the fallen angels. But the rebellion and the disobedience imply the previous condition of a state of subordination and the refusal to remain in that subordination.

Thus, a further explanation of the evil it consists in the will of some created spirits, inferior to God, to upraise above this condition of theirs, and therefore in a tendency of theirs, to be by essence more than they actually are. In this it consists the positive force manifested in evil: in the tendency seeded by God Himself in the spirits inferior to Him, to elevate themselves upper than they are. The evil stays not in the actualization of this impulse, but in its wrong actualization. They wanted to become like God, namely source of the existence, but without developing themselves in connection with the source of the existence, namely not through God, not in connection with God, but without God, by themselves, in an independent manner. But just by doing that, they get out from the communion with the sole source of the existence.” (2003: 476-477)

“Christ came for the people, through Him, “life to have and plentifully to have it” (Jn. 10: 10). All over the New Testament it is accentuated the fact that the people have life and they are called to life ‘in Christ’. So, God wants to satisfy the thirst for life and for increasingly more life of the created spirits. But the evil ghosts and the people have fallen off this life, by wanting to satisfy this thirst outside God. In this it stays the positive force of the evil but also its weakness.” (2003: 477)

“If the evil had been existentially tied to the body and to the world, the embodiment of the Son of God would have been meaningless. Likewise, if the man had been irremediably taken in master by evil. Only for the evil hadn’t been essentially tied to the man and to the world – and for the evil hadn’t been produced out of exclusive initiative of the man, who wasn’t only author of the evil, but also a passive victim of the evil, and who protested by what had remained good in him, relentlessly, against the evil he is attracted to -, the Son of Man embodied Himself having the power to break just through the body the devil’s things (1 Jn. 3: 8).” (2003: 485)

“The evil cannot conquer by itself. The evil adorns itself with the flower of the good. The man preserves in himself an indelible remnant of the good. The man must deceive himself with the opinion that the sin he is being committing it is justified by the good. The evil is ambiguous because of the helplessness of standing by itself. From here comes also the perversity any tempter must employ in order to convince somebody to do the proposed evil, by presenting that evil as being good. Of course, the one who lets himself to be deceived he preserves in his deceit a dose or lack of sincerity. He consents to be deceived and he realizes that he is being deceived. But the need to deceive himself it is a minimum good remained within him, like some sort of shaky bridge, the evil enters by using it. Without this, the evil cannot enter him.” (2003: 491)

“The evil offers sweetness or an initial good, but it shows its destructive effect in the end. The devil doesn’t need to deceive the man too much regarding the beginning because of the beginning is conqueror by itself. The devil needs to appease the man’s soul against fearing the end, or against the consequences of the evil deed. As long as the voice of God, which was resounding in the profound and sincere conscience of the woman, it tells her: ‘If you eat from the tree, you will die with death’ and she opposes this fear to the tempting whisper of the snake, the snake keeps telling her, by deceiving her: ‘You won’t die, but you will be like God’, and then the snake strengthens this appeasing, concerning the end of the evil deed, by showing her the initial sweetness.” (2003: 492)

“According to the interpretations of the Holy Fathers, the knowledge of the good and of the bad, achieved by joining the activity of the senses with the sensitive aspect of the world, it consists in a knowledge of the passions born within man, and according to the special interpretation of Saint Basil, it also consists in the fight against these passions. By and large, out of the patristic interpretation it turns out that, by falling, the man was given the knowledge of the evil within himself, but the man hasn’t been totally overwhelmed by evil but he preserved a position against the evil too, but without succeeding in bringing this fight to the victorious end.” (2003: 493)

“Although understood as some people’s entering the communion with God, by His will, or as some other people’s lack of entering this communion because of their refusal, for God doesn’t behave totally passively, the divine judgment is necessary in order to specify the more of the creatures’ eternal life. Through such a judgment it is highlighted God’s character as Person, but also His interest in people. Besides this, it is highlighted a supreme criterion of the good and of the bad. This criterion is God Himself and He is also the supreme instance deciding between good and bad. One can no longer know what is good and what is bad, and there is no a last instance deciding in this regard. The supreme criterion of the good it cannot be known except by the One Who is the Good Himself. He is the supreme Person, as last source of the life.” (Stăniloae 1997: 175)

“Only if the dark has been totally or partially scattered by light, we will realize that the dark doesn’t mean a permanent state, and that our target is and it has been the light, and only then we will be penetrated by all the evil of the darkness.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“To be bad and to do the evil are again a state of interpersonal relation. It is the noncompliance not with an impersonal law, but with what fits to other persons and, in the last analyze, to what fits God, not in an arbitrary way, but according to the indication of His being. To be bad and to do the evil it means to have not love towards the other, to not see the other one, not to promote through your love the growth of his subject, it means to see and to be preoccupied only with yourself, and not to search for the true communion.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Who doesn’t feel the chocking and the overwhelming which sometimes the dominion of the evil actualizes with, upon him, or into the almost permanent blemish which flows his life of thoughts, words and acts in, and that there is no bigger evil than the one which can start from his individual hypostasis, or that this hypostasis is the instrument or the environment of manifestation of a power of the evil greater than his spiritual power? Here it is the sin which resides in a nature which everybody possesses, in solidarity with all the people. The own sinful deed adds a personal index, but the overwhelming fund is the common sin, called hereditary. Through each man, not only that human individual offends God, but He is offended by the entire mankind. This happened also through the Adam’s sin. His mutiny was an act of personal will, but its first birth has produced a sinful force which exceeded a personal will, by infecting the human nature’s entire extent, which is no longer of a single person. This universal-human effect of an act of personal will, it cannot be understood otherwise than as not being an act created the general-human force of the sin, but it stood at the door, like an extra-human force, which the act of personal will just opened the gates to, in order to invade inside. The will of the first man played a decisive role, but not because had had the power to create the sinfulness of the whole mankind, but because, by staying under the pressure of a superhuman force, and by being possible to surrender or to resist, he yielded himself and, through this, he gave the pus way inside to, into the human nature’s content. The voluntarily sinful acts of the other people do not bring an effective multiplication of the mankind’s sinful background, so they have not a decisive role like that of the first man.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The ocean of evil circulates freely into the content of the human nature, due to the breach caused by the yielding of the first man. Revealing to each human person it is not the sum of sins of the forefathers, but the background of sins which has dwelt into the general-human nature through the transgression of the first man, and which manifests through the sinful acts of everybody. This extra-human force, which pressed tempting over the will of the first man and which, through the first yielding, it has dwelt and it moves into the entire human nature, by being more powerful than the whole the human will together, it must be borne by a hypostasis on the measure of the supra-human intensity of the evil which spreads it. It happens us often to feel the generous and confident impulses of the soul, broken by an unseen influence, later identified into a person who stalks us from shadow, with enmity, with hate, and with envy. The influence in good and in bad it is conveyed from distance, not only through eyes and speech, but also through the concentrated thought, through the simple presence, more or less hidden to the bodily sight. In fact, we feel the force of the evil in each of us, like it could not come, in final analyze, from the human nature, which wants so much the good, but from a foreign source and as having a more powerful intensity than the human nature can give to it. The irrational sinful will, against all the argument and all the evidences which plead within us in favor of for the good, it cannot be explained otherwise but like coming from a foreign abyss, from reasons which are foreign to us, which we cannot understand, which are not ours.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The evil manifested through the man’s will it is more intense than the one which the man would have been capable of doing and the restoration of his divine majesty must be equivalent to the whole this objective evil, but the man, thought, he can be saved, because of this giant evil, although impropriated and done through his will, it is not due only to him. The man must see the authority of God reestablished in report with the entire offence which was brought to God, even if this is not exclusively the product of his will, and the nature must be purified. It is needed a sufferance which to be able to remove, from the entire human nature, a supra-human evil; it is needed a sufferance which to defeat the satanic evil, by expelling him from the human nature and by restoring the good in the human nature.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The evil without the possibility to work for conquering new victims, the evil reduced to himself, it includes the supreme unhappiness in this. The evil individual, as long as he is still free in his movements, he soothes his internal disgust and his loathing through the illusion that he has work to do, through the pleasure to corrupt what is still good, through the hope that he will have work to do continuously and he will gain domination upon others, maybe upon all of them. But when this possibility is cut off, and the obduracy in this state is definitive, the unhappiness reaches degrees which we could not even imagine. While it still has power, the evil get himself drunk with a certain satisfaction. The evil remains helpless, definitively helpless - it is the supreme unhappiness.

To the question how Jesus Christ defeats the evil at the end, how He stops the evil to activate any longer and surrounds him? we have not to expect the answer that through an angry expedition of His, at the ultimate end of the patience.

The evil is defeated through the showing of Jesus into His godlike glory, after His believers will have resisted all the devilish efforts to conquered them and after the adherents of the Satan will have cut all the possibilities of shaking off of their master. And the victory means the definitive separation of the evil ones from the good ones, and the banishing of the evil ones from any domain over which they could apply their plans and their works of conquering.

They are banished away from the creation of God. The fact that the Holy Scripture describes the eternal place of the sinful ones like a (Apoc. 20: 10; 14: 15; 2. Pt. 2: 17) "lake of fire", like a "(Mt. 13: 50) (...) the furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth", like the (Mt. 22: 13) (...) outer darkness", and the happy fate of the righteous ones whom He brings in connection with a new heaven and a new earth, born after this world will be burned, all these make us to believe that the condemned ones will be removed from the ensemble of the creation, thrown far away from it, outside. They would be unable to enjoy anything, from what is outside of the emptiness of from within them.

All the relation between them and the great order of the creation will be broken. The Universe, into a new form, it remains like ground and like reason for joy, to the righteous ones.

The darkness is the layer of opacity which is laid between the sinful ones and everything that exists outside them. They won't be able to see anything, and the sight is the first condition of communication with something.

The evil ones will not be able to plan anything against God. They will burn eternally into the furnace of fire, being subjected to the endless burning of the fire from inside themselves, which is not something else but the evil which, by no longer being able to spread it over the world of God, it endlessly torments them. The condemned ones will wail and gnash their teeth, not because of regret - because they no longer have the power of repentance - but, on one hand, because of the torment they endure, and on the other hand, because of the spite not to be able to do any evil anymore. It is the wriggling of the enchained evil.

In his way, not the righteous ones are removed like an exception from the ensemble of the creation of God, but the ones who have made themselves the tolls of the Satan.

These ones, through the nature of the evil from them, they put the distance of the egotism between them and the reality. The communion appears like an appanage of the good. There will be the final state of full closing into their own isolation, into the horror of the total and irremediable loneliness, which is not something else but the state of completion of the evil from within them.

The creation will be saved, in this way, into a new form, which will be not something else but its state of consummate union with the Creator." (Stăniloae 1993)

“Even the devil’s existence as existence is a value too, in its quality as gift from God - daringly said Saint John Damascene.” (Stăniloae 1997: 181)

“The demons are not so much witnesses, as they are bitter accusers, exaggerating the mistakes done by the deceased one, whether those mistakes aren’t so grave, and they feel that he may escape them. But just by increasing the soul’s fear, they make him to hope entirely in Christ. Therefore, from a point of view, the result of their accusation it turns towards good. This is for they are quickly banished away from the soul who hopes in Christ, by the good angels which straighten the soul’s conscience and give him courage. The demons do this on the ground of carefully and greedily recording all the evil deeds and thoughts of the people whom they tempt, and they follow these from the sky they invisibly fill up, according to the word of Saint Paul (Ephes. 2: 2; 6: 12). This is for, as there is no material void in creation, likewise there is no void of spiritual forces and of their action either they are good or evil. The demons aren’t either on the plan of the divine transcendence nor in the human and material reality, but between those ones.” (Stăniloae 1997: 195-196)

“The demons, from this intermediary plan, they try to get us out from our concrete reality, but in the same time they try to impede us to unite ourselves with the godlike reality. They are creators of confusions, through unreal, disordered, and liar constructions; they are our tempters, through the phantasmagorical world of some images they make exaggeratedly attractive or repulsive, or of some deceiving abstractions. They try to get us out of the state of watchfulness, by deceiving us with attractive images, with dreams, and with baseless hopes, by engaging us in insane actions. Without unveiling the mysterious but real depth of the things, and the difficult to obtain good results consequently to our endeavors, they dress up the things and the persons in superficial tempting beauties, or in exaggerated unpleasant abominations, while they promise facile successes to our reckless and venturesome actions. They attract us on the plan of the inconsistent, fickle, and phantasmagorical “sky”, in order us to get out from the solid reality and from the narrow paths of the tiresome climbing towards the true good, which is the communion with God as supreme person and with our fellow humans. They are the enemies of the seriousness and of the responsibility, by deceiving us with everything that is pleasure, fun, facile success, and superficial thinking. They are our unseen leaders on the facile sliding of the falling from the humanity which must be maintained and developed through watchfulness and relentless tiredness. Like they fell from the true height of angels, likewise they aim to lower us from the true humanity, or to impede us from accomplishing the true humanity, thus impeding the God's great plan of the creation and of the salvation.”

(Stăniloae 1997: 196)

Evolution / Progress

“God, in His action of making us consummate, He orients Himself also according to the new circumstances we are living in, and this interminable action itself it is understood always under new aspects by us.” (Stăniloae 2003: 95)

“The Christendom cannot be useful to any historical period - therefore neither to the present time - if it won't bring to that time something that only the Christendom can bring: the connection with the infinite source of power of God become man. Only thus the Christendom can help the progress, through a relentless spiritualization. We, the today's theologians, we can and we owe to reveal more than it was done in the past, the Christian humanist contribution of the main act of the Revelation that culminates in Christ - as the Embodiment of the Son of God, His sacrifice on the Cross, His Resurrection and His Ascent as man - with the consequences coming out of them for the serving of the progress and for the spiritualization in general. This is the positive meaning of the opening of the theology towards world, but by remaining faithful to itself: to pay all the attention to saeculum, in the sense of recognizing the consistence and the value of the world, and of the help the theology must provide it to the world towards a true development of what constitutes the true Christian humanity. The dogmas of the embodiment, of the resurrection, of the deification, all of them have a great contribution to this progress of the human in its authenticity.”

“A Christian theology that is a complete one and it is open to a true progress, it must be animated, of course, also by the hope of the eschatological future, but this hope and this perspective are upheld by the present experience of a continuous progress in spiritualization and in bettering the loving relationships amongst people. Towards the future one advances through the present spiritual progress, out of the pure source put at the foundation by the Revelation culminating in Christ, realized to thousand years ago, as we are assured by the biblical documents and by the witness of the Christian centuries until today.”

“The theology must be anchored in the unchanged foundation laid by Christ, but in the same time the theology makes accessible the good things of Christ, to the today's people, and it prepares these people for the full participation to the good things of Christ in the future age, constituting by this a ferment of the progress during each period of time.”

“The progress takes the shape of accentuating more, once an aspect, and then another aspect, from the inexhaustible richness of the dogmas, according to the preoccupations and to the spiritual age the believers of that time they have. But this more strongly accentuated aspect opens the increased understanding of the whole content of the dogmas and it promises a future advancing in understanding that content.”

“The theology is progress promoter, helping the spiritual progress of the Christian mankind towards the eschatological universal and consummate communion.”

“The Orthodox Churches always upheld the progress aspirations of the peoples. In the Christian East it has been highlighted the idea of an energetic and giver God Who communicates to the people increasingly higher energies on the measure of their growing up, in order to bring them to always higher stages, therefore to the benefit of the world and in order to lead the world towards consummation.”

“The conception about the knowledge through union and about our progress in knowledge as progress in union, it is solidary with the understanding of the time as road to eternity, towards the union with God in love. The progress in the love of God it is the progress in the union with Him, and this is the progress in knowing God and in knowing the creatures, to fully knowing them in the full union and love, which is equivalent to the “eternal life” (Jn. 3: 16).”

“In addition to this, the relations with each person bring to the man always new problems to be solved; the relations with the fellow humans create always new social situations, always new problems in the reports with the nature. The human nature couldn't have reached the consummation, if hadn't subsisted in various hypostases. The endless progress it is accomplished by the human nature - both in knowledge and in responsibility - in the endlessly various relations amongst the many hypostases of this nature.” (2003: 421-422)

“This work of God is related to the category of the ‘new’ by excellence: ‘Behold, I make all the things new’ (Rev. 21: 5). This is the final perspective God opens it to us. But for this final novelty, the people must become new since now (Ephes. 4: 24; 2 Cor. 5: 17; Gal. 6: 15). Not only at the end all the things will be made new, but since the first coming of Christ (2 Cor. 5: 17). And this isn't a novelty that becomes old, but one we must walk and increase ourselves within. ‘For us also to walk in the renewal of the life, or to serve in the renewal of the ghost, and not in the oldness of the letter (Rom. 6: 4; 7: 6). Walking ‘in the renewal of the life’, or ‘in the renewal of the ghost’ it means to be always open to the new. For ‘the ghost’ is always alive, namely He doesn't remain the same. This is the ‘stability’ in the movement of the ascension, of which speaks Saint Gregory of Nyssa, stability that is in the same time movement, and without which the human being no longer remains in continuous novelty, and by this the human being falls.” (2003: 514)

“The law is the repetition, according to an external norm, in the monotonous horizon closed by egotism and by death. Walking into ‘the renewal of the life’ it means living above repetition, by gradually passing the good and the love and the knowledge from a stage to a superior one, as Saint Gregory of Nyssa says. God is the relativity of any reached stage, or any obtained result. Each reached state is only a stage towards a higher state. ‘Sharing the freedom’ is above any stage one can reach. We advance towards that freedom, by always being free of any reached stage.” (2003: 515)

“God opposes to the absolutization of any reached inter-human structure and state. God manifests His efficiency in maintaining the spiritual horizon of the human being free of any degree or form of reached inter-human structure and relation; God manifests His efficiency in the impulse given to our nature in order to find the ways leading towards always better inter-human relations, towards the target of a humanity of maximum height, indefinable in advance.” (2003: 515-516)

“It seems that the world in general it will follow, from the point of view of the social structures and of the intellectual-scientific development, a progress line. And the opinion of the majority of the more recent theologians is that the Christendom mustn’t oppose this progress, but to support it, for this progress can be also the basis of a spiritual progress.” (Stăniloae 1997: 255)

“It has been affirmed that there does not exist a spiritual progress of the mankind, because each time discovers another aspect of the reality only by sacrificing the previous spirituality. The mankind has not discovered yet the mechanical order of the Universe with all its laws, but by losing its capacity to see that in the Universe there isn’t only a mechanical order, but there are also a biological one and another spiritual, which obey other laws¹³⁹. But, even if the line of the progress is not continuous and it is not inscribed its route – somehow phyllo-genetic – in all the consciences, there still exists a progress. After the past mechanistic époque, we stay at the beginning of one which seems to have the capacity to synthesize the mechanistic perspective with the biologic and spiritual ones.

Any vision about the world from the past times it determines or it enters, like a wider synthesis, the future visions, even if not in the immediately following époque.

¹³⁹ Professor PhD medic K. v. Neergards, Die Aufgabe des 20 Jahrhunderts, Erlenbach-Zürich, Eugen Rentsch Verlag, 1940.

Even more, any individual icon about the world it influences the icons of the fellow humans, which, at their turn, they influence mine.

The vision of the world and of the life it depends on the perspective which we are placed everyone into, according to the time, the place, and the spiritual-bodily configuration¹⁴⁰. This vision is modified with every new element of knowledge, of experience, and of absorption of other visions. My spiritual contents are differently ordered, there are established amongst them new relations, it is widened the horizon in total, another point reaches to the center, a new light falls on more peripheral corners and its rays modify the sight of the whole¹⁴¹. Each of these individual and collective visions, which are modified in time, it comprises an aspect of the world, by understanding the world not like an objective reality, like it isn't possible to be, but like a relation between me, the world, and the fellow human creatures.

Each of them comprises a truth and, because that truth determines the future ones and it is absorbed itself into those ones, the form of the world becomes increasingly adequate to the complex reality, which through this it is also created further more. If after a time a vision seems not to be true anymore, not to forget that it has conditioned the new truth or it has been absorbed itself into this new truth. Every man left a trace in the big drawing which is being built by the entire mankind, respectively in the common endeavor to get closer, through knowledge, to the real world, but also to bring further the world's creation¹⁴².

¹⁴⁰ Karl Heim, in Glaubensgewissheit 1923 and Glaube und Denken, 1934, vol. I, p. 90, and the followings, taking into account also the theory of the relativity, he considers that any face of the world depends on a "centre of perspective" (perspektivistische Mitte), which is not anything else but the "self" which is always into a point of the space and of the time (even if it seems to him that does not change the space, he still changes it, because also the space flows with the time, forming with the time and with the contents from them a whole in continuous development, according to the theory of relativity).

¹⁴¹ Louis Lavelle, De l'Acte, p. 46, "Et tout résultat nouveau que j'obtiens change tous les autres, j'obtiens des rapprochements imprévus. In n'y a pas jusqu'à mon point de départ même qui me paraisse chaque fois nouveau. Dès lors il est impossible que mes connaissances puissent s'accroître régulièrement selon une droite; elles forment au contraire une solidarité selon une droite elles forment au contraire une solidarité circulaire qui ne comporte aucune commencement". According to Simon Frank, any new determinant from the unity of the Whole determines more exactly the contents determined earlier, because the determination of a content constitute into the establishing of the reports with as many as possible parts from the One, who we know in different degrees in each moment (La connaissance et l'être, Paris, Aubier, p. 207).

¹⁴² Louis Lavelle, w. c. p. 43 : "Ma vie trace en lui (dans l'univers) un sillon qui est nouveau par rapport à moi, mais qui este éternel par rapport à lui". "Car, par rapport au système, tout être qui vie a une position unique a privilégiée, de telle sorte que sa perspective sur le monde ne vaut que pour lui seul: elle est, dansé un système qui n'est connu que de lui. D'autre part, son existence tout entière, e une suite de rencontres; mais chaque rencontre este transformée pour lui en occasion, de telle sorte que le monde reçoit pour lui une signification spirituelle et personnelle que le système même ne réussira point à traduire... C'est a dire que, si nous restons toujours in contact avec le réel, nous découvrons successivement des vérités qui s'ajoutent. Ainsi doit se former sans que l'on ait voulu un système qui este celui des choses elles-mêmes... ", p. 47.

But the report of the individual man with the world it has no other goal, but to accomplish him. In this way, every one transmitting his perspective to another one, he contributes also to the accomplishment of that one.

The perspective of everyone gets richer with the perspective of everybody. All the consciences grow up solidary, and increase the knowledge of the creation, and the creation itself, in solidarity¹⁴³.

Behold another reason why every individual will be held accountable, at the final judgment, for the development of the entire mankind. This responsibility for the whole, we feel it, otherwise, each of us, in the bosom of our conscience¹⁴⁴.

But in this process of consciences' growing up, by the widening and deepening the perspectives upon the life and by multiplying the creation, the central factor is the divine Revelation. At its light it is being clarified the existence, and its truth is being verified and deepened by the endeavors of the knowledge of the mankind. The Revelation is the main factor that urges the consciences towards the continuation of the creation of the world on the ascendant line, indicated by its sense, for it determines the people to a noble activation, to the creation of the relations of love and of righteousness into world.

One could say that the world will end, so, when there would be exhausted not only the possibilities of deepening the sense of the world, in the light, of the Revelation and vice versa, but also the possibilities of conformation of the world to the ideals comprised into the Revelation.

The mankind, which will continue beyond the history, must carry with itself a conscience, into which the light of the understanding and the way of living of the revealed truth it must reach the maximum amplitude which it could occasion its living into history. One would say that only the people from the last period, they would have such a conscience and, consequently, they will have a better situation in the existence which will continue, though it is not a personal merit that they have lived later. But between the generations of people there is a close solidarity. Like from the previous generation the ulterior ones receive their faith and the reason of experience and their own knowledge, in the same way their plus of understanding it will be shared to all the previous generations, through the communion into which will be called all the people, at the final judgment and after that. All the previous generations contributed to the production of this plus; all of them must be partakers to it.” (Stăniloae 1993)

¹⁴³ "Chaque conscience a besoin de tout les autres pour la soutenir. Et si l'on voulait dire qu'il suffit qu'elle reste en rapport avec l'infini même de l'acte où elle puisse dans un dialogue solitaire, on montrerait que les autres consciences sont précisément pour elle les médiatrices grâce auxquelles elle entre en communication avec lui d'une manière de plus profonde, par une série indéfinie de suggestions et d'épreuves qui mettent sans cesse en jeu des formes nouvelles de participation", p. 185.

¹⁴⁴ "Notre responsabilité à l'égard de l'être total est un témoignage en faveur de son unité ; il n'y a point d'être particulier qui ne se sente compatible de l'univers entier ; il sent qu'il doit prendre en main le charge même de la création" (p. 90). "Le moindre de nos gestes ébranle le monde ; il est solidaire de tous les mouvements qui le remplissent" p. 89. "Tous les gestes que nous faisons modèlent tour à tour toutes les formes du réel, les multiplient, les transforment et prennent leur part de responsabilité dans l'acte qui les a créés", p. 91.

“A condition of the progress towards good, which can be thought also a cause of the last step of the egotism and disorder, it is the multiplying of the people. Through the form of His Son Who made Himself man and sacrificed Himself for the people, God submits us, through this fact, in the most acute form and more pressing, to the test of the love for people. Through the multiplication of the people, He forces us or to raise up to the supreme capacity of love and sacrifice, of restraint and patience, or to fall into the supreme petrification, carelessness, and perpetual hatred. When people were rarer, they neither were so categorically challenged to the decision of love - of a practical love and not a theoretical one - nor to the one of hatred. The problem of the distribution of the goods was easy. Everyone had the means to live and some of them could freely rejoice of their land. With the time passing, the faces of the people increasingly crowd our sight, forcing us both to categorical attitudes of love or of adversity, but also to the need of voluntarily or forcedly share our piece of bread with them.

The man, indicated to us like the supreme duty, by the humanization of the Son of God, he becomes, through the multiplication of the human species, increasingly more, the test of fire which we grow up in love through, or we fall into spiritual death. Only if we impropriate the faith in Christ, the faith commanded by Christ, which is the same with the conviction that through our fellow human we are welcomed by God's claiming, we can raise ourselves up to the height of this exam and we can grow up on the measure its pretensions increase. Otherwise, the social problem become so difficult to the mankind then it succumbs under its burden, but it succumbs choked by hatred which erupts out of it like from a volcano. On the radical decision of the mankind, for or against Christ, like a supreme valorization of the human face of the fellow human, there hangs the continuation or the end of its existence. So, not the mankind by itself is the one causing the end of the world, but the way the mankind answers the its answer the exam which it is called and advised through Jesus Christ to, and which becomes even more pressing and demanding.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“When the progress of the righteous ones in their capacity of communion with God, with the fellow humans and with the creation, it will have reach, by the influence of Jesus Christ, the maximum possible degree in the earthly life, then Jesus will show Himself to us together with all the ones capable of communion, consummating the communion of everybody from all the times and changing the form of the present world, on the measure of its consummate communion. The entire Church will resurrect on the plan of the new world together with the Lord. Then Jesus will submit the saved and changed to the face world, to the Father, but He will also submit Himself together with this new world, for God to be all in everything¹⁴⁵. From then it will start the day of the full brotherhood amongst people and of the consummate filiation in report with the Father.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“One could accept the Farrer’s affirmation that in Christ took place a “rebirth of the images” in the sense that all our words are based on the real image of God into Christ, on describing the human with the most adequate image of God which the human is filled up with. In this sense can take place also an adaptation of the words about Christ to each historical period, a usage of other and other verbal symbols and images in order to express the imagination of the fundamental and definitive images of God into Christ. But removing this or these fundamental images it cannot be done without leaving the Christendom. The theological progress consists only of expressing these fundamental images by using other words. But this progress isn’t actually a Revelation, because of no longer taking place the discovery of essential and new fundamental images about God, of some images which to exceed the image of the humanity of Christ.” (Stăniloae 2005: 30)

“The infinity of the progress of the progress towards infinite it is shown especially in the continuous consummation of the man. The man can never reach the end of the kindness with his deed, or the end of the understanding, or of the gentleness relatedly to others. The man always sees that he must advance even further. This shows that the man doesn’t advance towards infinity except through communication with other persons and, in the last analysis, with God. The man must recognize those as borders, but also as life sources of him. If those hadn’t been borders, the man wouldn’t have had to advance beyond himself and those ones wouldn’t have been life sources and voluntary horizons transparent to him.” (Stăniloae 1995, I: 15)

¹⁴⁵ “Dem Parallelismus mit der Auferstehung Jesu entspricht weiter die Auferstehung der Gemeinde als enthüllende Vollendung der Herrenkirche. Das Schicksal der Gemeinde das Hauptes ist das Schicksal der Gemeinde; darum im schließt die Auferstehung nicht allein den Einzel, sondern zugleich das Kollektivum der Kirche. Ein verselbständiger Ewigkeitsindividualismus der die Auferstehung nur in Ichbeziehung sieht, hat in christlicher Eschatologie keinen Raum“. „Die Auferstehung des Kosmos ist die Vollendung der ursprünglichen Schöpfung Gottes zu einer neuen Schöpfungswirklichkeit“. W. Künerth, w. c. P. 254.

“The progress in the history of the salvation, determined by Revelation, it is a progress in knowing and accomplishing the meaning of our existence in God, as direct and consummate communion, with the Absolute as person and, in Him, with all the persons of our fellow humans; it is a progress in knowing and accomplishing the salvation plan God has.” (Stăniloae 2003: 40-41)

“The progress in the resemblance of the believer to the Son and Word of God, it is accomplished by the fact that Himself comes, through the history of the Revelation, increasingly closer to us. Then, by taking Himself our image, in order to restore it by uniting it with Himself as Model, he elevates us to our full actualization, through elevating and ascending our humanity accumulated in Him, as basis of our resurrection and ascent. It is in the same time a progress in our spirituality, without which we won't be able to resurrect into glory and to ascend to heavens.” (Stăniloae 2003: 41)

“Christ is the target of the creation and the One leading the creation towards that target. He gives the unfolding a sense. The Christians see this leadership from Christ and they contribute to the creation's advancing, but they also continuously surpass in their increasingly deeper living any point the creation's advancing has reached.” (Stăniloae 1997: 249)

“The godhead of Christ and His savior acts cannot be considered as a formal coat of the time which the New Testament was written at.” (Stăniloae 2005: 6)

“The question is: what the existence's consummation or plenitude - without beginning and non-submitted to temporality and to monotonous and unsatisfactory evolution connected to it - it consists of?” (Stăniloae 1995: 7)

Experiencing God

“We do not deny the fact that the me-you relation it is a place of experiencing God. We neither deny the fact that the human being cannot fully experience on himself except in a relation with another human being, and in the most accentuated manner in the loving relation with another human being. But we add to that: the human being cannot be either outside the relation with the nature. All three of them form an inseparable whole: me-you-nature. But accomplished in this frame, as ontological given, the human being can experience God, and on himself, also in relation with the nature.” (2003: 517)

“But where it continues into the past to, this sending from man to man? Until to that man who showed himself to the people who were listening to him and seeing him, as being so different from them, through the certitude of his belief, than those ones were sure that God`s work is active in him in a way which overwhelmed the work of God from any man who believes. His faith has an overwhelming massiveness, an imperial impetuosity; his faith raises itself transparently like the stone peaks of some huge mountains, and over the man who remains, considered in himself, an insignificant remnant. That man speaks with amazing clarity and evidence about God and of His will. It is something in him that has been never observed in another man, so that the ones who have come in relation with him they have realized that here has been produced a direct intervention of God, filling up and tightening the soul on a measure and intensity that are not possible to be produced through the faith of another man. He himself confessed that he was awakened not through another man`s belief, but by directly experiencing God.

The man at whom we meet the absolute certitude of faith, without receiving his faith from another man, because neither was him capable to give it to himself, he couldn`t acquire his faith except directly from God. This is the prophet and he is one of the organs which the divine Revelation descends through, into the human society.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“God must be cogitated only in this direction of a Subject. But He is the absolute subject, He is causa sui in the eminent meaning, whereas neither His existence He does have it from a force above Him, but Himself is the source of it. To Him we must attribute, if not all the ways of existence, but surely the superior ones, and the most superior way of existence is to be a subject. God is the full Subject, by being the absolute Sovereign of His acts, and by not depending on anything and by having - more than anybody - the existence for Himself and into Himself like a good which He enjoys of, not like a good for others, neither needing others in order to be confirmed into existence. The fact that we are experiencing the existence of a man in the second person, when for us it is made the passing towards the subject, when directly speaks to us, like being more intense than the one of an object, or like the one of a man in the third person, when he makes for us the passing towards the object, it is one more reason that God can be conceived only like a Subject. In report with the objects or with a man in the third person, we are experiencing a less existence, because we are too full of ourselves and they have not sufficient power to awake us in the front of a new reality differing from us. The fact of thinking at them, it doesn't place us in a real enough report with them, but it makes us to close in ourselves.

God, when He is experienced de facto, He must be experienced like a reality Who imposes us like an existence of maximum intensity - not like a passive and powerless object of our thinking, but like a voluntary Subject Who confines us. In the Old Testament, God calls Himself: "I Am That I Am" (Yahweh). It is his adequate name. From all the realities of the world, the one that we experience like a more intense reality it is the man in the second person, because then he is speaking in the first person, by manifesting his will, and he makes us to be silent and listen to him, he snatches us off the magic circle of the egocentrism, and then we are not only us active by thinking and action, but he is too. That's why we experience God more adequately when we hear that He speaks in the first person, and we keeping silence with fear and trembling. When we start speaking about God, we got out from the unmediated experience of His presence and of His existence of supreme intensity. But the man can tell His most adequate name: "I Am That I Am", because it would be an impiety the man to substitute Himself to God and to speak in His place these words. That's why the Jews pass over the word Yahweh when reading of the Holy Scripture, and they only listen to it, or, putting under its consonances the vowels from Adonai, they read Jehovah. In fact, the words Adonai-Lord, with their meaning of sovereign authority, they are the most appropriate to actualize in man, when utters it, the experience of the mastering power of the overwhelming reality of God.

From all these it results that God is Subject, and the man shows God's image, precisely in this noblesse title of His being." (Stăniloae 1993)

Faith

“The revealed supreme Person implies in Himself the evidence, but he doesn’t impose Himself without our faith. This is because the contact with the supreme Person, or with the supreme Truth, it cannot take place without the free opening to Him. His evidence it is a fact that it is unveiled to the free acceptance or to the faith.” (Stăniloae 2003: 52)

“(…) generally, the word of the Scripture has power when communicated by a believer to another man, either by repeating that word as one can find it in the Scripture, or by explaining it. For in the faith between them is being working the Holy Ghost. The faith, as work of the Ghost, it comes to somebody through another person, but only when that other person communicates the word of the Scripture he had learnt and he confesses it with faith, or with the sensitiveness of the communion into the Ghost. (Stăniloae 2003: 52)

“There had to be in the beginning persons who believed without reading the Scripture, but after coming in contact with a person who gave them the faith in its content and, on this basis, they believed in this content: uttered at the beginning, and then fixed in writing. This Person was Christ. And the full sight in His divine depths and the sensitiveness for them it has been given to those believers by the Ghost of Christ Who worked in communicating that sight and sensitiveness.” (Stăniloae 2003: 52)

“When attributing this role to the words, we do not mean only their reading and their precisely repeating, but we refer to their content, which is the confession about Christ. But even in this case it is involved the continuous reading of the Scripture in the churchly community, by some persons, which refreshes its undiminished and its unaltered content in this community. The Scripture guarantees, in this sense, the preservation of the living and unaltered faith, within Church, although at its turn, the Scripture has been valued by the Ghost of Christ, by the Ghost of the faith, and it has been preserved in the community of the Church through the Holy Ghost, since the Church’s foundation, after the intense contact of some persons with Christ.” (Stăniloae 2003: 56)

““In addition to this, the ones who receive their faith from others, on the basis of the Scripture’s general content communicated to them, through an ulterior frequent contact with the Scripture they penetrate increasingly deeper in the Scripture’s richness of spiritual meanings, being increasingly convinced that all its words couldn’t have come except from God, for they have in themselves the endless depths of the godlike life. These meaning increasingly strengthen the faith received through another person as a gift from the Holy Ghost; those words increasingly answer the thirst of knowing God, and the way the faith expects God to be.” (Stăniloae 2003: 59-60)

“Without Scripture the faith would weaken and its content will become poor over time and that content would become unsure in the bosom of the Church; but without Church, the Scripture wouldn’t be actualized in its efficiency, because there would lack the conveying of the Ghost, from the ones who believe to the ones who receive the faith.” (Stăniloae 2003: 57)

“The faith is founded on Revelation, but the Revelation doesn’t take place without faith. These two are complementary to one another.” (Stăniloae 2003: 75)

“Not the faith produces the Revelation, but the faith it occurs out of presenting the intention of the supreme Person to reveal Himself, and the faith is left to fully articulate in the moment the supreme Person reveals Himself. It is something analogue to the fact that not by faith produces the revealing of one of the fellow humans in what he has intimate and vivifying for me; but if there isn’t within me some kind of a presentment and if there isn’t within me some kind of an expectation, both of them regarding his capacity of revealing himself – that presentment and expectation come out of faith simultaneously to his revealing – his revelation won’t take place. The revealing and the faith cause one another ever since their preliminary phase.” (Stăniloae 2003: 75)

“The human nature is created by God Himself so that the human nature to be able to receive, through faith, His revealing.” (Stăniloae 2003: 76)

“God speaks to us as Person to person. The faith is the experience of this communication.” (Stăniloae 2003: 162-163)

“The eyes of the one who believes, they have been opened and he sees God in everything. Then “to believe” it becomes something totally rational and “not to believe” it becomes irrational.” (Stăniloae 2003:163)

“We must know about Christ, and we must believe in Christ with the whole our determination. And we receive this faith from the existent priests and Christians, who believed before us, and they have received it from the ones from before them, and so on to the Apostles, the first ones who knew about Christ and who believed in Him. The history is necessary for us to enter our present connection with Christ. The faith of our forerunners means the presence of Christ and of the Holy Ghost, in the present moment, within them. In this sense, Christ comes through the Holy Ghost from them, and it was so, all the way to the Apostles: a presence since this moment, of His, within the ones who believed before us, it is His, the spring of the grace within us, in His Church, and the Church unites all of us who believe.” (Stăniloae 2006: 124)

“We cannot build up a teaching of faith based on a philosophical theory, while the Holy Scripture and the faith of the believer say the opposite to our theory.” (Stăniloae 1997: 161)

“The faith is the certitude about God’s existence, like a supreme reality as Person, which does not stay in the continuity of substance with us and with the nature, and about the things which have been communicated to us, by Him, through the Revelation. The believer is sure that sometimes he is in a personal relation with God, like being in a similar report with a second person; though God is unseen.

The first and the most important feature of the faith is that of not being a simple inward phenomenon of our soul, but of being a relating to a reality that is not confounded with the act of belief, or with something which is part of the human being. The belief can be conceived and it can exist only like a part of the dual whole: faith – and – the object of the faith beyond it.

Even more than the knowledge, the faith lives out of the surety of the reality of the object beyond it. The heart of the faith is the certitude. No knowledge can have such certitude. And the certitude refers just to the trans-subjective reality of the object of the faith.

However, because by and large, the knowledge also lives out of the certitude of its objects, the analysis of the report between faith and reality it can use the indication offered by the order of the natural knowledge.

Into the knowledge we deal with acts “through which the conscience affirms a reality as it transcends itself”¹⁴⁶, get over itself to something from beyond her, forgets itself, it counts, and it looks towards something else than its subject. That is why this witness of conscience it may provide grounds, and it is shown by the fact that not through any act, the conscience transcends itself and affirms a trans-subjective reality. Our subject has the faculty to discern between experiences clasped with a trans-subjective reality and between dream and fantasy¹⁴⁷. Otherwise, the conscience is the ultimate instance at which we can challenge ourselves in the matter of the objective reality. Any other testimonies hang also by the conscience, and present themselves all together with it. The denial of the objective reality is deprived just by this last support of testimony of the conscience.

N. Hartmann¹⁴⁸, by wanting to prove the trans- subjective reality of the objects of the knowledge, he showed how much the act of knowledge is flooded by emotional acts, which also have a transcendent character launching from beyond conscience. He discerned three groups of such emotional acts which accompany the knowledge:

¹⁴⁶ JOHN CULLBERG, Das Du und die Wirklichkeit, Uppsala, 1933, 176.

¹⁴⁷ JOHN CULLBERG, i.c.

¹⁴⁸ Das Problem der Realitätsgegebenheit, Berlin, 1933.

Essential receptive acts, in which something happens to the subject - he endures something: the acts of experience, of living, of suffering, and of enduring. In these acts the subject does not master or observe, but he is mastered, and touched by something (Modus des Betroffenseins).

Pre-receptive acts, which precede experience or living: waiting, premonition, the condition in which the subject is ready for something, the fear, the worry, and the hope. In these acts the subject is in the anticipation of pressure mode (Modus des Vorbetroffensein). It is in them a certainty that "something is coming".

Prospective – active acts, through which the human being anticipates spontaneously the future, he is asking for it, and he is challenging it: the wish, the will, the action.

In all these acts we experience a "harshness of reality" (die Härte des Realen), either it presses on us before any own initiative, or it reacts, it resists our action. This pressure or resistance, we feel it particularly in the meeting with other persons, from where it follows that this conscience of the reality culminates into the conscience about other persons¹⁴⁹.

The pressure and the reaction which we feel it, from the trans-subjective reality, in these acts, shows that reality it is not a simple appearance, a phenomenon produced by our conscience, but a true transcendence of our subjectivity.

Making abstraction of the concrete and psychological particularities from the analyze of N. Hartmann, John Cullberg¹⁵⁰ found out that what distinguishes the structure of act of conscience through which it is affirmed the trans-subjective objects of the reality from the structure by which is not affirmed such a reality, it is for, in the first case, the objects impose themselves to conscience like entities which cannot be arbitrary changed or considered as not existing, like it happens in the second case. An ¹⁴⁹ N. HARTMANN shows that in the acts through we want to do something to the persons, we are experiencing, in addition to their reality, also with the reality of moral values, like being independent by our subject. Even from the first moment of our intention regarding the others, it turns towards us like a riposte, the merit or the guilt, through which we are experiencing agree or disagree with the moral values (pg. 24). But if these values, neither are not depending on us (but they are above us), nor by all people together, they also cannot exist like independent entities. They must be based into a supreme will, sovereign of the entire reality. Concretely, the emotional experience of the moral values, their feeling, it is also a feeling of God.

¹⁵⁰ W. c. p. 186.

imagined castle it depends on me how to imagine it, in a way or another, but a real house forces me to know it like it is¹⁵¹.

Many of those told about knowledge it may be applied to the faith to prove, in the same measure, the reality of its object. The faith it is also an act through which conscience concerns about something trans-subjective, through which it transcends herself. Her core, it is an act of knowledge, the confidence about something from beyond the immanent world. The difference with the common knowledge consists only in the subject, which is beyond of all that is seen and in the measure that it is known and understood the content of the object. But an unfavorable importance to the faith cannot have this difference, since the fact to be seen it is testified by conscience, and she testify just as certain, also about the reality of her object of faith. Through this we do not think that the visibility of some objects was a fact produced by conscience, because in such a case it would not impose so keenly and it would not be a characteristic only for some of them, but we say that only through conscience the reality can be ascertain and only the conscience is the instance for confession.

In the last analyze, it can be said about the known world: I believe that it exists, and about the world of faith: I know that it exists¹⁵².

But, even more than the proper knowledge act, the faith it is dressed in emotional-transcendent act and states, which, also, are fitted perfectly by the characteristic found by N. Hartmann at the analyze of the facts which accompany the knowledge.

At last, the general feature that Cullberg finds in the structure of the act through which the conscience transcends itself in knowledge, namely the force which the object imposes itself with like real to the knowledge, we fully find it as determining the act of faith too.

The believer cannot overlook God like being real, he cannot think something out of what he knows like being revealed by Him, else than he is convinced that it was revealed to him.

N. Hartmann does not establish like criterion of the trans-subjective reality, the physical character, but the “harshness” which it imposes itself to us with, by making us to “endure” it, to “experience” it, to “live” it¹⁵³.

¹⁵¹ Through this orientation towards ontology, the philosophy get closer again to Christianity, because the fundamental feature of Christianity is the belief in reality as a product of God.

¹⁵² We do believe that this affirmation is a fundamental one, being of an ultimate importance, like many other that priest professor PHD academician Dumitru Stăniloae stated through all his wonderful and genius works. (translator's note)

¹⁵³ W. c. p. 16.

He even says that the “experience” in discussion “must not be identified with the empirical in the scientific and gnoseological understanding. There is a difference of another kind, more elementary than that one, and more enrooted in life, more human and more fundamental in the same time, more appropriate to the use of language than that of the empirical knowledge”¹⁵⁴.

But if it is like this, we do not have any right to not recognize that the religious experience, more intense and more stable than all others, would not be produced by a trans-subjective reality, like itself it is convinced.

N. Hartmann speaks about an experience of being pressed or carried out by a trans-subjective force, to which cannot correspond something real¹⁵⁵, even if that something remains hidden to the knowledge¹⁵⁶. But the experience of a part from reality it stays in direct report with the degree of participating to it. When you are a simple spectator, you cannot experience some realities which unfold next to you¹⁵⁷.

One might object towards the applying of the ones found in knowledge, that the objects impose themselves to all human subjects like being real, while the object of the belief only to some of them.

But the fact that it imposes to many it is a full proof about its reality. Neither the realities knowledgeable on natural way, particularly those of spiritual life are not known and or not confessed by all people. The philosophers affirm too often the experience of some spiritual realities, which not impose to all consciences, like the world of objects does. It is true – even if this fact also it is denied by many philosophers – that everyone could reach the knowledge of them. But who tell us that would not reach all the people to the knowledge of faith’s realities? In any case, the fact that the overwhelming majority of consciences are sure about themselves cannot be explained, taking account by the analogy offered by the domain of knowledge, but only through the incursion of some signs or data of the object of the faith in these consciences.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“The second main feature of the faith is that it arises into the human being in a miraculously way. The human’s certainty about divine reality is born otherwise than natural world’s knowledge.

We will continue to analyze the act of faith from this second point of view, by trying to find out the way which a human comes to believe in. What we will ¹⁵⁴ W. c.

¹⁵⁵ W. c. p. 17.

¹⁵⁶ “Was es eigentlich „war“, war mir geschah oder zustieess, kann mir verbogen bleiben“ (p. 18).

¹⁵⁷ L. c.

conclude through this analyze it will contribute to more a complete understanding of the reality of the object of faith and of the real existence of a divine Revelation.

If you ask anyone who believe, on which way the faith has dwelt in him, the answer will be that through the sermon or the life of another, if he has acquired the faith at an old age, or through the parents, if he has come with his faith from his childhood. There is nobody who gains his faith through nature, namely from the impersonal seen world. First of all, practically speaking, such a case is impossible. Any human being, before gaining the capability to contemplate the nature, he lives in report with other older people, with his parents, with the ones who raised him up. Usually, in every religious society, the man receives the faith in that phase of his life in which it hasn't been clarified to him a special report between him and the nature. In case he lost his faith latter on and he gained it again by contemplating the nature, this would not be a proper kind of a new faith, but it would be a re-awakening of the first one. But it is not heard about somebody to re-ignite his faith only through a pure contemplation of the nature. Every individual who lost and re-gained his faith he met one or more people who manifested through word or deed the certainty of faith and this fact produced also in him, suddenly or gradually, a rebirth of faith. The nature can have an auxiliary role, of consensus of what he has been hearing from others and it has been rebirthing in him. Even less faith it is born, through the nature's contemplation, into a man who hasn't received his faith in his childhood. A pagan won't reach the faith in Christ if he does not enter a Christian society, or if he hasn't met a missionary. By and large, nobody come to an articulate faith, a sure one, other than through a man or through a society confessing that faith.

The nature indicates God, but its speech is not so clear or so sure. The nature's speech with a general and not-precise character, it clarifies itself only for the one who has received the faith from another man. Nature indicates a reason, a source, a cause beyond it, to which we come by sudden intuition or by tightened logic, but it does not unveil clearly the features of this reason. That's why some people think this reason in a pantheistic way, others incline to consider it like a person, but neither the first nor the last are sure. Even if they consider God like a person, they will at most reach the true idea of God. But from here to certitude, which constitutes the being of faith, it is an abyss which the man cannot pass over by his own initiative and efforts. And we also can tell this need for searching and for finding the supreme reason of the world, it is the ground on which the power from above finds a proper place for anchoring itself, in order to produce the faith within man, and it is the natural organ which can be transformed by the descent of divine grace into the spiritual eye of faith with a clear and certain sight. Karl Bart's affirmation that into the human being does not exist any remnant from God's face on which to hook the gift of faith and therefore, the one who believe in God`s word is exclusively God Himself – The Holy Ghost placed in man believes to the Word, so all is an inter-Trinitarian action – leads to an absurd denial of the Revelation¹⁵⁸.

But this predisposition towards faith it doesn't come to completion - in a proper faith - through nature¹⁵⁹, no matter how important a role the nature has in the recollection of the man, in his stimulation towards searching and thinking of what's beyond nature; even to searching for and to thinking at God.

But just because it is a man like us, he couldn't give to himself, by himself, this certitude which we are feeling like an element from above the world, the man through whose mediation the faith is produced within us, he couldn't reach his faith otherwise but like we do, through the certitude of other or of others. So, each man who believes, he refers, on one hand, to another man, who believed before him, and on the other hand, to God Who shows Himself in an unspeakable way but surely being working into the faith from whose he received his own. The faith is the product of the man-to-man report and of God`s work Who is active in this report. The faith is born from man and from God in the same time, or from God through man. Everyone`s faith indicates towards the past and towards heaven.” (Stăniloae 1993) “Thereby, the transmission of the faith is appropriate and necessary to be done on this way, from man to man, so that, together with the act of the faith transmission, to be born also the complete subject, the communion subject in each individual.

Besides, the human being appears to be the most appropriate for producing the faith in his fellow humans, whereas the absolute resistance that be encounter at man, like subject, makes us, through itself, to realize that we cannot identify us to the absolute reality, but we are thinking about a common principle, superior to us and to him¹⁶⁰. Through an essential structure, which can be depicted only from much more perspectives, each human conscience from a spiritual society it is to all the others the most adequate intermediary of the bond with God¹⁶¹. Besides this, God, by revealing Himself to us, always through a subject, who in this quality he has the power to claim us, he makes us experiencing more adequately His character of Supreme Subject, who claims us with an absolute power.

¹⁵⁸ To be seen among others concerning this question: J. FEHR, Das Offenbarungsproblem in dialektischer und thomistischer Theologie, Freiburg (Schweitz), Leipzig, 1939, p. 46. FEHR gives also the following quote from BARTH's book, Christliche Dogmatik im Entwurf I Band (München, 1927): “If God reveals Himself, this means that God Himself enters in the arena like the known one and the one who knows, like the one who speak and hears” (pg. 39).

¹⁵⁹ It isn't here about natural revelation, which it is the discovery of God besides Christ not only through nature, but also through man, so also through a tradition which remained from the primordial state of man.

¹⁶⁰ LOUIS LAVELLE, W. c. p. 407-8. “Or votre volonté est pour moi beaucoup plus qu'une chose... Elle este ce qui précisément m'oblige a ne point m'identifier moi-même avec l'activité absolue... et a remonter jusqu'a un principe commun au qui nous participons tous les deux ».

God, by arranging on this way the propagation process of the Revelation, He wanted to make the man realizing how much is in debt with his fellow human on which depends his faith, and how much is obliged, at his turn, to other fellow humans, whose salvation depends, to some extent, on him. Through the same act of faith dwelling in me, God wanted to bind me to Himself and to fellow humans, because the sin is isolation in a way or another. If each one had obtained the Revelation bypassing his fellow human, he wouldn't have bound in his conscience the most important act of his existence and the permanent condition of his spirituality on another, and, thereby, the tendency of pride from man, not receiving such a manifest disavowal, it would have found even more ground for affirmation." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The faith's transmission moments coincide to the moment of culminant encounter between me and you, in what these subjects have as more intimate, and as more proper. That's why, in order to raise up to the receiving of the faith, you have to raise yourselves up towards communion, and towards the discovery of the self and of the soul of the fellow human. But you cannot produce the faith by yourself, no matter how hard you force yourself to reach the consummate communion, neither can you produce by yourself the perfect communion. It is here also God into the work. In any case, though, the peak of the faith is one with the communion. And you cannot reach it except within the frame of the social rules' reports, even if you urge yourself too, in order to surpass the legal minimum of these reports, and to search for your fellow human's soul, or even if the faith of your fellow human with whom you are in such reports, it snatches you from the beginning. The conveying power of the faith is conditioned, at least to the one from whom it is done the conveying, by the moral raising up over the minimum asked by the law of his social quality. A father won't not transmit his faith to his son if he isn't regarded by his son as being a good father. A merchant won't be able to convey the faith to his clients if he doesn't become an honest merchant. Not the goodness of the father neither the honesty of the merchant makes to raise the faith within the soul of the son or of the client, but their certitude. But the certitude is not felt like a reality where is not together with it also a great moral height into the frame of the reports upheld by the creational rules. Behold therefore, how these rules are not only frames, but they are also an auxiliary of faith transmission. Far from being there any opposition between these reports - which qualify the subjects in a way or another - and the communion report, when these ones meet together in their pure intimacy and they transmit their faith, the first ones collaborate to producing the last ones.” (Stăniloae 1993)

¹⁶¹ Idem, W. c. p. 402: "... les différences puisement entrer en communion dans une société spirituelle ou chacune d'elles sont pour toutes les autres médiatrice entre l'acte pur et son être propre ».

“Searching for the origin of our faith in one of its coordinates, namely in the horizontal one, we have seen that on the uniform road we arrive to the prophets, namely to those people who know that they do not receive the certitude of the faith from their ancestors and, however, they have it. The positive experiences, clear and indubitable, are added to confirm them the surety that their certitudes come from God.

By and large, the faith, that meant the belief and the certitude of the divine reality, like something beyond the personal self and beyond the immanent world, it cannot be produced either by the immanent world of nature or by historical persons. This negative fact we all of us are experiencing it. The faith can be caused only by the divide reality itself. The historical persons they can only occasion us the faith. That’s why, when they occasion us the faith, the ones who receive the faith through them, though they have an experience of the divine reality, they realize that the reality is beyond the causing persons. The experience of the faith, distinguishes all the time between the instrument which causes it, and God, like its object or ultimate and true Source. The faith feels when it has met God.

Who can put in words these characteristics of their experience in front of God, and the reason of their certitude about His divinity? They, though, were able to expose their experience in Gospels, so that Jesus from Gospels actually reveals Himself as being God. And it is certain that they were capable to transmit this experience of them, also in preaching from person to person.

Fr. Gogarten has highlighted a lot, the word spoken by Jesus Christ, like a revelator factor of His Godhead. By the fact that Jesus was a historical Person Who spoke from outside, He proved His objective reality, not as produced by man. But, if He had seemed like any other man, He would not have established the faith in Him like God. This historical contingency would have not been, in the same time, the Absolute in the ones from around Him, in order them to feel that they can lean themselves onto Him, like on the ultimate reality.

The word of the fellow human has two reasons:

- a. to address us a calling of love, to getting out from selfishness and to recognizing him like a reality equal to us, in order to enter the communion, and
- b. to answer such of calling or to fulfill our calling.

The word of any man does not fulfill these two functions but relatively. It is not able to determine us to decide for a categorical answer, a total one, to decidedly get out from our self, to let go all our things and to be at his disposition; or, if not, to categorically declare us as enemy of him. Any man's words have not but a relative echo within us. The word of Jesus had upon His contemporaries this absolute power in a positive or negative sense. Namely, His word wasn't addressed only like the pretense of somebody who does not claim but the appreciation owed to his equal, only the proper love for his fellow human, but, from Him it sounded besides this – besides humbleness from man – the absolute pretention of the supreme Master to be followed, to renounce to all our things for Him. And in this respect too, Jesus was revealed like complete man and complete God, like humbleness and sovereignty met without neutralizing each-other. Not humble like a man and master like a God, but the same subject also humble and sovereign, or humble into sovereignty and sovereign into humbleness, God leaned down to the height of the man and the man raised to the height of God.

But, also through the second function of His word, Jesus was showing Himself like the incorporation of the absolute. From His word was radiate the perfect love and, precisely through this, His call sounded with categorical authority.

In Jesus, "the fulfilled word" welcomes us, like it said Fr. Gogarten¹⁶². Jesus does not only utter the word, but He is identified to it, He is the Word itself, by being One with the communion maker character of the word. His being is not fallen from the height of the word to the state of selfishness. He is the wholly human word and the wholly godlike word. There is a close connection between these. The wholly human word cannot exist, except only in connection with the absolute word, namely the godlike one.

In front of Jesus the people experienced not only His Godhead, but also their sin. Actually, these two experiences are close clasped together." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Of course, the faith, in the precise sense of the word, it is necessary. No matter how overwhelming Jesus Christ would have manifested through word and deed, an ill will could slip from under the power of the speech and of His manifestation of a godlike subject." (Stăniloae 1993)

¹⁶² Ich Glaube an den dreieinigen Gott, p. 152-3 : „, das erfüllt Wort ".

“In this way, the faith in Jesus Christ like God, or the experience on which founds and with which the faith is one and the same, it is born out of two factors: one objective and one subjective. Through the subjective factor it is seen the objective one. So, it can be explained his apparent value of decisive, or even unique, factor. This, though, it does not mean that the subjective factor could be produced without the prior existence of the objective one. The subjective factor is stimulated by the objective one, without this one to force the first one to produce himself.” (Stăniloae 1993)

““The faith is the first step in the spiritual life. “The faith is by nature the beginning of all virtues. Thus “the good, by being the end of the virtues, it is concentrated inside the faith”. The faith is the concentrated good, and the good is the actualized faith (Saint Maximos the Confessor, Quaest. Ad Thalas, q. 55; G.P. 90, 564).” (Stăniloae 1992: 95)

“Actually, one cannot start any action against passions, and one cannot lay down the beginning of any virtues if there isn’t the faith present as an impetus. The restraint, as steadfast effort, it needs to be legitimated through faith, and the fear of God presupposes the faith in God. It is right that the restraint and above all a virtuous life, they strengthen at their turn, the faith, but their first engine has been, though, the faith. Before any virtues, and before any man’s effort, we must somehow receive the faith within us. For we have the faith through the godlike grace, it was needed that the grace to precede any good thing which we start walking towards. Thus, the good beginning is laid down by God through Baptism. The whole our virtuous life isn’t but an unfolding of this good beginning that has been laid down by God. Of course, there isn’t about an automatic development, one without our assent, but it is about a development wanted by us and helped by us, through the whole our straining.” (Stăniloae 1992: 95)

“Before any virtues we must have the faith achieved at or strengthened by Baptism. But our faith’s efficacy it depends on our collaboration in order us to advance on the road of the virtues, towards consummation. Thus, the faith is a virtue too, it is a good thing, but it is shown as a good thing through our collaboration. This collaboration, in the beginning, it consists of simple will to believe and not of the will of doing something. Unavoidably, the first straining of our will in order to do the good, it cannot have any other object except: to believe. Even from our side one cannot start from somewhere else, regarding any changing of our life in good, except from believing. And the one who wants to believe, he reaches being able to believe. But the fact that by wanting somebody to believe he reaches to believe, it is due to a presence of a previous grace within us. This is for by his simple will of believing, the man couldn't even reach to believe. Empirically, the man tends to imagine that everything depends on his will, in order the necessity of his contribution to be accentuated. But on trans-empirical plan, there is present the grace as help. Even the fact that the man is able to want to believe, it is a gift of faith, but it doesn't force him to believe. Starting with the moment which somebody wants to believe on, he actually reached to believe - and the grace hidden within him since Baptism, or the faith as virtuality, it has been actualized by the fact that the man has brought his contribution too." (Stăniloae 1992: 95-96)

"Before starting on the road of the purification, the man needs to strengthen the faith he received at Baptism, through his own will. But the faith being my relating to God, I cannot strengthen my faith except by starting to think more often at Him, and not in a theoretical mode as to a theme of philosophical cogitation, but like at the One on Whom I depend in all my things, and Who can help me in my insufficiencies. The thinking at God is concretized, or it is maintained, by shortly and often remembering Him, done with awe, with the sentiment that we depend on Him. Such a word focuses our thoughts towards God, or towards Jesus Christ., towards what he did for us, as basis for our trust that He is going to help us now again." (Stăniloae 1992: 96)

"The need for faith as first level of the spiritual ascension it comes, though, out of the way of the passions' stirring up. As we have seen, the decisive moment in stirring up the passions it is the sliding of the rationality from its natural position, because of being attracted by lust awakened into conscience. On that moment the lust of the innocent affect it receives power and it becomes condemnable. The sin commences on each time through a falling of the rationality, through a falling off the truth, through rationality's sliding on a wrong road, and by forgetting the rationality's purpose. Therefore, here is where we must bring the first strengthening, namely at the first outpost which the enemy can conquer. Namely, we must strengthen the rationality in order to resist. This strengthening is being done through faith. The faith makes the rationality standing steadfastly in an intellectual attitude, in a conception of life. Of course, the faith isn't, at least at the beginning, and intellectual proof convincing the rationality through a stringency of exclusively gnoseological order. The faith is mostly achieved, by will, and therefore it is a virtue. The faith has a double aspect: intellectual and voluntary." (Stăniloae 1992: 97)

"The faith is, on one hand, a conception, a point of view, and on the other hand it is an act of will. The faith is an intellectual-voluntary synthesis. But neither the sliding away of the rationality isn't a purely intellectual act, but it is a voluntary act too. Neither the rationality has taken the side of the lust only because of being convinces by purely intellectual reasons concerning the truth represented by the lust, but it has done this also through a weakening of the will, rather pretending of being convinced on an intellectual way than really being convinced. Consequently, in order to bring the rationality back to its firmness from the beginning, one need more than a purely intellectual act, which to simply convince the rationality about the judgment mistake it has committed, but there is needed a moral help too. As the rationality has fallen, for it has wanted to fall, likewise it is made steadfast by faith, for it wants to become steadfast. The falling is an intellectual-voluntary act; fixing the falling it must be done through such acts too.” (Stăniloae 1992: 97-98)

“The faith gradually grows up to all-luminous evidence. But the faith grows up on the measure we fulfill the commandments and achieve the virtues. This is for through these ones we show that we feel the presence of God and we open ourselves even more to Him. This means that the faith is present from the beginning, but it grows up through all the virtues we later achieve. Besides, each virtue once achieved won’t be lost if we persevere on the ascending path of the Christians spiritual life, but it remains even after the following virtues are born out of it, growing up and receiving superior qualitative modifications, under the influence of the new virtues, in order to be coordinated with those ones.” (Stăniloae 1992: 99)

“The faith is the first virtue which we hit the road with. The faith is the little creek which the creeks of the other virtues are added later to, together becoming the big, all-comprising, and impossible to be turned back river of a totally virtuous life. In love there are gathered together all the virtues. Meanwhile, the faith, without being lost, it has gradually gained evidence, and in the phase of the love the faith becomes a contemplation of God, as love is contemplation too.” (Stăniloae 1992: 99)

“The faith couldn’t be from the beginning a properly-said knowledge. From the primordial state of contemplating God, there is a long way to go, in order to liberate his mind of the darkening brought by passions. For the time being, we are imparted with a glimmer, and only on the measure which we are thinning the passions’ layer of mud on, the glimmer of the faith in the darkness which we are at the beginning in, it become a blinding light. Getting rid of the ignorance from the beginning it grows out of fear.” (Stăniloae 1992: 100)

“The faith is sight above mind. This is shown by Paul in his Epistle towards Hebrews. “Through faith, he says, we understand that the ages have been created by the word of God” (11: 3). No mind has understood this. Any mind says that the world exists from ever. Therefore, the faith isn’t a natural power, but it is a supra-natural power, given us by the Son. (...) The faith makes the whole mind’s science seeming like a fool. Not the one having science, but the one having faith in his heart, that one has Jesus Christ within himself.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 59-60)

“The fact that somebody doesn’t believe that Christ as embodied Son of God, came into world, it won’t mean that the world has been objectively emptied of Christ, of that Christ will cease to be present within world; it only means that that one doesn’t see Christ within world, as light, because of his spiritual eyes being blind. Such a man doesn’t see either the value of the people as worthy to be loved and loving creatures, despite they having that value. This doesn’t mean that the world is no longer an environment which the people could help on each other, out of love, by imitating Christ as their role-model. Thus, the lack of faith in Christ and the lack of knowing Him as luminous light, it can be seen also out of the lack of love the nonbeliever has for his fellow humans, while knowing Christ as the One Who highlights the value of the people and Who gives them power to love, it can be seen in the people’s love for one another. If the Son of God has made Himself man, in order to love us, what mustn’t us love the people like, and to not see Christ in their working love? This is said by Apostle John in one of his Epistles, when explaining the words of Christ from the Gospel the Apostle John wrote: “Who loves his brother, he stays within light. And who hates his brother, he walks into darkness and he doesn’t know where he is going at, for the darkness has blinded his eyes” (I Jo. 2: 10-11). This was said by Christ Himself: “The one who walks into darkness, he doesn’t know where he is going at” (Jo. 12: 35).” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 52-53)

“Only the mode of the supreme existence as union of eternal Persons, of-the-same-being, limitless and in a fully free love, it imposes us with as a really supreme and explicable mode. Any other mode would have been submitted to some limitation, namely to a non-full love and freedom, and, therefore, it presupposes an existence superior to the man. Thus, a supreme existence, which a total free love exists in, it is on one hand conform to the most rational thinking, and on the other hand it exceeds that most rational thinking, as a mystery. And, because the understanding of the things which are superior to the strict law, it exceeds the things which are submitted to that law, and it requires an effort for exceeding the things submitted to the law, this effort equals to faith. Thus, the mode of the supreme existence becomes acceptable, on one hand through faith, and on the other hand through rationality. This is the mode for accepting the supreme dogma. The supreme dogma, for being a dogma of the full love and by not being imposed forcedly, it requires from us the freedom of the faith, united with the most rational acceptance. The fullest rationality is united with the faith. A supreme rationality or light, without faith in it, it isn’t rational at all.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 158)

“These acts of God differ God clearly from the world. Through them God differs from the mythology’s deities, which were, in the last analysis, personifications of the nature’s forces and of the human passions. Even if those deities were projected by the popular fantasy as existing beyond the world, their manner of acting within world had a certain regularity, it was tightly related to the same natural phenomena and human passions. They were acting cyclically.

Even in this fact, one can see that the Christendom isn’t mythological and therefore it doesn’t need any “demythologizing”.” (Stăniloae 2005: 8)

Family- Marriage

“At God, the Ghost cannot have the role of attracting One of the Two to an alternative communion with Self in order to rekindle the love of One for Another (...), but only that of maintaining Them in Their distinction, for all the three godlike Persons stay face to face. At people this happens rarely and in completely. At the people it always must take place a moving of the sight from one towards another, when there are three persons present. Although, sometimes this take place also to the people, when the love in the three ones is full and equal. The parents look together at the child; the child looks simultaneously at the face of his parents; a parent looks simultaneously at the face of the child and of the other parent. No one becomes, when all the three are present, him to the others two. No one is actually the third one in what regards the order or the love or the honoring. In these cases, the two ones are to the third one us, and the third one is you; and the two ones are you to the third one. At God, the Three Ones are somehow simultaneously: Me, You, You.” (Stăniloae 2003: 324)

“Christians are allowed to use the things, and to unite themselves in marriage as man and woman. The things can be used, not for pleasure but for maintaining the life within body, and for knowing and praising God. The love between man and woman must always take the form of marriage. Only thus the woman is actualized for the man in the plenitude of her being and the man as well for the woman and between them there is accomplished a real unity. Through marriage, the man’s love for woman exceeds the passing, narrow, and egotistic sensuality, as well does the woman’s love for her man. Only thus they provide help to one another, in the spiritual ascension towards God, in their true accomplishment.” (Stăniloae 2006: 151)

“The Mystery of the wedding is a holy act, in which, through the priest, it is imparted the grace of the Holy Ghost, to a man and to a woman who freely unite themselves in marriage, which sanctified and elevated the natural bond of the marriage to the dignity of representing the spiritual union between Christ and His Church.” (Stăniloae 1997: 119)

“A first question that raises related to this Mystery is that referring to the place this Mystery is granted in the string of the Holy Mysteries. This question regards the place of the Mystery of the ordination too. If the committer of all the Mysteries is the priest, why it is not the Ordination the first to be mentioned, or the last one? What the Tradition of the Church places the Ordination after the Baptism, Chrism, Eucharist and Repentance, but before Wedding and the Holy Unction. A first answer would be that through the first four Mysteries, the man is placed in a direct relation with Christ, and only indirectly he is placed in serving relation with the other people, whilst through the Mystery of the Wedding the man is, firstly, placed in a tight relation with his fellow human, and through the holy Unction the man is given help for his body, and only through them the man is placed in relation with Christ. So, this would justify also the placing of the Ordination after the first four Mysteries, which place the man in direct relation with Christ, whereas the man's salvation depends on these four Mysteries, and the priest's role is that of helping the people to achieve their salvation." (Stăniloae 1997: 119)

"The four Mysteries placed before the Ordination, they give the man the grace which the man by collaborating with, he achieves his salvation, but the fructifying of this grace it is fully achieved through priesthood and marriage. The most people live the fullness of the marriage relations by achieving the virtues as fruits of their collaboration with the grace, or as forms of their sanctification in this uninterrupted and intense relationship. Once entered this relationship, its quality determines, in a good sense, all the man's other relationships within society, which the marriage multiplies. So, the Mystery of the Wedding and the Mystery of the Priesthood help the believers, through the grace they give them, to due apply the graces of the other Mysteries, in the concrete familial and social situation which are living in, through nature, the most people; or, in the churchly role assumed by others, these Mysteries helps them in the relationship they are with their fellow humans in, in marriage and in priesthood, and in the multiple problems and in the relations the mentioned one impose them, in order to encounter God, or to develop their relationship with Christ, especially through a fellow human they united themselves with, for their entire life, or with the believers which they are responsible for. The Wedding and the Priesthood as Mysteries, they make obvious the fact that the person doesn't accomplish himself except in communion, that the person and the communion are two inseparable factors; they make obvious the fact that the Mysteries have their fructification in the responsibility of the people for one another. From this point of view, the priesthood is a richer fruit of the other Mysteries, and therefore it is justified the Priesthood to be placed after them, and before the other Mysteries which these ones come to fruition in." (Stăniloae 1997: 119-120)

"The fact that in marriage God is being known through another, and in the Holy Unction through the relief received from Him in state of sickness (through body), it makes that these two Mysteries to be placed at the end, after the priest has set the man in direct connection with Christ through the first four Mysteries. But the fact that the mediated form which Christ is known through the last two Mysteries it still is a directly knowing Him, through the transference of another or of the weakened body, and therefore it is not a simple deductive or posterior knowledge to the knowing of the fellow human or of the sick body, as also the fact that both the marriage and the sickness are concrete forms the graces of the other Mysteries are fructified in, it connects these two Mysteries to the bother four from before.

But the priesthood is even more connected than to the four previous Mysteries, through which Christ is received as personal Savior, and to the two last Mysteries, through the more responsible relations with the people which the fructification of the received grace must be manifested in.” (Stăniloae 1997: 120-121)

“The marriage as natural bond, for life, between a man and a woman, it is founded on the fact that the man and the woman only together they can compose the complete humanity. (...) Neither God is a sole person. Because if this had been the case He wouldn’t have been love, and He even wouldn’t have been entirely a person – namely God. That’s why neither the man would have been the image of God, if the man had been a locked-up monad. If this had been the case, the man’s existence would have been entirely a torment, if the man would have existed. The Genesis says that God made Eva for He saw that “it isn’t good the man to be alone” (2: 18). God created Eva not only in order to help Adam, but to protect him against loneliness too, for only they reciprocally complete one another, they are the full man. “Man and woman, He made them and He blessed them; and he called his name man (Adam), on the day He made them” (Gen. 5: 2). The man is a complete unity, and therefore image of God, for his unity of man it is accomplished in the personal not-uniform duality, but complementary as man and woman: “And God made the man, in the image of God He made him, like man and woman he made them.” (Gen. 1: 27). “Speaking about two, God speaks about only one”, notes Saint Chrysostom. And Saint Cyril from Alexandria says: “God created the coexistence”.” (Stăniloae 1997: 121)

“Getting Eva out of Adam it means that Eva was virtually comprised in Adam even before her bringing to existence. But she was in Adam not as something identical to him and therefore she isn’t the result of a simple development of Adam. The man is bipolar in himself. Only thus the man is a dialogical being. The dialogue partners must have both something common and something different, more different than a same sex individual has for another individual. Adam was always Adam-Eva. One can say that these two aspects (masculine and feminine) of the man are in such a measure inseparable in the love of God, that a human being taken isolated and considered per se, it isn’t a full human being. If that had been the case, such a human being wouldn’t have been but half of a man, in an existence isolated from his complementary – he would have been only a half non-uniform to the other half.” (Stăniloae 1997: 122)

“The bodily complementary difference expresses and it conditions a complementary difference of the souls. But this doesn’t make each of them less human. But the unity is lived by each of them in another mode and in a reciprocal completion. Each of them is equally human being, but the human integrity they live it only together, in reciprocal completion. In other words, this human, differentiated and complementary unity it is a conjugal unity. The human being is a conjugal being. The human pair from Paradise was a conjugal pair. This was the paradisiacal marriage, having its basis in the dual human nature. But it had also a grace.” (Stăniloae 1997: 122)

“In order to be a consummate unity, the marriage requires a perfect love. That’s why the marriage must be indissoluble. Thus, the marriage had from the beginning the attributes of the unity and of the indissolubility. The man had, fully, in the perfect union with a woman, everything that essentially completed him; and the woman had the same. The passing from the bond with a woman to the bond with another woman, or from a man to another, it doesn’t provide to either of them the full completion through a perfect union. The feminine is perpetually searched for, but without being fully found, in that full self-giving and for life; and the masculine, likewise. Each half remains, more or less, an incomplete individual, more or less in a loneliness.” (Stăniloae 1997: 122)

“The full union between a man and a woman, corresponding to a perfect love, it is imperishable. This is because each of them has found in another not an object, whose possibilities of satisfying are limited and who hides himself as person when treated like an object, but an inexhaustible and eternally new person, in his capacity and imagination of self-giving.” (Stăniloae 1997: 122)

“The marriage as natural bond, it has been weakened and disfigured in many ways, after falling, through the egotism unchained and developed by the falling. By this the marriage has lost the grace related to the primordial state. Although, the marriage hasn’t been abolished, it its essence. This is for either the human nature hasn’t been destroyed.” (Stăniloae 1997: 123)

“The man is so much completed through woman, for the woman is the other half of the species, and only together with her the man form the whole human being, and only in union with the woman the man is accomplished as man. Likewise: the woman. This is for the man is the one completing the woman, and vice versa. And if the man doesn’t complete the woman and he isn’t completed by her, he is not accomplished as man, neither the woman as woman. Thus, in his woman, the man has the whole other half of the species, and vice versa, so that no one needs another man or another woman.” (Stăniloae 1997: 123)

“But any man or woman isn’t only a uniform exemplar of a species’ half, but he bears also the unique characteristics of an unrepeated person. By living together, the two persons configure one according to another, so that the man is completed as person also through his woman, and vice versa. Each of them becomes some kind of co-person and both of them form a co-personal unit. That's why the man who would pass from a woman to another he no longer accomplishes himself as person, defined through the cohabitation with a sole person as his woman. His personal traits will become fluid, and undefined. Properly-said, he will become rather a species-individual, because of being deprived of a true and permanent communion; he is rather a uniform individual of his species than being a person. In him are developed rather the species' passions, not-harmonized and unrestrained in the traits of a person with spiritual characters highlighted in an own mode. Through education, their combined personal characters are achieved by their children too; or the two ones are influenced in time by the personal traits of their children. So, the people prepare themselves in order to become a universal co-personal community in the Kingdom of Heavens. This reciprocal personal configuration hasn't been missing either after falling, but it has been helped, somehow, by the nature's law itself. The Orthodox religious service affirms that: "Neither the sin from the beginning, not the flood broke the holiness of the marriage". (Stăniloae 1997: 123)

"Although, the marriage's natural attributes, the unity and the indissolubility, they were disregarded by many people and even by many peoples. But the conscience that the marriage is one and indissoluble was persisting amongst people. Out of this conscience the Pharisees asked Jesus the question: "It is appropriate to the man to leave his woman for any reason?" (Mt. 19: 4)." (Stăniloae 1997: 123)

"Christ strengthens again the connection of marriage between man and woman and he elevates it, out of the nature's order, in the order of the grace, comprising it, by His participation to the wedding from Cana, in the ambiance of the grace that was irradiating out of His Person. By doing there His first wonder, through His power from above nature, and by giving the pair, that was marrying, to drink the wine of the enthusiastic love poured by Him out of His grace, He wanted to show that it started the elevation of the human life in the order of the grace since the strengthening and the elevation of the marriage." (Stăniloae 1997: 124)

"Jesus affirmed directly the need for the marriage to come back to its unity and indissolubility from the beginning. He answered the Pharisee's question, why Moses allowed the woman to be left, by saying: "Because Moses, according to the callousness of your heart, he allowed you to leave your women, but at the beginning it wasn't thus. But I am telling you: Whosoever will leave his woman – and not for fornication – and he will marry another woman, he commits fornication, and who married the left woman, he commits fornication". (Mt. 19: 8-9)." (Stăniloae 1997: 124)

“Jesus reckons as committing adultery, the one who leaves his woman and takes another, for He reckons that the bond of the marriage hasn’t been abolished between the one who has left his wife, by the fact he has forsaken her. He says this also before, and directly, by answering the question if somebody is allowed to leave his woman, for any reason, except adultery. In this answer, He affirms the unity of the married ones, based on the fact that God made¹²⁴ the human being as man and woman, and therefore the one who unites himself with a woman he completes himself in such a total mode with her, so that they compose a unit. The man has become the whole man through this woman, and vice versa. God Himself united them by the fact that He made the human being as man and woman, by the fact that each one becomes the whole human being in the union with the other one, and this unity that each of them has found it cannot be disintegrated and redone with another partner. By no longer respecting one another as person, but treating one another as objects of pleasure that doesn’t last for long, these ones fall off the dignity of man, which they have received it through creation: “Answering, He said: Didn’t you read that the One Who made them at the beginning, he made them man and woman? And he added: For that the man will leave his father and his mother and he will unite himself with his woman and both of them will be a body. So that they no longer are two, but one body. Therefore, what God united, let the man not to divide” (Mt. 19: 4-6).” (Stăniloae 1997: 124)

“Based on the Savior’s word, the Orthodox Church doesn’t divorce the married people, except in the case that one of them has broken the unit between them by committing adultery. But the Orthodox Church doesn’t admit somebody to wed for more than three times. For the second marriage it is imposed a repentance and a forbidding from the Holy Impartation for two years, and for the third marriage – for five years. And in the prayers from this marriage, it is asked forgiveness for the sins of the ones who are wedded: “Master, Lord God.... Forgive the lawlessness of Your servants, by calling them to repentance, and give them the forgiveness for their mistakes, the cleaning of their sins... the willing and the unwilling sins, You Who know the helplessness of the human nature”. But when one of the husbands died, the other one is admitted to marriage without churchly divorce, because of considering the precious marriage as extinguished (Rom. 7: 2).” (Stăniloae 1997: 124-125)

“The husband’s “home” is the place where his wife is, and the wife’s “home” is the place where her husband is, or better said the “home” is composed by both of them, as expression of the “us”.

An edifice where the beloved one no longer lives, it has become deserted and proof that what was lending to it its character of “home” it was the presence of the beloved one. The one who love one another with the whole their heart, they open their heart to each other, namely their intimacy. This heat that is open to the beloved one it isn't only the self-revealing of the subject in his infinite depths, but it is also the affection which this subject opens himself with in order to receive the other one." (Stăniloae 1992: 276)

"In genesis, God motivated, after bringing Adam to existence, the bringing to existence of another human being - namely Eva - by saying that "it is not good the man to be alone."

Through this word, it was indicated, firstly, the man's need for a woman, and vice versa. This was shown by Christ on the occasion of His participation to the wedding in Cana Galilee. The connection between man and woman is important for from of their union come other people to existence. And the union which another man is brought to existence through, it isn't only a bodily union, for the body isn't separated from the soul. Therefore, there is a special connection between a man and a woman, in order to develop within them a unity of thought and of feeling, which is not only to give birth to another human being, but to also give the born child a unitary education. But, besides this, the parents help on one another, by bringing, each one of them what is characteristic to him. Each one exceeds on himself in what is bodily in the union with another, and they do this not only in what regards the child they have brought to existence, but also as fulfilling an accentuated responsibility of one for another. The permanent connection between a man and a woman it highlights a special responsibility they have for one another, and also their united responsibility for their children and in front of God. By this, the family becomes a school, and it accustoms the human being to his responsibility for one another and in front of God. This is for, in their responsibility for their children, the parents feel the responsibility, the gratitude, and the urge for praying, in front of God. This is for He makes them as their children's parents, for in the birth of their children there is working the power of God too. The children belong to their parents, but they are given them by God, with a connection amongst them which they to exceed themselves through, as lonely beings, in order to be created within them a unity in thinking, in feeling, and in common request from God. The man wouldn't have been able to have another as a you permanently united with his self, if he hadn't had a third one in a common responsibility; in such a case, the human being would have been always changing a you for another you, and he would have always become a you to another, but he wouldn't have even been permanently united in this quality with the same one." (Stăniloae 1995: 100-101)

"An often changing of the man or of the woman, it doesn't accomplish the exceeding of either of them, for it doesn't actualize their common responsibility for a third one. The unity created between man and woman, through a permanent connection, it gives each of them a greater understanding for the other one. Each one helps and encourages the another and each one also corrects the another in a lacking pride manner. They are one and they still are two. This dual unity gives them the power to get along with one another, to help one another, and to correct one another without humiliating on one another. Each one help, encourages, and corrects the another as on himself, through the responsible example he gives to another, forcing himself, for this responsibility and on this purpose, to be increasingly good. Each of them lives the another's successes as his own, and he feels responsible for another as for himself, for he lives the another as given him by God. They have in common not only the material things, but also the gifts and the joys of the soul. I need somebody to unveil me, to understand me, to make me whole, and to strengthen me as fully as possible; it won't suffice to me, if I fully unveil only myself; or, I cannot fully unveil myself without being also discovered by another, with love, in the good things, but also in the things which I must become better in. It is about a discovering of one another, that is, in the same time, a reciprocal help for advancing in the good things. And only the permanent husbands, who rejoice together and who tolerate one another, only those can accomplish this function. It is another meaning which the man needs the woman and the woman needs the man in." (Stăniloae 1995: 101)

"In the word of God: "It's not good to be the man alone", it is implied such a love between a man and a woman, who must become increasingly spiritual in the help they give to one another, in their common responsibility for children and in front of God. The two husbands wouldn't love on one another in a higher spiritual degree, if they moved towards one another exclusively and in a locked-up manner. It is possible to show the spirituality of their love by commonly manifesting that love for a third one, namely for a child. The joy of each one for their kid, it becomes thus even greater and, in the same time, it is being spiritualized. In this openness for their child, it is given also the need for openness towards the other people. This helps the husbands also to spiritualize their love." (Stăniloae 1995: 101-102)

"I see in the other husband new dimensions, when I see him loved by our child too. I love my wife even more when I see her loving our children. On the other hand, the mother remains mother only to her children, but she is more fully illuminated to me in her kindness, when I see her directed towards others too, but in another manner than as a loving mother. Neither other have to claim her love to be as the love she has in her quality as mother for her children, or as wife for his husband. The love has multiple dimensions and in each one of these dimensions the love can progress infinitely." (Stăniloae 1995: 102)

"Where does come from, this strength given me by another, by the simple fact that he stands beside me, or he tells me an encouraging word that reduces the stress related to the hardships which I am going to endure? I see in the presence of another next to me, firstly, a judgment that relativizes the hardship which I give overwhelming proportions to, or the importance of the pleasure which seems to me that I will find it in a deed alluring me too easily. It is some kind of bringing me back to reality, to the true reality, beyond the superficial reality. I see that I mustn't absolutize the importance of the present hardships or of the present pleasures. I have more in another's person, who stays beside me, than in any hardship or than in any egotistic pleasure. And he helps me to discover, on myself, in what I have deeper and more imperishable within me, and he gives me the possibility of overcoming the present hardships or the temptation of the present pleasures. By this, my sight is opened on another life plan, a live superior to the perishing life. The another brings me to a greater sapience, when I am about throwing myself, recklessly, in present and dangerous pleasures, forgetting about my fellow humans and thinking only at myself." (Stăniloae 1995: 102)

Fasting

“Fasting with the body is in itself an act of spiritual growth. It is a straining of the will and a restoring of the spirit’s reigning upon the body. In the Christian conception, especially in the Orthodox one, the soul and the body do not live their life in an isolated manner, but, normally, the soul must spiritualize the body and the body must be then environment for the spirit’s work.” (Stăniloae 1992: 120)

“The Holy Fathers highlight that, as effect of the fasting, in addition to the weakening of all other body’s lusts, especially, the preservation of the purity, The ones who specially need to fast are the young people.” (Stăniloae 1992: 120-121)

Fear

“At Jesus Christ one can see in all the clarity these features of suffering passions, which at us are infected by sin and they can be only gradually purified. “There exists a fear according to the nature and a fear opposite to the nature”, said Saint Maximos the Confessor. About us we could say that the natural fear we do not have it anymore but in the form of the fear opposite to the nature. At Jesus it does not exist but the first one. The fear according to the nature it is the defensive movement of the being through contraction or retreat. The fear opposite to the nature is the same movement without the right judgment and with the loss of self-control.

Although integrally passive, this fear consistent with the nature or just because of that, it is more fully hold in the harness of the will, not the one of a gnostic will, but the one of a general will of the human nature, subordinated to the decision of the unique hypostasis from Jesus Christ.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“On us, any passion which starts from our nature and which, according to its meaning, it is irreproachable, it kidnaps us and it makes us sinful. Firstly, because the hypostatically specified will it is not a more accentuated degree of will, but one specified in an autonomist-sinful sense. The second one, because in our nature is mixed also the sin and it infiltrates itself through any suffering but not-sinful feature, according to its sense. We are servants of the sin through any lustily feature, and we are chained, “thrown”, into a sinful existence, because even the hypostatic free will through which we should aid ourselves, it is sinful too. In our case the “passion” is “passion” in the full etymological meaning of the word, because we cannot master it through our will. At Jesus the sinful passion does not exist, and the irreproachable passion is dominated by His will, firstly, right because the sin is not in Him, to give power to the passion and, secondly, because of His hypostatically specified will is the will of the divine Logos. Jesus is not definitively downed by the force of the hunger or of by the fear of death, giving up like a consequence of the temptation to remove them by any means. No matter how much the passion tormented Him, He remained with His will, not downed.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Progressing, the faith becomes fear of God. On one hand, not the faith is born out of the fear of God, but the fear is born out of faith. This is for in order to fear Him, you must believe in Him. On the other hand, the faith cannot develop without crossing through fear or, the faith might be helped from the beginning by fear (Acts 2: 37). The faith isn’t purely theoretical either at the beginning, but it has, through the fear that accompanies the faith, an existential character. A faith which hasn’t reached the fear yet, or which hasn't been accompanied by fear since the beginning, it hasn't gained a satisfying efficiency for starting the deeds." (Stăniloae 1992: 100)

"The fear of God is the opposite of the fear of world. The fear of God has the purpose of overwhelming the fear of world. The fear of world's pains and tribulations makes us throwing ourselves with the whole recklessness towards the world's pleasures and towards the prosperous situations which can spare us of eventual needs. The fear of world it tides us to the world, it makes us obeying the world, and it makes us not to listen to the higher calling from God that is made us by faith. That's why the world's attraction force, manifested not only through the addiction to the world's pleasures, but also through the fear of world, it must be counterbalanced by an even greater fear: by the fear of God. This is because of not being us able, from the beginning, to feel the joys which God will make us partakers to, and therefore not being us able to detach ourselves from the world for those joys, we must be detached from the world by an act of power, by an act of frightening, by a bigger fear, namely by the fear of God. That's why the spiritual writers discern two sorts of fears of God: the fear felt by servants – namely the fear of His punishment, and the fear out of love – namely the fear of not being us deprived of His kindness. The first one belongs to the beginners, while the second one belongs to the advanced ones. But neither the fear of God of the beginners it isn't totally weakness, but it is also a great power of facing fear of world – this last fear being only weakness and slavery and totally lacking the freedom. The fear of world we suffer it for it dominates us by weakening our will. The fear of God is a force that strengthens our will that makes us active factors instead of passive puppets. Even in the fear of God there is a power from God." (Stăniloae 1992: 100-101)

"Heidegger discerned between the fear of "something from within world" (Furcht) and the fear of world's emptiness from all over, namely of existing within world, which is felt as menacing on each moment with its platitude and nothingness, a modality of an own living making its intimacy transparent to everyone (Angst)." (Stăniloae 1992: 101)

"The man fallen in the grey form of existence he no longer knows the fear of platitude (Angst). This type of fear burst up sometimes in the man's conscience, as a short revelation of the intimacy that sees itself being drown and it wants to save itself. The man has become so much dishabituated of watching his intimacy in its face, and of an own existence differing from the common clichés, so that he gets scared by some revelations and he throws himself even more in platitude. This is the fear (Furcht) of something from within world, or it is the fear of losing something from within world. This is the fear of not losing the occasions of pleasure, a fact that could turn him back to his intimacy, to living through himself, or of being deprived of the comfortable support of the world.” (Stăniloae 1992: 101)

“In the Heidegger’s theory on fear, we can find three truths which actually coincide to the Christian teaching on fear: first, that the man’s life on earth is inevitably accompanied by fear; second, that through this fear the human being has been given a shield against the danger of being drown within world; third, that the man has perverted this fear that must defend him against world and to tie him to God, Who is the Source of the authentic life, concentrated in the intimacy of the spirit, because of the man has transformed this fear in a fear of not being deprived of world, in a fear of not being detached from the world or of the existence in the world’s grey horizon, in a fear of living as spiritual being.” (Stăniloae 1992: 101)

“The fear of God that is born out of the faith in Him, it would be a invigoration of the primordial fear, a fear characteristic to the man’s spiritual fear, an invigoration of “Angst” - in Heidegger’s terminology. Although, in the primordial state there wasn’t only this fear of the man, of getting lost by being detached from God, but there was also a fear united with the trust in God.” (Stăniloae 1992: 102)

“Heidegger avoided to reckon “Angst” as the fear of God, and he reckoned it as fear of World, but not fear of losing the world, but fear of getting lost within world; he reckoned “Angst” as not a fear drawing the man towards world, as “Furcht” is, but a fear that warns the man regarding the world’s vanity. But we reckon that the primordial and fundamental fear of the human being, that of falling in the sin’s automatism, or the passions, of the world, couldn’t be explained without the man’s sentiment that he is responsible for preserving and developing his spiritual character. And the sentiment of this responsibility, the conscience that he will be hold accountable for his falling in the world’s arms, one couldn’t explain without the existence of a superior forum, of a spiritual character too, which the man depends on. If there had been only the man with the world, having to be hold accountable by nobody, for his complete assimilation to the world, the man’s fear of this perspective could have been totally unexplainable. In the fear of being merged to the world (Angst), it is revealed to the man his character of spiritual being, created for being tied to God Who can save his as spiritual being.” (Stăniloae 1992: 102)

“The fear of sin by getting attached to the world it is actually the fear of God. If through faith we are given a beginning of evidence of the Person of God, through fear it is increased to us the revealing of this evidence and this increasing we feel it as such a strong force than it is able to weaken or to break apart all the bonds tying us to the world: the addiction, the fear, and the worldly care. God Who reveals us His power in fear, he makes us fearing not to fall in the sin's arms, or in the world's arms; He makes us not to fear of losing the occasions to be happy within world. The fear of God overwhelms the fear of world, namely the fear of not losing the world. The fear of God promotes, on the contrary, the fear of not getting us lost within world, by getting attached to the world; the fear of God gives us the fear of world in the second meaning, namely it gives us the fear of world as danger for our true and eternal existence." (Stăniloae 1992: 102)

"In the fear of God it is manifested the awareness about our eternal destiny of not being assimilated to the world. In the fear of God it is manifested the awareness about the nothingness which the world menaces us with; it is manifested the awareness about the fact that the world contravenes to our eternal destiny, a destiny that is provided by living through the own intimacy." (Stăniloae 1992: 102)

"In the fear of God we are revealed the awareness of an authority, constituted of a superior to us reality, and not by an inferior one as the world is, the awareness of an authority which we cannot disregard. We cannot do whatever we want, and we cannot sink ourselves within world for we feel the interdiction from, namely a forum which we will be held accountable by." (Stăniloae 1992: 102-103)

"In the fear of committing sin, in the fear of falling into the world's arms, which is one with the fear of God, we aren't aware of an immediate danger, but of a future danger, namely of a sufferance that will burden our existence forever. Besides, even the deep fear from within man's nature, that of not being lost within world (Angst) it is a fear of an infinite evil. From here it comes also the infinity of that fear. We aren't afraid of the fact that, by falling in the world's waves, we will actually disappear, but we fear that our existence will become forever insupportable. If there had existed only the world and the total losses from within world, that "Angst" which Heidegger speaks about, it wouldn't have existed. From here it comes out the awareness that the consequences of our falling won't be shown in their whole seriousness until after we will have crossed on the plan of the eternal life. That's why the fear of God is a fear of being us judged by Him, because His judgment will seal our fate forever; it is the fear of the last judgment and of the torment of a non-authentic, non-full existence." (Stăniloae 1992: 103)

"The fear of God is undetached from the thought at the final judgment. The Eastern asceticism recommends us to ceaselessly meditate at the final judgment, in order the fear of God to increase within us, and so us to avoid the sin." (Stăniloae 1992: 103)

“As the faith, growing up through the faith that spring out of faith, it experiences some transformations, likewise the fear still persists on the higher levels of the spiritual life, but it gets ennobled.” (Stăniloae 1992: 103)

“Some spiritual writers recommend us to think at death, as means of purification of passions. Obviously, not the fear of death scares a true believer, but the thought at being judged by God, a fact that follows after death. The perspectives of a definitive and total death it won’t preserve the fear within man – at most some boredom for the existence’s lack of sense. Only because death brought after it the judgment and an eternal life, one pays attention to death. Thinking at death in itself it is helpful too, at least to the beginners, because of bringing in front of the soul the world’s nothingness and the nothingness of the world’s promises.” (Stăniloae 1992: 103-104)

“Thinking at death it makes thinking at God more frequent – which the strengthening of faith started with – increasing thus the inward meditation. Or the fear of and the thought at death aren’t else but thinking at God associated to the awareness of the own sins and to the fear of judgment.” (Stăniloae 1992: 104)

“Because of this separation from God and from people we have fallen under the mastery of the death. But the death causes us the fear. Due to this fear, we wait for God embodied as man, and Who defeats the death through His lack of sin, and Who gives us too, the power of receiving the death and of defeating the death, despite the fact that we fear the death, a fear he kept too, as man.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 155)

Fellow Human / Neighbor

“God makes Himself known to us in all our difficulties, when we are trying to see our mistakes staying at the basis of these difficulties. Often, these difficulties occur because we have forgotten to see, in all the things we have, the gifts from God and, consequently, to use at our turn these gifts towards other people. This is because God wants to make out of us givers of His gifts, in order to grow up in the love for others by doing so.” (Stăniloae 2003: 147)

“Therefore, while things are good to us, and also while things are bad to us, let’s think at our responsibility we have for our brother towards God. In both cases this responsibility keeps awake, within our conscience, the thought at the Person of God, it keeps us in relation with him and it makes us thinking at Him. And this cogitation deepens our knowledge about Him. In the first case, God gives us the good things and he invites us to unite ourselves with Him and with others in love. In the second case, he rebukes us for we haven’t done this and He urges us to repent and to do in the future what we didn’t do in the past. In both cases God speaks to us, by calling us to answer Him through our deeds.” (Stăniloae 2003: 147-148)

“God addresses us and wakes up our responsibility in an especially penetrating mode, through the faces of the needy. He Himself told this (Mt. 25: 31-46). God highlights the incommensurable value of the man as man, before Him; this value is so high, so that Himself identifies with the man’s cause. In such cases we must think at the fact that, like God asks us to help other people, likewise he asks other people to help us in need.” (Stăniloae 2003: 147-148)

“In each poor and persecuted and ill man, Christ meets us, by asking us, through descent, for our help. In the stretched forwards hand of the poor there is the hand of Christ, in his faded voice we hear the faded voice of Christ; the poor’s sufferance because of the need and of the humiliation we keep him, it is the sufferance of Christ on the cross, a sufferance that we prolong it. In all the things God descends towards us and makes Himself known to us. Just this descent makes known His mystery above any understanding; this descent makes obvious His love, a love that exceeds any kind of love in the world.” (Stăniloae 2003: 147-148)

“Who does not feel, when he descends with his intimacy in front of the intimacy of his fellow human who is burdened by sin, that he wants to take and he takes, actually, this responsibility upon him, at least partially? And, from the burdened with responsibility ones, who doesn’t feel himself relieved of responsibility, when he has the luck to meet somebody in his intimacy, to listen to his confession and to be willing to relieve his destiny? But this descending into the intimacy of the humanity of others, it is only partially accomplished by the common man. So, also the relieve of others’ guilt, by taking that guilt upon himself, it is only partial too, and from an extremely limited external circle of people, but there takes place a real passing of the sinful burden from one to another, at least partially, because otherwise we will be deceived by the generous sentiment that we can, by participating to responsibility, to relieve the other one, like also the sentiment of relieve which is lived by the other one when somebody makes himself responsible for that one. Like we told before, the ethical impulses of our being would otherwise prove to be some illusions.” (Stăniloae 1993)

Forgiveness

“As the human being added deeds to his past, he is increasingly preoccupied with repairing what he didn’t do as he should have, in his past. He regrets the unwilling lack of attention towards the people who were nigh to him, and he aims to repair that in the future. He relives, in another mode, those moments, and when repairing them he regrets what he did wrong on those moment. The regrets, as remorse and as modifications of the being, are more persistent to the one who wasn’t paying attention in a conscious manner, than to the one who wasn’t aware about that. By this, the human being becomes more attentive in his feeling. He becomes more sensitive towards his memories, and this sensitiveness makes him more attentive with the ones whom he disregarded, in order to gain their forgiveness and in order to gain the forgiveness from God.” (Stăniloae 1995: 137)

“The uniqueness and the unforgettable imprinting within me, of a person, it can be shown also in my helplessness of forgetting the evil that person did to me, when I am unable to overcome that evil and to see the positive mystery, full of riches, of that person, which overwhelms an evil act done by that person to me. But this also disturbs my sight directed upon myself, and it keeps me in an enmity that is one with the superficialness. By that I lower him and myself, on the level of non-spiritual beings. This isolates me from everybody, but it keeps me, in the same time, as tied through the evil memory and through the continuous lack of love, in a tormenting relation with them. That’s why is so necessary to forgive all the ones who wronged us, as it is also necessary to receive forgiveness from all the ones who we did something wrong, or whom we didn’t the good we owed them. This is necessary in order us to get rid of the tormenting memory of other persons and to restore forever our communication with them, as ones who become better and more open.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 53)

Forsaking

“Usually, the successes which somebody has achieved through diverse restraints and by achieving several virtues, they expose him to the vain glory and to the pride. That’s why God established to come upon him annoyances, in order to heal him of these passions too, passions which have occurred in a new form after no longer being able to found themselves on motifs of wealth or on other vain brightness. Because of this, the ascetic feels those as some kind of forsaking by God, after he has been feeling God close to him always, helping him in his efforts. Given the positive purpose of this forsaking, the Holy Fathers called it as pedagogical or advising forsaking, and they discerned this forsaking from that forsaking in sense of rejection. This forsaking comprises not only the external troubles but also some inwards discouragements. It is what John of the Cross called it passive purification, which, after the trees of the passions will have disappeared, it will extirpate even those trees’ roots, and during which the man lives the sentiment of discouragement and of boredom and that of a void and of a dreadful aridity.” (Stăniloae 1992: 135-136)

Freedom

“Even when the human being deviates from good, namely towards evil, it won’t disappear all traces and desire for good, from within him, as his nature’s desire. Or, even if the human being denies, in his conscience and through his freedom, his connection with God, he won’t be able to abolish within himself all the traces of, or desire for: good. In the remained good, there is a root of a connection with God, more or less wanted, namely a root of the holiness. This is for being good it means being good to another person, so that it means recognizing the person as the highest value, connected to the imperishable God. And in this is hidden the feeling that above all existence, there stays the person, as connected to the Person or to the eternal and creator Community of Persons.” (Stăniloae 1995: 31-32)

“God’s freedom relatedly to the universe, it can give the man too, a freedom. If God, though He thought the universe from eternity, He still wasn’t forced to create the universe, or He could destroy the universe thought by Him from eternity and to create another universe which He could have thought at, or He actually thought at, choosing the universe He wants, for He can eternally think like that, and at diverse things, in order not to force either the people to fulfill those. God’s freedom from the foreseen things, it can also give the people a freedom referring to the things foreseen by God. The universe doesn’t force God, by any means, to something. But God can commit Himself to something and God doesn’t disclaim this voluntary commitment. And by this, God asks the human being to take heed to His commitment. And if the human being doesn’t do that, it means that the human being will show himself as disobedient to God, and that will separate the human being’s soul from God, and it will bring sufferance to the human being which can be even eternally prolonged, if the human being doesn’t repent.” (Stăniloae 1995: 35-36)

“The fact itself that the time isn’t used by the conscious creatures only in order to advance towards their union with God, it shows not only the creatures’ freedom, but also the fact that neither the creation and the leading of the universe towards the union with God, nor the time, they aren’t imposed by a necessity of God’s being, but they are deeds of His free will, and they have to be accepted by people in a corresponding freedom.” (Stăniloae 1995: 60)

“(…) our being remains free in relationship with this superior being. This relationship had its analogy in the relationship of a human person with another human person, relationship the freedom of both persons is preserved in. In this relationship, the man exists for another person and he serves that person, but by doing so he enriched himself. (...) in serving the other persons he freely engages himself, and by doing the effort to bring joy to the persons he serves, himself increases in freedom and in spiritual content, not to mention the warmth of the life coming to him from the communion or from the love of those persons.” (Stăniloae 2003: 19)

“(…) the maximum union of God with the man who believes, it isn’t done without man’s agreement.” (Stăniloae 2003: 47)

“(…) Christ – the divine-human Person, He is the system, as comprising as it is also open and promoting the freedom, in the ones who want to be saved through Him.” (Stăniloae 2003: 79)

“The man uses his rationality in order to adapt the things to his multiple needs, and continuously moving. The man finds other conformities too between the things and his needs and, through this, other and other harmonies of the world, other beauties, and others dimensions of the world. Like the nature is in movement and the man can use the nature’s movement, likewise his needs are in a continuous movement. The man discovers thus the meanings of the things, which are, on one hand, the same through their continuity and therefore they can be known in common, and on the other hand they are always new in the development and in the discovered aspects, and therefore they can elevate the man to an increasingly higher spiritual understanding. The man does this for the components themselves the things are composed by, those components are elastic and mobile and they can be combined in diverse modes, but always inside some limits, likewise the human being can move himself gradually without exceeding a certain line of development. Therefore, it exists a certain elasticity of the modalities of combining the component forces of the nature likewise there exists a certain elasticity of the man’s living modalities and of spiritual-physical self-leading modalities. The physical nature and the human nature offer an always open space for exercising the man’s liberties.” (2003: 365)

“The nature’s passive contingency it corresponds the man’s contingency in freedom. Through freedom, the man himself disposes in certain ways upon the mode of his existence and upon the one of the nature. Through his freedom of choice, the man is image of God Who, as model, He could create or not, the world, and the man can be helped in his work of actualizing ones or others of the world’s virtuality.” (2003: 377)

“God continuously stimulates the people’s freedom in their attitude towards Him, through His remaining in a free report with them.” (2003: 404)

“The freedom from the established order, which represents the reached stage, it doesn’t mean a freedom also from an order that keeps open the perspective for a continuous progress in the infinity of the love for God and for our fellow humans. Otherwise, the freedom can be a freedom that doesn't ascend in the love for God and for the fellow humans, but it is a pretext for passing from a passion to another. That doesn't mean achieving the liberty, but only changing the master." (2003: 519)

"Only serving God through love, God Who loves us, and also serving our fellow humans, out of the responsibility towards God, we increase in our freedom for we increase in our communion with the One Who respects our freedom. We understand this out of the fact that only in the loving and reciprocally serving and respectful relation between people, the freedom increases." (2003: 519)

"The Eastern Christian spirituality, with its dogmas open towards infinite, with the purifying of passions and sustaining the prayer rules, it is the best method for achieving the true freedom into God, and also for the progress in knowing God and of the fellow humans in the communion through experiencing; it is the best method ensuring the advancement on the line wanted also by the Providence of God, a providence that has reached its highest work into Christ. This is for the Providence reveals itself into Christ as a plan and as a real work in order to save and deify the creation into Him." (2003: 520)

"The freedom isn't a caprice, it isn't freedom for sinning – which would mean slavery, narrowing in egotism and in repeating the same passions which overcome our freedom; the freedom means liberation from the slavery that appears to be liberty, from the slavery that cunningly hides itself under the mask of the freedom." (Stăniloae 2006: 131)

"The freedom we are given by the Ghost, it goes hand in hand and grows up with the spiritual life. The Holy Ghost is the Ghost of the freedom, for He is the Ghost of the life and, by calling us to freedom and by helping us to increase in freedom, this liberty becomes reason for life to us. "The law of the Ghost of the life has liberated me of sin and of death" (Rom. 8: 2)." (Stăniloae 2006: 131)

"Saint Cyril of Alexandria related the power of the Ghost of making us free, to His dignity of Master of the Self. Actually, the one who masters upon himself he is free. But is free only that one who isn't dominated by passions and who can liberate also other from passions." (Stăniloae 2006: 131)

"The real freedom it is the willingly accepted slavery of the good, of the love of another, of the love for another, of the willing obligation for the neighbor's good, towards God Who asks us for serving the others' good and to our real good. Only in real freedom the serving is real too. There is the slavery of the love which is in the same time the real freedom: not the freedom of the bodily love for yourself, but of loving your eternal good and the good of your neighbor, good that has as basis the love for God, the Only One in Whom is ensured our good and everybody's. The real good never is a good in exclusiveness, but it stays in free and loving relation with the other people. The one who doesn't serve the others, in this sense, he neither serves himself. In preserving this freedom - which is one with the slavery towards God, the One Who makes us really free - Saint Apostle Peter urged us against the falsifications of this freedom, by saying: "Live like free people, but not like having the freedom as cover for your cunningness, but like some servant of God" (II Peter 3: 16; see also Gal. 5: 13)." (Stăniloae 2006: 131)

"According to the law of the non-falsified freedom, we will be judged if we do not keep it (Jas. 2: 12). This is for only the law of this freedom obliges us interiorly to the love for God and for our fellow humans; without it we remain in the slavery of the egotism, which can only put of the mask of the freedom. The law of this freedom is the "consummate law", but it consists in fulfilling the commandments of the love and it will make us happy through our deeds and by deeply imprinting our being with the love (Jas. 1: 25)." (Stăniloae 2006: 131)

"The real freedom is shown in our effort of not letting ourselves to be enslaved by the passions - which always are egotistic - but of committing good deeds. This real freedom implies the effort of collaboration with the work of the Holy Ghost. The grace, far from enslaving our liberty, it helps us to be free for this collaboration with the Holy Ghost." (Stăniloae 2006: 131)

"The freedom of our collaboration with the Holy Ghost it is implied even in the fact that the grace is a work of the Ghost as Person and through it the Holy Ghost wants to bring us to the perfection of the love. In itself this collaboration with the Person of the Holy Ghost it is being manifested and it is increasing the love between us and Him, namely our consummation." (Stăniloae 2006: 131)

"You cannot become free for good or for love, except in relation with another person who encourages you towards good, who inspires you only aspirations towards good, and who communicates you power which increase your powers in committing the good. But this means that your own effort is necessary too, in order to use the liberty that is being awakened to you, to maintain it, and to strengthen it, in order you to use your powers which have been increased by the relation with the other person." (Stăniloae 2006: 131-132)

“But there is no absolute freedom or absolute free will. There is only a freedom that serves mostly to the evil, a false freedom, and there is also a liberty in good. Within the man who lives by his own will, given the weakness of the nature or of the will, the liberty is easily being brought towards evil deeds, or it hardly resists the temptations towards evil. Such freedom cannot decide by itself towards doing exclusively good deeds. The free will, or the absolutely neutral freedom, they are an arbitrary construction of our cogitation. But to the liberty to do good deed – namely to the real freedom – one cannot reach without being helped by a superior person, although there is simultaneously needed a free effort from the side of the helped person too. To the real liberty, or to the freedom to do good deeds, the human person doesn’t reach either by himself or by being forced by a superior person.” (Stăniloae 2006: 132)

“The true liberty isn’t an appanage of the singularized individual, neither of the individual locked up in immanent, but of the one who is in loving relation with God through the Ghost, but in this relation the human person receives, on one hand, the Holy Ghost’s help, and on the other hand, the human person at his turn he makes efforts for remaining in this relation and to still increase in it. In this relation with God and by God’s help, the man doesn’t estrange to himself, but only by this he really accomplished himself.” (Stăniloae 2006: 132)

“Each Church’s limb is approved by the other limbs and he is responsible towards them, for he is approved by the Church as whole and obliged towards the Church, having by this access to the whole Ghost, and being obliged to help to Ghost actualization as whole in all the gifts the Ghost grants. Each believer has by this the feeling that he is in the whole Christ and that he is obliged to help to Christ’s actualization, as whole, through the Church.” (Stăniloae 2006: 133)

“The Christian freedom supposes an absolute which the human being must fight for, or which he refuses. Without this absolute, the human being lacks any support, or any reason which to affirm himself for. On a plan of eternal and universal relativity, or of strict natural process, the struggle for freedom, which on one hand it supposes the freedom, and on the other hand it promotes the freedom, it would lose any stimulus. That’s why the freedom has two forms: it is the freedom achieved by fighting for the absolute good and for imposing the victory of the absolute good, and there is the freedom achieved by fighting for liberating the person from the enslaving passions, for the communion in love with the other persons fuelled at their turn from the communion with the supreme Person, or with God, in this communion being the true and supreme good. The one who has reached here, he has the true freedom, that freedom identical to the true and infinite good, which he no longer want go get out from, and which he is no longer able to get out from, in the sense of an acquired helplessness. This is for he has in that freedom the ceaseless and endless novelty of the good irradiating from the supreme Person, and he manifests himself in the interpersonal communion.” (Stăniloae 1997: 172)

“Then there is the freedom that opposes this union of itself with the absolute Good, or it refuses the communion with the supreme Person Who is source of love for the communion with other persons. This freedom has something equivocal in itself. On one hand it allows itself to be carried away by the egotism of the enslaving impulses, and in this sense, it is a false freedom, and on the other hand, urged by these impulses, it opposes the true freedom which would rejoice of the communion with the supreme Person, by having the impression that this opposition is the true freedom.” (Stăniloae 1997: 172-173)

“Both forms of freedom – the one searching for the communion with God and the one rejecting this communion (o. n.) – become accustomed to affirm themselves in eternity, each one reckoning that itself is the true freedom. Thus, the one who isn’t in communion with God he won’t be ever brought out by God from this denial of His, which the man reckoned as being the true freedom; likewise, the one who is in communion with God he won’t even get out of this communion, for he feels increasingly justified in the true freedom, for he has in it the endless and eternally new plenitude of the life. So, God doesn’t impede either the ones who are in their egotistic narrowing to eternally remain in it, a narrowing that they interpret to themselves as being the true freedom.” (Stăniloae 1997: 173)

“The reality of the human beings’ freedom it is tied to the reality of the interpersonal communion and, in the last analysis, it is tied to their communion with God. A real freedom conceived outside communion it cannot be understood, and a consummate communion, and also a freedom in the eternal happiness amongst the human persons, without a fuelling of it through the communion with the supreme Person Who has become man, namely with Christ, it is equally inconceivable.” (Stăniloae 1997: 173)

“Of course, the God’s judgment with eternal effects, it hides a great mystery. A mystery at the height of the reality of human being and God. The great mystery on the man’s side it is that the human being can eternally stay in front of so many signs of the existence of God and in the middle of the greatest sufferance, in the unbearable monotony, and still to contest God and not to try the solution of getting out of all of these by accepting the communion with God. The human being rather could accept the senseless, the absurd in everything, than to accept the meaning through God. And this is due to the great temptation of the human being’s autonomy. The human being defends this autonomy of his, for he thinks that he can do everything through it, for he thinks that he can satisfy all his desires which have enslaved him by becoming his passions.” (Stăniloae 1997: 181-182)

“The two mysteries cannot be separated, or God doesn’t want them to be separated since He has created the human being. If God had destroyed the sinner, God would have forgotten about the sinner in a despise gesture, and the human being would have lost his depth as mystery. Likewise, the relations between God and the human being. Also, God doesn’t make the human being partaker to happiness without the human being’s will, because of the happiness consist of receiving God’s love, by the human being. But the man doesn’t want to receive God’s love, and God doesn’t want to impose His love forcedly, because this would be also a human being’s emptying of his mystery. Even through the eternal hell it is affirmed the human being’s eternal value and freedom. If the man knew that by using his freedom against God’s will, he would be finally destroyed, he would be limited in his freedom. Only if the human being knows that he can eternally oppose God, he will really be free. The human being is free and he has a full dignity only if he will know that he is eternally unconditioned, namely he is eternally free. Of course, the human being wouldn’t have been free even if he had known that his free affirming has no consequences. If that had been the case, the human being wouldn’t have manifested any fervor in affirming his freedom. The free affirming assumes some risks. But the true risks suppose the persistence in existence of the one who takes those risks.” (Stăniloae 1997: 181-182)

“The unification of the entire human dynamism in the relentlessly increasing love, it reveals us the most profound aspect of the spirit as freedom. This is for the liberty is the infinite possibility of the clean spirit, always renewed, of ceaselessly surpassing its finitude. The freedom is the continuous ascension towards God, the infinite and unconditioned origin of the human spirit. The freedom is on one hand the mode of accomplishing our nature, and on the other hand it is in its essence the experiencing of the infinite. It is finite while standing unmoved in itself and it is infinite while moving towards God, through freedom.” (Stăniloae 1997: 301-302)

“Somehow, on earth is allowed latitude to the master of this world and to his servants, to do all the evil that they are capable of, in order their eternal condemnation to be fully justified. Also in this way, it is fully established the worthiness of the righteous ones to the eternal happiness and of the unbelievers to the endless torment.

Into the liberty let to the evil one on earth, it is also the cause for which in this eon the victory of the believers is nothing else but patience in sufferance. Like Christ, His mystical body lives in kenosis, in love, in humbleness and patience, by being exposed to beatings and persecution, from the evil ones.

The victory and the greatness of the adherents to Christ it would shine at the end, in enduring the death of the martyrdom. Even in the acts which the evil thinks that it can celebrate his triumph in, there will still shine the victory of the Christianity.

The idea of an end of the history, caused by a progress of the man into evil, it could appear not according to the greatness of God Who could not admit to see the failure of the world created by Him and to be imposed the world's liquidation by people. In fact, God does not put an end to the actual form of the world because He is forced by this development of the things. We make abstraction of the fact that this development is partially due to Him too, because He put Jesus Christ like "stone of stumbling" in the middle of the history, like a face directed continuously and claiming towards history in its course.

But even if the history does not reach such a phase, the divine act of its stopping seems to be founded, God could not produce this act, but He let the people to tear themselves apart, and after this general tearing apart to start the history of their development from the beginning. Of course, this wouldn't be but a repetition of the anterior course of the history, not bringing anything new like an achievement of the spirit.

But God isn't a God of repetition, or of monotony.

The actual form of the world, by being temporal and relative, it seems like the spiritual progress cannot be but limited into its framework, enclosed into a certain circle. When the mankind will have reached, like whole, the limits of this circle, respectively will have cut off its possibilities of progress, the present form of the world will have ended its existence." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Evagrius and Saint Maximos the Confessor, they said that God leads the man towards the peaks of the consummation, on a positive way, and on a negative way too. The first way, called Providence, it attracts the man upwards in a positive mode, by the beauty of the good, by the rationalities of the things, by the inward urges of man's conscience and, by and large, by everything God has done and does for us. The second way, called as judgment, it comprises the diverse punishments brought to us by God consequently to our sins, in order to attract us away from evil deeds, and through diverse deprivations of happiness in order to urge us to search for the true happiness even more. As the Providence is a permanent activity of God, likewise His judgment is being exercises continuously. By the first one, God calls us towards the good things, by showing us their beauty, and through the second one, by getting us scared, with the contrary things, like a Father guides his child on the right path; on the right path we encounter positive urges, while on the wrong path we encounter punishments.” (Stăniloae 1992: 134)

“The Providence’s way is a way followed out of own initiative, by voluntarily assuming the toils, and the way of judgment is the way which the one who hasn’t assumed willing toils is being pushed forcedly on. The first path is characteristic especially to the monks, while the second way is characteristic especially to the laymen.” (Stăniloae 1992: 135)

“By being the judgment permanently alternated to the Providence, it shows its efficiency at the beginning too, in order to urge the man on the ways of a cleaner life, making him leave a living dominated by passion and to chose a more restrained living. We must highlight here that the method of the judgment doesn’t cease even after some progress has been done in a virtuous life, but on the opposite, it will be intensified after advancing in that life in order to consummate that life. As neither the monk reaches satisfactory results, after some spiritual progress it comes upon himself too, some period of laziness and temptations, which to try him and to increase his virtue of being patient.” (Stăniloae 1992: 135)

“The method of the Providence determines us, especially to reject the pleasure’s temptations, namely the lust’s passions, while the method of the judgment determines us, especially to endure the trials through pain, which our passions of anger and pride are being weakened through.” (Stăniloae 1992: 136)

“The whole Revelation of God by free acts it shows God as not being conditioned by the world, but as taking in account the man’s freedom and as calling the man to unconditionally exercise his freedom.” (Stăniloae 2005: 11)

“Each moment of God revealing and each answer given by people Israel, it is a level of an action representing a suite of levels with ascending course. When the people Israel, as a whole, they definitively refuse to ascend the levels of this ascension, God direct His guiding work towards a small part of this people. In such conditions God no longer commits acts with positive consequences for the collective history of the people Israel, but he rather guides them through words and by describing a superior target which He wants to bring at, the ones who want to ascend towards that target. Instead of distinguishing between the people of Israel and the other peoples, the prophets distinguish increasingly more between the good ones amongst the people of Israel and amongst other peoples, and the bad ones: “And I will let into you gentle and humble people and they will fear the name of the Lord the remnants of Israel” (Zephaniah III: 12-13); “Search for the Lord, all the humble ones of the earth, make judgment and search for justice and chose these things, in order to be sheltered on the day of the Lord's anger" (Zephaniah II: 3). (Stăniloae 2005: 13)

"The divine paradigm doesn't work alone upon the seen material, especially when it is about a created being, endowed with freedom. The created being is called to work, at his turn, to accomplishing his image according to the divine paradigm." (Stăniloae 2005: 112)

"As subject, I cannot make myself as exclusively an object, not even to myself. When I look at me like at a subject, I elevate myself, in this quality of mine, above the form of object which I have been to give it to myself by the fact that I am a subject. Only the subject can place in state of objects, what he sees, what he does, and what he knows. Bu I cannot make on myself, by any means, as object. Neither can another subject make me only as object. And by my quality as subject, I totally escape from under his power. I constantly ascend above me, as subject; when I see myself as object, I ascend upon myself in my quality as ultimate decisional forum upon my eternal destiny, by feeling myself crossed through by the responsibility towards the supreme decisional Forum Who rather helps me by this than to annul me as subject. I feel that, and in the same time I know that I can refuse my responsibility in front of the supreme Forum, though I am aware of the fact that I can do that only by taking the risk of not accomplishing myself as a true human being. Properly-said, only by living God as Person, I can feel my responsibility towards Him, namely: I can feel myself too, as person. And in the refusal of fulfilling my responsibility, there isn't an affirmation of my freedom as subject, but it is rather an acceptance of the reign of some inferior passion upon me, and that diminishes me as subject." (Stăniloae 1995: 115-116)

"The person's existence as subject, it supposed the existence of a creator Subject, of the person and of all the things which the person feel himself responsible for, having in this not only the need for taking heed to that Subject and to the things, but also a certain power upon things. Here is shown another paradoxical character of the human person, another unity of the contrasts characterizing the human person; on one hand, the human person is a subject who cannot be reduced to the state of an object either by himself or by other human subjects, and not even by God; on the other hand, the human person cannot dispose upon them and he cannot exist by himself, neither can he exist without them. The human person moves as self-subject, but he maintains, on himself, as such, by freely recognizing his dependence on a supreme Subject Whom the human person is responsible for himself, for other people, and for rightly using the powers which the human person has been given with." (Stăniloae 1995: 116)

“God is Subject for He isn’t alone, and He is subject for He isn’t, in any way, separated from other Subjects. And only for God is pure and threefold Subject, He can be a creator Who isn’t submitted to an internal necessity, or to some condition differing from Him. And God is pure subject also for He can manifest Himself as Subject, by creating subjects out of nothing, out of His pure love, and for He maintains us in life as free subjects, through His clean and full of all power love, for he wants to be lived by other subjects as threefold and purely loving Subject, and us to answer His love with our love as subjects. That’s why He gives us the possibility us to be subjects and he wants us to be subjects. But for He wants us to love freely, he gives us also the possibility us to remain subjects even in our refusal to love, and even when we make of others only objects.” (Stăniloae 1995: 116-117)

“The universe is given to all people in common, in order to be filled up and mastered, in physical and spiritual sense, in common. All human beings feel that the universe doesn’t come from themselves, and they feel that through universe they are compelled by their Creator to be together and to help on one another, because only thus they can master the universe. Only thus, each human being can have more from the universe, and he can better understand the universe’s meanings, which come from God. Only thus, the human beings increase in the love amongst themselves. The universe asks for each man to exceed himself, towards others and towards God. By this, God asks all the people to recognize their dependence on Him, and on one another. The universe lasts in itself, but what the human being needs from the universe, it is perishable. The human beings last for they aren’t objects, as the things from universe are.” (Stăniloae 1995: 120)

“Did God foresee also the crooked modes of the images of His rationalities? This is a question difficult to answer to. One can answer that God foresaw them, and so He accepted them, for He didn’t want to create human beings without freedom, because they will actualize the images of His rationalities – thought from ever – in crooked modes. God didn’t want to behave towards the human being as a rigid authority, by forcing the human being to actualize the images of His rationalities as thought by Him. God, by creating the human being as a person, He wanted to manifest Himself, in relation with the human being, as towards a person who is, in certain aspect, equal to Him through his capacity of disposing on his freedom; God wanted to be with the human being in a relation like with a free person, for He is a free person too. A human being who worked as an automat, he wouldn’t have been a human being. God wanted, in a way we cannot understand, that the human being to be capable of surprising Him. This is for the persons can surprise one another. That’s why, some persons strive to be as careful as possible with others, in order not to surprise them unpleasantly. But God isn’t threatened by the surprises He allows as possible from the human being. Through these surprises, the human being doesn’t reach to make God uncomfortable, for God is the Creator and the Source of the life, for, by not remaining the human being in communion with God, or by rather crooking on himself through his will for crooking the things, the human being ends in the torments caused either by the poverty of his life or by the deformation of his life. This is for the cosmic nature annuls the evil effects of the human being's deeds, and the human nature torments the one who corrupts it, though the human being can give to himself a hideous form, non-annullable by God. And God has foreseen this, by and large, and He said in the Holy Scripture: "The ones who won't work the good things, they will be given the bad things." (Deut. 31: 29)." (Stăniloae 1995: 128-129)

"The Son of God ceaselessly preserves this freedom in the humanity He has assumed, as Hypostasis of it, so that He strengthens the humanity too, in freedom. He endures the irreproachable affects, of the humanity (hunger, thirst, tiredness, pain), the sufferings, and even death, not forcedly, but willingly. That's why He could defeat them. But He endured them in a real mode, in order Him to really defeat them, and, by that, to give us too, through communication with Him, as the One Who has become man amongst people, the power to endure them with a certain self-control." (Stăniloae 1995: 146)

"The Word Who has made the humanity as His own and Who communicate, on Himself, through it, to any human being, He works in a special mode in the human being who restores himself as a word responsible to Him. By this, God burns the human being with the fire of His love, and He awakens the human being from his carelessness, though He does that in an unseen manner. That's why, it is impossible to separate between the work of the transformative Word and the work of the human being awakened as responsible word." (Stăniloae 1995: 165)

"The love of God for the people, it doesn't disregard the value He grants to the action of each person, during their life in the material body. If the case hadn't been this, it would have meant that God doesn't take seriously the good or evil behavior each person had, or the effects of their good or evil deeds done to other persons. God doesn't forget the way the people used the power of love which they had been given with, neither at that judgment where, everything the human persons did, it will be shown plainly. But His love will be shown merciful on the ones who will confess, with repentance, the evil they did, and who won't be haughty for the evil they did, by pretending it as good, and by valuing their own judgment." (Stăniloae 1995: 213)

"The human being is an omni-lateral unity of contrastive components in continuous strengthening, but a unity that can become a unity of contraries, ones of these contraries fighting for dominating or even of excluding the other components. In the first case, the man accomplishes himself integrally, through a continuous horizontal surpassing towards the world and towards his fellow humans, and through a vertical exceeding towards the Absolute Person, Whom the human being is thirsty for. In the second case, the man restricts his being in a contrary mode, to some of the components fighting the other components and choking them down. It depends on everyone's freedom towards which one of these two states he wants to advance." (Stăniloae 1995, I: 40)

"In his quality as dynamic image of God, namely in his desire of ascending increasingly higher, towards his uncreated and unchangeable model, the human person is given his freedom and responsibility, as another form of the contrasts' unity. Through creation, the human being is given to himself, but he is given not in order to remain where he is, but in order to ascend through his effort, on one hand, and by the help of God, on the other hand, in a continuous ascension towards his Prototype. And the human being can do that only by uniting the freedom with the responsibility. Only by uniting both of these, the human being can advance evermore towards God Whose image the human being is, but Who is free as well. On one hand, God is the unchangeable good for He is unlimited, and on the other hand, the good isn't imposed forcedly, but it need a great effort in order to be conquered. That's why, in a sense, in God, the good coincides to the absolute freedom. But, whom is God king to? The Christendom has an answer to this question: God is kind to the Son and the Son is kind to the Father. And Each of Them enjoys the kindness of Another, together with the Holy Ghost. In God there everything is kindness. God is the consummate kindness, from ever. And a consummate good it cannot weaken, namely it isn't submitted to change. But in God the freedom is full too. The man, because of not being in the consummate and unchangeable good, but being asked for continuously ascending in that good, he has a freedom for deciding against the good too. But this isn't a superior freedom, but it is an increasing one when exercised into good. The human being is created as free, but he is given too, the power of becoming, through himself, increasingly freer, or increasingly not-freer, namely he is given the possibility to use his freedom for changing himself ever-positively, or he can let his freedom unused. The freedom is to the human person a power which he can preserve and develop, or which he can let it weaken, by allowing to himself to be dominated by the unilateral lusts of his inferior components. The man is free, but he promotes his real freedom only by strengthening his being as omni-lateral unity of his contrastive components, a unity in God from Whom all the things are coming. By not promoting this, the human being set loose the evil." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 54-55)

"Through freedom, the human being is called to elevate, increasingly more, his integral being, in God. Thus, the freedom belongs to the human nature itself, created, upheld, and attracted by the divine nature, as showed Saint Maximos the Confessor and the Fourth Ecumenical Synod.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 55)

“In freedom stays the man’s dignity for the man was created in the image of God. The freedom makes the human being as especially partaker to God as Absolute. The man wants to be, by himself, as God. But the ontological absolute is only one: God. The human being is created in order to tend and to be united with this Absolute. Only thus, the human being can be increasingly more partaker to Absolute and to freedom. But in the human being’s impulse towards this Absolute, towards the existence through himself, the human being can see the absolute both within himself and within world – but that is a false “absolute”, that not nourishes the human being with life.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 55)

“The human being cannot escape the authority of the superior forum. The human being’s value reconciles with the power given him by this forum. If the man had been able to escape that authority, he would have been emptied of responsibility and, so, he would have been emptied of the power that upholds the seriousness, in his conscience. And a human being lacking the sentiment of responsibility for himself, as a human being, he will no longer be a human being, but he would be an animal or a conscienceless criminal. Thus, the human being is maintained as human being and he is developed as human being both through God and through himself.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 75-76)

“One cannot speak about responsibility without speaking about freedom. If the human being hadn’t been free, he wouldn’t have been responsible. And, if the human being hadn’t been a responsible being, he wouldn’t have been endowed with freedom. There is a tight connection between responsibility and freedom. Often, they speak about the human being’s freedom as about a feature not depending on any condition, as purpose, and also as not depending on any precondition, as cause. Jakob Böhme considered the human being as the one taking his freedom out of nothing. Maybe, he understood by this, that the freedom is a product of the human beings’ will. Actually, the human being is brought to existence as already endowed with freedom. So, he doesn’t take the freedom by himself. But the freedom which the human being is brought to existence with, it isn’t like an asset which the man ascertains as existing and functioning by itself, like his body and his soul exist and function. The human being is given his freedom as a feature he must receive and use by his own will. This is for it depends on him the way he uses his freedom and the mode he strengthens himself into his freedom. And this capacity is so important that, without it, the human being wouldn’t have been free. Thus, the freedom, on one hand, it is given to the human being, and on the other hand, the human being actualize his freedom and he strengthens it. And The freedom is shown in the whole his work and being. The human being is free, for he doesn't work and for he doesn't preserve his existence in this life, except if he wants that, and what he wants it like. He can accept, by that, or he can refuse, everything God has given to him, or what God proposes Him to do with himself. In the fact that the man is free, it is shown not only that the freedom is the gift from God, but also that the freedom is actualized by the will of the human being too." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 80-81)

"Without any doubt, God has given the human being the gift of the freedom, in order to be used, by man's will, in accordance to the responsibility given to the human being, for himself and for others, in front of God. But as the responsibility's fulfillment is, likewise is the strengthening of our freedom which we achieve in front of God. But this gift, namely also the capacity of using it, it isn't taken away from the human being either when he doesn't use it in order to fulfill his responsibility. If the freedom had been taken away from the human being, in such cases, that freedom wouldn't have been a real freedom and the fulfillment of the responsibility wouldn't have taken place, for the human being wouldn't have been, actually, responsible and free." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 81)

"The human being is given the gift of the freedom and he is given also the possibility of using it however he wants, namely even contrary to his responsibility, but being preserved within him the possibility of fulfilling his responsibility whenever he wanted, and of strengthening his freedom." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 81)

"The human being sometimes refuses to consider his freedom as tied to his responsibility, because this seems to him as a diminishing of his freedom. And that's why, the human being sometimes prefers to affirm his freedom for himself, as not tied to any purpose or to any responsibility in front of a superior forum. In his freedom, the human being reckons that he has the right of not recognizing anybody as superior to himself, namely the right of being totally independent. Such a human being wants to be himself the superior forum, in order to be, like God. Maybe this is the meaning of what Jakob Böhme said, that the human being gets his freedom out of nothing, or that he doesn't want to base his freedom on anything." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 81)

"God lets the human being in his freedom, and therefor also in existence, even when the human being reckons himself as absolutely independent and when he manifests his liberty by showing his independence." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 81)

"God lets the existence to the human being, even when the human being uses the freedom in a mode contrary to the responsibility towards God, in order Him to show the human being in this, as a real image of His.

But in such a case the godlike image of the human being, it is crooked. Such a human being lives the absolute character as image of God, but in a crooked mode. Such a human being reckons on himself as having his existence by himself, and as keeping his existence by himself. But even in such a case, the human being is let to exist forever, namely to live, in a certain manner, the eternity and the limitlessness, but those are an eternity and a limitlessness emptied to extreme, as a depleted and monotonous eternity, all the way up, to feel, in the same time, his narrowest limit.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 81)

“God lets the human being to live his freedom also in the case that he doesn’t use his freedom as united with his responsibility; but, when the human being lives his freedom united with his responsibility, this fact increases and deepens the human being’s life into God. God doesn’t impose the man, forcedly, to fulfill his responsibility. God, firstly, He conquers the human being towards doing that, by descending on the level of being the First to fulfill His responsibility for the man, towards God, in an absolute willingly mode, in order to fill the human being up with love for God, and in order to urge the human being, out of gratitude, to the same fulfilling of his responsibility, in freedom. This has been done by God by accepting to make on Himself man, and even suffering death for the man. Christ made Himself the servant of the people in order to determine them to make themselves, at their turn, willingly, as His servants, and servants to one another amongst themselves, and, by recognizing Him as the Greatest, by anticipatedly fulfilling a great responsibility. And He recommends the people to do themselves like that (Mt. 20: 26-28). If the people cannot see the Son of God as made man and fulfilling, firstly, His responsibility for them, the experience of the relations amongst people, as God let these relations, it makes the people realizing that, mostly, when one of them precedes with the fulfilling of his responsibility for another, the last one could follow his example, by being conquered by the one who had the initiative.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 81-82)

“Neither God nor the human being made by God in His image, they do not ask somebody to fulfill his responsibility for them by forcing anybody to renounce to his freedom, but by making that human being to feel himself even freer in fulfilling his responsibility.” (Stăniloae 1995 I: 82)

“The one who affirms his freedom while disregarding his responsibility for other, he hasn’t the joy in him. Such a human being proves to be, in the end, a slave of his egotism, and locked up in himself. Such a human being is free, but he is locked up to the waves of life coming to him out of the others’ discontent and out of their impulse to show him their discontent through free acts of their answers. That is a freely chosen prison, but it still is a prison. That is sterile, withered, and despising freedom, a freedom freely moving itself in the egotism's cage, in the cage of not caring for others and of the despise for the ones from outside that cage, but that is a tormenting cage through the narrowness and through the monotonous existence, that it makes to live the one who has himself locked up that cage." (Stăniloae 1995 I: 82)

"There is a great difference between the momentum we have here towards the godlike fullness and the momentum from the future life. Here the momentum is impeded, and it is narrowed by the bodily needs, by the impossibility of the mind to know directly the heavenly realities. "The Eight Day" will express the whole liberty of this momentum, and even this full freedom will be an unveiled experiencing of God, the One Who is All-Free and source of the freedom. (...) But we still are servants, because we are sinners, or because of not being yet liberated of the sin's consequences. We must endure the things of the first Adam, before reaching to receive the freedom of the Second Adam, Who, as the One without sin, He is free and that's why he wasn't submitted to death, but He willingly received the death for us, in order to open to us too the way to freedom and towards the full impartation with Him. The full liberty which we will reach at, it will be the unhindered opening of our subject towards infinite. And in this not-narrowed openness towards infinite, which opposes to experiencing the evil, it is revealed the freedom's nature itself." (Stăniloae 1997: 300)

Gentleness and Humbleness

“Out of the fact we have the righteousness out of the mercy of God and because we never have it fully, due to our insufficient efforts for receiving it, it comes out the necessity of our humbleness too.” (Stăniloae 2003: 260)

“In the true righteousness before God, it is comprised also our humbleness, namely the recognition that we have everything from God, out of His mercy.” (Stăniloae 2003: 260)

“The one who asks for the mercy of God, he is righteous just by doing that, for he makes an effort of humbleness and he recognizes what he has from God on the basis of His mercy, and therefore he is imparted according to the righteousness with the happiness from Him.” (Stăniloae 2003: 261)

“Christ leads like a man, but like a man Who is filled up with the infinite power and godlike glory, which aren’t though a power and a glory which are exercised by forcing the people, in a haughtiness towards people, but in a love and in a gentleness which want to ceaselessly prove to the people that Christ considers them as His brothers into humanity, and that Christ wants to elevate them to the same power and glory of the freedom and of the love Christ is at. Elevated to the glory and to the authority of God, Christ though remains man, and the truest man, and the model-man, we, the ones who believe, we must reach at. By believing in His-together-sufferance with us, which is in the same time His power which enters our being and elevates our being, the believers ask Him – in the same time – for His “mercy”, also granting Him the whole glory: “Lord, have mercy”. This expression means also recognizing Him as our Master, but also recognizing that This Master is endlessly merciful and loving of people and close to us.” (Stăniloae 2003: 78)

“Gentleness and humbleness are the flowers springing up from enduring the troubles and out of trust. The gentleness is born after through patience there have been eliminated from the human nature the anger’s passions. The gentleness stays immediately before the humbleness. “Like the dawn light precedes to the sun, so the gentleness is the forerunner of the humbleness”, said Saint John Climacus. The gentleness is a steadfast mood of the mind remaining unchanged when facing the honors or the reproaches. The gentleness means remaining unaffected by the upsets brought to you by your neighbor and to sincerely pray for him. The gentleness is the rock raising above the sea, remaining unmoved by the sea’s waves.” (Stăniloae 1992: 145-146)

“Through gentleness we get closer to love, which stays at the final end of the virtues. While the love is opposite to egotism manifested through passions, through gentleness we have reached the benchmark of the love. The gentle man has removed from within himself all the causes upholding his separation from people. Through gentleness he has taken the decisive step towards unifying the human nature from within himself with the human nature from within others. The gentleness anticipates the smooth breeze of the dispassion, namely of the quietude that is in the same time the absence of the egotistic passions. The ones reckoning that the gentleness is a weakness, they can think at the gentleness's force of healing the human nature and of filling up the precipices from within the selves, at the good spell from within the gentleness, a spell attracting all the ones who otherwise tend to separate themselves and to put a distance themselves. Really, the man who is gentle is the only one gaining the victory upon earth." (Stăniloae 1992: 145-146)

"Through gentleness the soul gets closer to simplicity, which is the ideal of the human being. The gentleness also helps us to understand the infinite beauty and richness of positive content that is in the simplicity. The simplicity is a deep and more comprising wisdom, coming from transposing the man who is gentle in everybody's situations. Just because of this much comprising wisdom, the gentle soul no longer gets disturbed and no longer crosses from a state to the contrary state, for it judges each situation in a wider light, by taking in account so many considerations unknown to the passionate soul or which are intentionally forgotten by the passionate soul because of being, such a soul, obsessed with his unilateral passion. The much wise simplicity of the man who is gentle, it is due right to his lack of passions. On one hand, the man who is gentle doesn't have passions to hide, and on the other hand nothing impedes him to judge objectively, nothing urges him to crook his judgment or to pretend forgetting something. The cunning one is always in a state of duplicity, saying something but thinking something else, in order to cover up the ugliness of a passionate intention. He judges narrowly or crookedly and that's why he presents covertly each situation, as his momentary interest asks for it. He makes the impression of being smart. But his smartness is the art of falsifying and of covering up the truth, of presenting the crooking up of the true realities as knowledge. His art is that of giving the darkness an appearance of brightness. The cunningness of the evil man it doesn't obey the realities from beyond his egotistic ego, whilst the wisdom and the simplicity of the man who is gentle it is watered by the springs of the truth widely open in front of his mysterious intimacy." (Stăniloae 1992: 146-147)

"The humbleness is a nameless grace of the soul" (The Ladder, Step XXV). The humbleness is the opposite of the pride, the pride being the most resilient amongst passions. As the pride apparently elevates us, but in reality, it lowers us to the deep of the hell, being the most awful evil, the humbleness, by apparently lowering us, it elevates us on the higher level, occupying, as virtue, its place immediately before dispassion and love. While the pride as egotism is the source of all passions, the humbleness is the concentration of all virtues. If the pride tears the human nature apart in as many pieces as individuals exist, the humbleness gathers the human nature back. If the pride deforms the judgment and it darkens the just contemplation of the reality, the humbleness restores the just seeing of all things. Each virtue equals to an increase in will. But this increase in will is founded on an increase in seeing the things justly, as the Holy Fathers said. The passionate man, if he has done something out of a personal interest, he will try to justify his deed through a general interest. The passionate man changes his entire conception about a certain sector of the life by pursuing that sin and he tries to convince others too, that they should work likewise, although until yesterday himself was preaching another conception. He doesn't admit that the objective truth is other, for he has sinned due to his weakness towards that truth, but he tries to crook the truth and the general guidance norm in order everybody to adopt his point of view." (Stăniloae 1992: 147-148)

"While the passions crook the way of seeing the things because of adapting the general and objective order of the things to an egotistic, private interest, each virtue, by being an overcoming of a passion, and therefore of the egotism too, it bring an increase in correctly seeing the things." (Stăniloae 1992: 148)

"The humbleness, as the highest and the most summarizing amongst virtues, by opposing the egotism – which is the source of the passions -, it is the fullest restoration of the true understanding of the natural reality, leaving to the love to understand the things from above nature." (Stăniloae 1992: 148)

"Because fighting the pride it doesn't start only after the victory over the other passions, but it starts right in the beginning, for, in a certain regard, even the fight against the other passions it means fighting the pride's egotism, or it must be accompanied by it, the humbleness has, according to Saint John Climacus, several stages." (Stăniloae 1992: 148)

"The humbleness, though seeming as a self-reduction to nothing, it actually is a turning back of our human nature to the state of being a window to the infinite and an empty room meant to be filled up with the godlike light. The window actually doesn't exist for itself, and the room which God conveys the light to, it doesn't see anything without light. Likewise, the man, only by accepting this role of not being but a reflector and a receiver of the godlike light, he can have a great destiny: that one of cohabiting with the infinite. If the man feels shame for this role, and if he fills himself up with his own smoke, he won't be able to see anything of himself too." (Stăniloae 1992: 150)

Gnosis

“Koeppen reckons as necessary a turning back to knowing God not based on the laws of a deductive rationality, but on really experiencing Him, or of His power working within us. Of this consists the Christian “gnosis”, differing from the pagan “Gnosticism” which is actually pantheistic and it doesn’t know the transcendent God through experience – God Who comes within us by the grace of His love.” (Stăniloae 1992: 34)

“The simplest division of the spiritual life is in: the practical phase or active, and the contemplative phase. The practical phase, the phase of the deeds, it is meant to elevate the being of the believer from the state submitted to the passions and to elevate him on the levels of the virtues to the love. The contemplative phase represents the gathering together of the believer’s being, his unity and simplicity, his focusing exclusively on God, the One and Infinite. The man from the practical phase is called worker (working), and the one from the contemplative phase is called onlooker, seer. Often, instead of “contemplation” or of “contemplative” the Holy Fathers used the terms: “knowledge” and “knower” (Gnosis, Gnostic).” (Stăniloae 1992: 50)

God

“Because what it can be known about God it is obvious in their hearts and God is the One Who made those things obvious.” (Stăniloae 2003: 28-29)

“(...) through his supra-natural acts God showed to the conscious creature the possibility of rising up from the plan of the nature fallen under the slavery of death, which was awakening the man’s faith in the possibility of achieving the eternal meaning of the existence. The supra—natural acts of the direct Revelation of God, they give to the conscious creature the hope of being elevated, by the grace of God and through liberty, above nature.” (Stăniloae 2003: 29)

“This more direct standing out of God (...) it is shown in the fact that God sends special conscious organs, to whom He reveals Himself by speaking to them, in order those ones to communicate to other His thoughts and plans, which concern them.” (Stăniloae 2003: 34)

“The Eastern fathers made a distinction between the Being and the works of God. Saint Gregory Palamas didn’t do anything else but he insisted on the difference between the Being of God and the uncreated works sprung out of His Being.” (Stăniloae 2003: 150)

“Sometimes, while speaking about the variety of the godlike works, one forgets about mentioning that through each of these works is God Who works, the One in Being.” (Stăniloae 2003: 150)

“In the supra-existentiality of God resides the cause of the impossibility to define Him. This is because the words belong to the order of the existence, which is possible to define.” (Stăniloae 2003: 162)

“Like God is in Himself supra-temporal and supra-spatial, but he makes Himself present in time and omnipresent by descending to the relation with the created beings, which are temporal and spatial, likewise He is above almightiness, but He makes Himself Almighty by descending to the relation with all the things which have, by being imparted with Him, some power.” (Stăniloae 2003: 220)

“To God, no act is committed independently of His will. And the divine will doesn’t choose its objectives either depending on the conscience of a limited power or arbitrarily, but depending on good, for the good is one with His being. This is because God is “the subsistent good” as says Dionysus the Areopagite. Or, “to God the good coincides to the being”, as says Saint John Damascene. Any objective God would choose arbitrarily, that objective couldn’t be outside His being, or to be outside the dependence on His will, being given the infinity of His being. Not being possible to work against Himself, it means not being possible to work against His being. And if the almightiness is solidary to the infinity of the divine being, being possible to work against it, it means falling off the almightiness. Therefore, there is only one thing God cannot do: He cannot fall off the state of being able to do whatever He wants.” (Stăniloae 2003: 223)

“God, being decided to work outside Himself, according to His being, or according to the good that is eternal interpersonal communion, he uses His power in order to create persons who move themselves towards the communion with Him and amongst themselves, on one hand, and on the other hand, to be set these persons in this movement by Himself, by coming close to meet them. On this purpose, on one hand, He seeds in them a power of natural movement towards Him; on the other hand, He strengthens this created natural power of theirs, with the uncreated power of His benevolence, a benevolence that comes to meet them.” (Stăniloae 2003: 225)

“God manifests out of the infinite reserve of His almightiness or of His supra-almightiness, as much as it is necessary for the preservation, for the salvation, and for leading the creature to the consummation of the communion with Him. God doesn’t manifest His almightiness in a capricious manner. The term All-Keeper, that is preferred by the Eastern Church, it highlights that the almightiness of God, in its report with the world, it has exited the indeterminate state and - voluntarily and out of love for the world – it has defined itself as power on a level that is bearable by the world and in the world’s benefit, and not against the world.” (Stăniloae 2003: 228)

“The Christian East put the accent rather on the love of God for the world, out of the desire to lead the world to the full communion with him in love, whilst the Occidental Christendom accentuated more the almightiness of God Who wants to keep the world respecting Him. At its turn, the reigning of Christ it never was considered without its connection to His kindness. It rather has been seen as the reigning “of the stabbed Lamb” (Apoc. 5: 12-13), like the term “All-Keeper” it has been associated to the one of “good, gentle, and familiar “Father”.” (Stăniloae 2003: 229)

“The attributes related to the spirituality of God are even harder to understand, namely they are even more apophatic than the attributes related to his existence. This is because if the existence and the attributes related to existence can be conceived from a formal point of view – and as being different from the existence and the attributes of the creatures related to it, by liberating them from their aspect of insufficiency and from the formal development the last ones have it -, the attributes of the spirituality of God present a resembling content, but not identical to the one of the creatures endowed with spirituality.” (Stăniloae 2003: 235)

“One couldn’t say that the knowledge of God, the Scripture speaks about it, it refers mostly to Himself, and the wisdom the Scripture speaks about it refers to the world. It is true that the Scripture often says that God gives knowledge referring to Himself, but also the wisdom he gives it, it refers, in the last instance, to Him also. And the acts of knowledge, mentioned in the Holy Scripture, they almost always refer to people, or to things.” (Stăniloae 2003: 252)

“Of course, we must admit that there is knowledge of God, which refers to Himself as differing from creation, but we do not know anything about that. It has been unveiled to us only knowledge that stays in relation with the world. If God says many things about His knowledge and action referring to the world, referring to Himself He says only as much as we need it in order to understand His relationship with the world. Therefore, we couldn’t make of the knowledge of God that refers to Himself a separate object of our knowledge. Here it has its place, the most categorically, the apophatic theology.” (Stăniloae 2003: 252)

“God is not righteous without being merciful, and He is not merciful without being righteous. This is for He is righteous to us through His free and merciful descent to us.” (Stăniloae 2003: 257)

“If He had been only righteous, God wouldn’t have been free; if He had been only merciful, He wouldn’t have taken into account the human efforts and He wouldn’t have encouraged these efforts. The human beings would have been reduced to passive receptacles of His mercy. The created world wouldn’t have had a true, consistent reality, and the human being wouldn’t have been able to grow up by their effort.” (Stăniloae 2003: 257)

“As righteous, God wants, on one hand, that all the people to be equals, and on the other hand, he wants to give everybody as much as they can receive out of His happiness, according to their efforts, efforts He has made everybody capable of, after Himself has given them the capacity of receiving at maximum out of what the creatures can receive.” (Stăniloae 2003: 257)

“Through righteousness God refers Himself to us, to everybody; but He thinks at each one in a different manner. Our aspiration towards righteousness starts from a model or from an idea of justice and it tend to accomplish it amongst everybody. God doesn’t start from an idea of the justice, but from the reality of justice in Himself. If the sin hadn’t partially covered our authentic human reality, we shouldn’t have started from an idea of justice, but from accomplishing the righteousness given in our equality.” (Stăniloae 2003: 257)

“The sentiment of the justice in the one who has the power to extend it to other, it consists in the impulse to do the justice to others. This impulse is in a culminant measure in God. But the one who doesn’t benefit of justice, the impulse towards justice it consists especially in the sentiment of claiming it. Each individual wants to be taken in consideration what he deserves, namely in a consideration equal in essence to everybody’s. Towards God, the human being does not manifest a sentiment of claiming the justice, for only out of His benevolence they have been brought to existence in order to be partaker to his happiness. But God calls the humans to a justice even in report with Him, for He offers them everything He has, except the fact He cannot make them uncreated or sources of the existence, as He is.” (Stăniloae 2003: 257-258)

“Within people there is a deep conviction that God doesn’t deviate from justice in His report with them and, on the basis of this conviction they have within them a sentiment of legitimate expectation for justice and an impulse for asking for it.” (Stăniloae 2003: 258)

“For He is righteous, God asks us too to be righteous. Only the “righteous” one in this sense, he can enjoy the righteousness of God. God must be admitted as being righteous in all regards. He not only that gives according to the justice, but He also asks for justice for Him and for our fellow humans. The one who doesn’t fulfill, from his part, the condition of righteousness required by God, the one who doesn’t recognize God as source of the justice, as justice’s claimer, the one who isn’t right in relation with Him – and with his fellow humans – as God wants him to be, that one cannot expect to be imparted with the happiness of God.” (Stăniloae 2003: 259-260)

“Each person receives from the righteous God, according to his justice or injustice. God wants us to grow up in this regard too, towards being imparted with His greatest justice and mercy, through our advancing into the justice and mercy towards others. The fact we do not ever reach a righteousness corresponding to that one that we ask God for it, it is another motif for we do not ask only for the justice of God – namely not only for His judgment according to our righteousness – but we ask for His mercy too.” (Stăniloae 2003: 260)

“God makes us partakers to His to His happiness according to the justice, on the basis of His benevolence or of His mercy, but on the other hand, by being merciful to us, God do not act forcedly and arbitrarily in destining us to His happiness.” (Stăniloae 2003: 260)

“God is merciful, but He is also the “Righteous Judge”, valuing the creature and the creature’s efforts.” (Stăniloae 2003: 260-261)

“If God has manifested a mercy without justice, He wouldn’t have done with us a pedagogical work, He wouldn’t have been interested in our growth, but he would have shown that He hasn’t created us as beings capable of spiritual growth. His creator power itself would have seemed an enormously diminished.” (Stăniloae 2003: 264)

“God wants the whole world to be filled up with saints, that the whole world to be sanctified, for His holiness to become seen and glorified all over the world, by becoming a new sky and a new earth, inhabited by the justice, or by the faithfulness, or by the openness, or by the holiness, by being extended out of the Holy Trinity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 285)

“If we have used before the term pure subjectivity for describing the mode of being of God, in order to remove from Him any sign of object character, we have done it by understanding through subjectivity not an illusory content a subject can give it to himself, but the absolute freely mode of God to exist by Himself and to decide by Himself. But this mode means to God the most consistent mode of reality: he is an objective subjectivity, or a subjective objectivity. He is beyond the distinction between subjectivity and objectivity, for the person it not only cogitation but the most intense reality too. God is above the subjectivity and above the objectivity as known by us. He is one because He is the other one.” (2003: 322)

“God reveals Himself in this way, as the forming factor of an ever more elevated humanity, as the force that carries us towards a never closed future. This factor manifests in the form of a love for people that continuously gives the people more, that wants the people to always have more love for one another. The love for God or better said the thinking at God it is thus a continuous contribution to maintain the world in becoming towards ever more authentically human relations amongst people.” (2003: 515)

“But the most part of the people, by not drawing out of their rationality’s existence and out of the rationalities from within the world, the logical deduction of a Person Who has thought these things first and Who has created these things, they fell into all kinds of vain imaginings and reproachable passions, attracting to themselves an even bigger damnation as they couldn’t justify themselves with the absence of some signs of the presence of God within themselves and within the world. Saint Apostle Paul could rightly say: “And the anger of God is being unveiled from heavens over all heathendom and upon all people’s lawlessness who keep the truth in the slavery of the injustice. This is because what one can know about God, it is proven within their hearts and God is the One Who has showed them. Rightly, the unseen things of God, His eternal power and Godhead, are being seen though cogitation from the beginnings of the world in His creatures, in order to be the people without defense word. Since, by knowing God, they haven't worshipped Him as God, neither have they bowed down before Him, but they have been going astray in their imaginings, their understanding heart has become dark too... That's why God has given them to the uncleanness, according to their heart's lust" (Rom 1: 18-24). The objective continuation of the presence of godlike Word within world, but also in the darkness that subjectively engulfed the human beings' hearts, are affirmed by Saint Evangelist John too, in the words: "And the light lights into darkness, and the darkness hasn't comprised (understood) the light" (Jn. 1: 5)" (Stăniloae 2006: 7)

About the presence and the word of the Word in the Old Testament as preparation for His coming into body, Saint Maximos the Confessor said that "before His seen and into body coming, the Word of God was coming in a spiritual way, to the patriarchs and to the prophets, fore-imagining the mysteries of His coming", or "The words of the Law and of the prophets, being forerunners of His coming into Body, they were guiding the souls to Christ". (Stăniloae: 2006: 9)

"Of course, the Word of God, as God – even if He has come in Christ in direct dialogue with us – He is not seen in an unveiled mode. The body of Christ, His human words, they still remain "types", "symbols" of the Godhead. But now the type isn't separated from God, but God has made, on Himself, "His own type", "His own Symbol". One must advance in the intimacy with Christ, in order to access, through Christ as type, His infinite godhead, and not on a way that is outside Him. Who is nigh to Christ, he feels through Christ's human words, through His gazes, and through the whole His countenance, His behavior and His deeds, the unseen godhead of His Subject. "Behold, the Lord comes with strength and His arm will pasture His flock with dominion, and with His arm he will gather the lambs" (Isa. 40: 10)." (Stăniloae 2006: 52)

"One can notice in the words and in the deeds of every man, not only the defined content of some meanings, but also their indefinable subject, out of whom they start. This is the "ghost" specific to the subject, which envelops and which is present in all the man's words. Likewise we experience Christ as godlike Subject through His Holy Ghost, Who communicates, on Himself, through all Christ's words and acts and countenances. That's why His words too, they have within, ghost and life. "The words I have spoken to you, they are ghost and life" (Jn. 6: 63). Or: "You have the words of the eternal life (Jn. 6: 68). Christ's words and acts unite us through His Ghost, with Himself. "The true mediator is Christ, with Whom we have been united by relation, if it is true that He has descended into our things and He has made, on Himself, man, in order to make us partakers to His godlike nature, united with Ghost by the impartation and by the grace of the Holy Ghost". Christ is the "truth" as person, for any spiritual reality - which configures the material reality the spiritual reality it manifests itself through - it subsists only as person, and not outside the person. So, the supreme spiritual reality, on which depends any other reality, it doesn't subsist except in the Supreme Person or in the Supreme Trinity of Persons. Everything that is true, it has its origin in the creator act of God as Person, it is maintains and it is consummated in life or in truth, by participating to the life of God as Person, or to the "truth" by excellence. The human life Christ has assumed, it has been filled up with godlike life, or with truth and, by being imparted with it, any man who believes will be filled up with life and truth." (Stăniloae 2006: 52)

"Firstly, we notice that in the fact that Christ is sanctified as priest by God through the holy Ghost, it was shown not only the initiative of the Son in bringing, on Himself, as sacrifice to God for people (therefore, in the three directions (towards God, towards His human nature, and towards people too, t. n.)), but it was also the initiative of God-the Father. The Son's initiative was, rather, an answer of His to the initiative of the Father, simultaneously to it, and constituting the together-fulfilling of the "eternal counsel" of the Father and of the Son, into the Holy Ghost. On the basis of this initiative, the Father sent His Son in the world in order to bring as sacrifice, on Himself, while being man. "For God loved so much the world, so that He gave His Only Begotten Son, for whosoever believes in Him, not to perish, but to have eternal life (Jn. 3: 16). This fact gives to any human priesthood a reason in the initiative of God. This is the sense of priest's sanctification." (Stăniloae 2006: 58-59)

"In the case of Christ, an initiative of the Son of God towards bringing, on Himself, as sacrifice, in His quality as man, which is conjugated as answer to the sanctifying initiative of the Father, it makes on Christ - the embodied Son of God - to hypostatize or to make a Person out of the humanity assumed since His birth itself, as man, having imprinted in Him the impulse towards sacrifice, for Christ-the man to be sanctified too, since His birth itself, as sacrifice; thus, right from the start of His existence as man, the sanctifying initiative of the Father met His impulse, as man, to bring, on Himself, as sacrifice." (Stăniloae 2006: 59)

"God want the world to be brought to Him through a man, through the human body become fully transparent environment of His powers of life and of love; God wants to be the world brought to Him, through His beloved Son, Who He has made man on this purpose, for, through Christ, the Father's infinite love for His Son to overflow upon all the people and upon the world the people are solidary with, by creation. Through this, the Father attracts to Him the ones who consider the honor granted to Christ like man, like the honor they are called to ascend towards. And Christ-the man, he only uses His methods in His work of leading us towards deification, methods of strengthening the spirit against what is opposed to the spirit's freedom: overcoming the passions from within people and overcoming the death within them, by their own strengthening and by their co-working, in the image Christ has defeated them in Himself. So, Christ continues to exercise His imperial work, combined with the one of Hierarchy and sacrifice, to exercise His power as a stabbed Lamb. These are methods of persuasion, and not of forcing; these are methods of gaining the people through His love, in which is not absent His together-suffering with the people. By this, Christ addresses the people's freedom, and He wants to strengthen the people's freedom, in the effort of working through themselves the victory upon their slavery. Christ helps the people to overcome the evilness from within them, through patience, through gentleness, and through delicacy, which Himself communicates to the people." (Stăniloae 2006: 77-78)

When this method will have come to an end, then Jesus, as man, He will have ceased this imperial power as an exclusive dignity of His, for all of us who believe, we will have reached together-emperors with Him, together-emperors over the enslaving passions, like a glory of the consummate freedom in the loving relation with Christ." (Stăniloae 2006: 78)

"The immovable in kindness God, He has descended through creation, and especially through embodiment, on our level, and He accepted the possibility of ascending from stage to stage, in order He to ascend as man, together with us, in the infinity of the Godhead Christ's humanity has been assumed by. By His descent, He has made Himself as our ladder and together-ascending with us." (Stăniloae 2006: 144)

"The preparation of the people for receiving the Son of God as man, into a maximum closeness to them, it took a certain time. And it couldn't be done only through people. Therefore, there was a connection between people and God even before the producing of the maximum closeness report, with the role of preparing the people for this kind of closeness. If such a preparatory connection hadn't taken place, the people would have been incapable to understand the descent of God among them and to open their heart for accepting it." (Stăniloae 1993)

"Besides this, the fact that also into God there is will and work, and to God cannot be attributed a will and a work to self-improvement, it shows that, in principle, the will and the work, which belong to the definition of any nature, they have a transitory goal, that of sustaining the report between different existences. The spiritual natures are kept in this report by laws. The subject, like a hypostasis of the spiritual natures, he brings the liberty in the determination of his report with other realities, but, in fact, this report is based on the being's character itself.

These considerations help us to realize even more about the true multi-hypostatic character of God. God's being cannot be without will and work.

Otherwise, it would be a static and powerless reality. Though, the will and the work of His being cannot simply be a constraint to God in report with something from outside Him, because this would mean that He must be creating from eternity. On the other hand, the will and the work of His being cannot exist for nothing, neither like auto-improvement means.

The will and the work, like eternal manifestations, cannot be conceived in a way worthy of God, only with the meaning of inter-hypostatic manifestations. The eternal work of God it is the love between the three persons of the Trinity.

The eternal meaning of the divine being's work it is the eminent purpose of the all subjects' works: the activation of the intentionality towards communion. The intentionality towards communion with fellow humans is, therefore, the fundamental tendency of the subject, and the living into communion means the fulfillment of it¹⁶³." (Stăniloae 1993)

"The Birth of the Son of God it cannot be the product of the human initiative, because of having to be an act of heavenly initiative, and there must implicitly be absent from the human contribution all the elements of the lust which is expresses through, in the actual decayed state of the human nature, this human tension for producing a new human individual." (Stăniloae 1993)

"On the other hand, the expression "alive is God" it has in this connection of ideas another meaning too. Any man, while he is living, he shivers when he hears God's words repeated or His deeds mentioned, even when God's name 163 M. HEDEGGER, when determining the fundamental structure of the person, of the subject like Existenz unlike the Vorhandenheit, he sees the characteristic of the existence in the incapacity to be an entity locked in himself, but to be into a continuous launching in front of himself and towards the things from the world which he lives in. We express the subject through the sentence "I cogitate", "I work", but always "I cogitate to something" or "I work to something". Through these, it is recognized, in fact, the same tendency towards communion, which constitute the heart of the subject. "Kant vermied zwar die Abschnürung des Ichs vom Denken, ohne jedoch das «Ich denke» selbst in seinem vollen Wesensbestande als «Ich denke etwas» anzusetzen und vor allem ohne die ontologische «Voraussetzung» für das «Ich denke etwas» als Grundbestimmtheit des selbst es zu Vorhandenheit, anzusetzen und vor allem ohne die ontologische «Voraussetzung» für das «Ich denke etwas» als Grundbestimmtheit des selbst es zu sehen... Wird darunter (das «Etwas») verstanden ein innerweltliches Seiendes, dann liegt darin unausgesprochen die Voraussetzung von Welt; und gerade dieses Phänomen bestimmt die seinsverfassung des Ichs mit... das Ich-sagen meint das Seiende, das je ich bin als «Ich bin in einer Welt»", W. c. p. 321.

is not mentioned. These words and deeds are Himself, into a past moment of His existence. They are not only outside Him, but also into Him, as stratified in His existence. He is attracted where are repeated His words and where are mentioned His deeds. He is nigh to the one who repeats His words and who mentions His deeds, at least with an intentional presence, immediately that He acknowledges that. And this happens, especially when He would find His name mentioned in connection with His words and deeds. Jesus Christ, by being also God Who continues to exist and to know all the things done everywhere, acknowledging the repeating of His words and the mentioning of His deeds and of His name, He is present, into a more than intentional manner, next to the one who reads or listens with faith the words spoken or the deeds done by Him. Thereby, the believer, by reading the words or by listening to the deeds of the Savior, he sees Him actual, like their subject, and He, when sees His words repeated and His deeds being mentioned, somehow Himself is the One repeating the sayings and the doings of them, through His identification to them, through the recognition of them like being His¹⁶⁴.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“On this way, if God wants the man to sacrifice himself, the sacrifice of an animal was a surrogate, was a substitution, but a minimal one and, thereby, ¹⁶⁴ More recently, the philosopher Martin Heidegger has highlighted that the past and the future they are not two realities detached from present. If the past had had something existent by itself, like an ordinary object, the memory would have been inexplicable. The memory which the past is constituted through, it is a stretching backwards of our being. We have the past through something actual from us, through an “expansion” of our being behind us. The future, also, it is lived in present, as an expansion, as our “epektasis” forwards. The future, by itself, it could not exist. The past, the present and the future are not three pieces of a thread, from which one remained behind, and another one still hasn’t reached in front of us. At the basis of our being, or even our being himself, it is a temporality (Zeitlichkeit) like a threefold ecstatic tension forward, backwards, and towards the one from the front. The temporality is another expression of the worry, which constitutes the essence of the human being. But, because the worry is by excellence the tension towards future, the extension of the future has a primacy into the temporality actualization. (“Das sein des Daseins bestimmen wir als Sorge. Deren ontologischer Sinn ist die Zeitlichkeit... Zeitlichkeit ist das ursprüngliche «außer-sich» an und für sich selbst... Die Einheit der horizontalen Schemata von Zukunft, Gemessenheit und Gegenwart gründet in der ekstatischen Einheit der Zeitlichkeit“. Sein und Zeit, p. 329, 364, 365.

„Das primäre Phänomen der Ursprünglichkeit und eigentlichen Zeitlichkeit ist die Zukunft“, p. 329. But the tension towards future, when refers to our own most intimate possibility, the death, it makes us to turn at our intimacy, which we regarded before like something given, like something which comes from beforehand. By coming back to ourselves, we then realize us like formers ones. The past is a presence. In the extension which we are living the past and present and the future in, and, by and large, in each of the three ones are comprised also the other two ones. The temporality is a unity wholly lived into each of the three extensions of it, each time. In the tension towards the future, the human being lives the takeover of her existence, by transmitting to himself through himself his possibilities received from past. [Nur Seines, das wesentlich in Sein zukünftig ist, so dass es frei für seinen Tod an ihm zerschellend auf sein faktisches Da sich zurückwerfen lassen kann, d. H. Nur Seines, das als zukünftiges gleichursprünglich gewesen ist, kann sich selbst die ererbte Möglichkeit überliefernd, die eigene Geborgenheit übernehmen und augenblicklich sein für «seine Zeit», (p. 385)]. If, thereby, the past is actual to the man until he lives, even more than that is actual to Jesus Christ Who, like God, He remains also man, and He relives eternally the past which He has like a man. Better said, He, like the most loving being from all the existing people, He lives above time, not separating Himself from the living of the present, the past and the future (According to Biswanger, w. c.). an insufficient one, of the sacrifice of a human. Through the animal the man was giving something from his own, by harnessing his egotism, but God wants the man himself to completely annulling himself like a creature completely ruined by sin, which cannot be reestablished except through a creation anew, after a true abolishing of the former man.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“How God makes it possible to people, to be able to come close to Him through the sufferance of Jesus Christ? Every man must be purified when he comes close to God. If it doesn’t take place within man the surpassing of the sin on a spiritual way, the man won’t be able to come close to God. We cannot understand the sufferance of Jesus Christ like an equivalence, which, by being continuously in front of God, it allows the people to have access to God, without being produced into these ones, from inside out, the surpassing of the sin. This mysterious thing we believe that it takes place thus: Jesus Christ, by being all the time in front of the Father, for the people, He remembers, He re-shows in front of the Father a sufferance which He has endured for the people with the efficacy which He is given by the divinity, but, in the same time, through the approach to man given Him by His human nature, so that He makes that this actualization to take place on every moment which a man or another turns himself towards God, an melting down of the sinful fund from him, opening to him a path towards the Father. A sufferance remembered by the One Who has endured it, or by somebody who looks at him, it is like a repeated sufferance. The representation of this sufferance of the Son, both in front of the Father from heavens, and also amongst people, through Eucharist, it removes the sin from within man through a spiritual influence, not a physical sufferance, but, in the same time, it is expiatory in front of the Father, because it produces the power which demolishes from the path of the man, respectively from the way towards God, all the obstacles. Somehow, the sufferance of Jesus Christ has descended into the respective man without that man to suffer himself, but by having within him the effects of an effective sufferance.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Not God needs this satisfaction, but we need to give this satisfaction to God. On this one it depends our spiritual life. To Him this is a satisfaction He doesn’t absolutely need in order to be happy. It is a satisfaction in the sense of a joy which we produce Him, a joy that we become able to taste the happiness of the communion with Him. The divine authority was offended by our pride and egotism. It is a law that we cannot enter the communion with Him until we do not reestablish in our eyes His prestige. And this cannot be accomplished only through that that we have not paid Him before the due respect, and now we are paying it.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“Besides the fact that we wouldn’t have been capable of such a change of us without sufferance, the God’s prestige in our eyes would have not be restored if we hadn’t paid, with sufferance, the lack of care and the mutiny which we have made ourselves guilty of. Without any regret we didn’t realize the huge mistake which we have done and, so, neither the importance of the God’s Person. But the sorrow cannot be a frail theatrical sentiment, but an ontological radical pain, a burning of our entire being, which until now has made himself guilty and he bears in its guts the stamp of the mutiny against the authority of God. We must feel God revenged in defeating, from the ground up, our sinful being. Only this way, we still are capable to feel reestablished the whole His divine authority.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“When we say that God doesn’t save us but only if we will satisfy His honor, we do not imagine that God is driven by the inferior sentiment of those people who cannot sleep until their honor is reestablished or until they had their revenge. The honor of God too little depends on our attitude towards Him. And it is incompatible to attribute Him a “thirsty” of revenge.

It is necessary to us to realize His importance, His authority; due to a basic law – which is the law of communion – it cannot be reestablished without giving this satisfaction to God, without seeing God revenged for the offense we have brought Him. Of course, God does not remain impassible to our attitude. He rejoices if it is given Him our part of satisfaction, and He wants this, but on the other hand, He becomes sad if that satisfaction it is not given Him. But the joy and the sadness are for us, and not for Him. He is happy for Him and He is sad for us: beholds another mystery of the divine life, which we are forced to express in a form of an antinomy.

So, the satisfaction brought to God, as payment for our sins, it is not a simple subjective process in the work of the salvation.” (Stăniloae 1993)

“God Himself has created, like a possibility, this character of the relations amongst people, making the destiny of one depending on the ethical deed of the other one, interweaving and inter-compelling, like in a whole, the human hypostases. The second one, because of the decision of assuming the responsibility for the sin of another, it is not only the highest ethical deed, but, in the same time, it is also a decision to stand next to him, to share his fate. When you assume the responsibility for the sin of another, you have decided to associate yourself, and to identify yourself to him, to attract upon you the opprobrium which presses upon him. Out of love for him, you have placed yourself into a society hated by God. Without being a solidarity with the sinner, it is a passing on his side. We have seen that the salvation of the man, his forgiveness from the part of God, it cannot be accomplished without satisfying of the moral order from the basis of the spiritual life. This order, which at surface it expresses a juridical precision and constancy, it asks for the one who has done good to be rewarded. But also, this order asks for the one who is solidary, not only in the evil deed, but also in the responsibility for it, with the perpetrator, also, to suffer the punishment. Jesus, by taking not only a part of the responsibility of the people for the sin, but by taking the entire responsibility, He has become, actually, responsible in front of the juridical expression of the existence of the moral order, attracting upon Him its reaction. This way, the highest moral deed of assuming the responsibility for the sin of the other one, it is in the same time punishable. But, just through this, it earns its moral greatness. Otherwise, it would be an easy act. Assuming the responsibility it would not have been anymore, in fact, an assuming of responsibility in all the gravity of the meaning of the word, and it would lack this real bridge from man to man, of the real substitution of a fellow human in his trouble. People would remain, despite of the entire physical closeness, at an impassable distance, everyone enduring his destiny in isolation. In this association of the high ethical deeds with the punishment, it stays hidden also the sense of the great tragic figures." (Stăniloae 1993)

"This was from the beginning the intention of God regarding the world. God is - in His deep - love and will towards communion.

But this intention does not exclude His intention to uphold the world, through the preservation of the physical and social legality. This is only the little, comprised into much more. In the regime of love, the legality is not abolished either in the governing work of God, or in the life of the man. But it is absorbed, so that the individuals who have entered the communion they no longer find it like something embarrassing, and Jesus Christ does not make from it a punishing application. The legality becomes a respiration into the substrate of the being; it is no longer a separate method and an object of special preoccupation. (Stăniloae 1993)

"One only needs a spiritual understanding of the Christendom: God isn't, according to the Christian teaching, an objective entity, or a natural force alike the ones from within world, acting upon the world as an object or as a force stronger than the worlds it. This would be the mythological "objectifying" which Bultmann speaks of, and which would need a "demythologizing". In reality, God is a Subject of spiritual free energy and His acts are spiritual acts. His acts produce effects upon the man only with the man's consent and they influence, by and large, in the mode which the spirit or the ideas and the faith influence the body in, the relations amongst people, and the material world from everywhere. Namely, God, by choosing on a point or on another of the universal causality of a contingent world, one or another of this world's causal polyvalences, He doesn't get the world out of its causality and He doesn't impede the human freedom, through the act infusing new spiritual energies to the man or which guide the man on diverse directions. God, as inexhaustible source of energy, he imparts the world and the man with His energy, without disturbing the world's legality and without impeding the man's freedom, for He is a Source- Person and for He is the Creator of the world and of the man and just by this He founded them as own realities the nature with its laws, and the man with his freedom in the frame of the world. The whole Revelation through divine acts it is a Revelation in the form of a dialogue between God and man, God taking in account the man's deeds, but also the fact that the man accepts or rejects the Revelation from Him." (Stăniloae 2005: 8-9)

"The today's Christian, who is also the today's man, he doesn't aim for "an authentic existence" in the sense of an existence detached from the world. But in order to do a service to the world, which to help the world to overcome the automatic repetition in the old things, he needs an unconditional effort which cannot come to him except out of the source of a God Who is unconditioned by world, but Who is full of love for the world." (Stăniloae 2005: 10)

"If the glory of God is shown only to the ones who have been elevated, during prayer, above everything that is sensitive and intelligible, what the being of God won't be like, above any feeling and cogitation, for it is above that view too?" (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 59)

"It is correct to say that there is something supra-ordinated and subordinated into God, but only regarding the causal aspect, and not as like one would be uncreated and the others would be created." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 155)

"As God is monad and triad and His being differs from Hypostases, likewise God is both being and work and one differs from another (f. 255)." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 156)

"God is both non-shareable and shareable, both motionless and always in movement. He is fitted both by the cataphatic and apophatic theology." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 158)

"God, of course, he is above the names which we call Him with, but that doesn't make as liar, the truth expressed through those names. God can be also named as above any name, and He can be cogitated and He still is above any cogitation." (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 158)

“The difference between the being and the power of God isn’t that one is uncreated and another is created, but it consists of the fact that the being is above any manifestation, and the power is manifested in results (280). Neither the angels see the being of God. But either to them and to the righteous from the future age, God is light (f. 281).” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 161)

“If there hadn’t been any difference between the godlike being and its rays which are shared, then each of the imparted ones would have been almighty. This is for either the smallest part of the being, it still is being and it has all the being’s powers. Or, Saint Apostle Paul showed that each believer receives a different gift (f. 284).” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 162)

“At the basis of the entire reality there must be an existence that is only a Subject, and unsubmitted, as object, to some laws; a loving Subject Who is in a consummate communion.” (Stăniloae 1995: 117)

“In the first place, the consummation or the plenitude of the supreme existence it consists of existing in itself. As such, the supreme existence is from ever, and therefore is inexhaustible. The supreme existence doesn’t need something else in order itself to exist or in order itself to be complete. The supreme existence has by itself, everything the human being cogitates as belonging to existence, and it has even more than the human being can cogitate. The supreme existence doesn’t have above itself, of deeper than itself, some existence level which itself to move towards. The supreme existence is limitless.” (Stăniloae 1995: 8)

“On one hand, the consummation of the eternal existence cannot be deprived of the conscience of the full possession of the totally independent and unlimited states and powers, which the temporal creatures tend towards. The consummate existence must be, consequently, an existence aware of its consummate state and depending on nothing, in its existence. The absence of this conscience would have gravely diminished the eternal existence’s consummation of plenitude, and that consummation or plenitude it would have been impossible to understand. The self-awareness belongs to the essential components of a consummate or plenary existence. The absence of the conscience lowers the existence on inferior level, or in a total darkness, and in a total dependency on something superior to it, and in an absence of any rejoicing of itself. And the awareness of the own existence, of some temporal creatures and therefore limited in their existence -, it is, at its turn, limited, and aware of something superior which those creatures depend on. So, the self-awareness of the created creatures about their own existence, it is imprinted with a certain insufficiency. Even themselves, the created creatures realize that they don’t know everything about themselves. This is because they realize that their conscience is related to what they are, and that their conscience lacks the knowledge of the superior existence, and without fully knowing the supreme existence they won't fully know either on themselves. In the same time, the conscience of the created beings it tells them that they cannot fully have control upon themselves, nor they can control the supreme existence which they depend on, and they can't control even the things depending on themselves. In the created beings' self-awareness, there enters also the conscience that they do not exist through themselves, but they depend on a superior existence and, finally, they depend on the consummate of plenary existence, and that's why they cannot fully know the supreme existence, and even if they had known it, they wouldn't have been able to annex it through their own power, to their own existence." (Stăniloae 1995: 8)

"The supreme Existence doesn't have any shortcomings. The self-awareness of the supreme Existence It knows everything in this Self, and It knows that this whole, it belongs to Itself. Its self-awareness it covers everything, and It disposes on everything, and It rejoices of everything. The supreme existence Whom we call God, it is the "Son" of the whole existence. That's why we call, the embodied Son of God, as the "Son of the righteousness". And he said about Himself: "I am the light of the world". He is the "Truth", or the whole reality. His light, namely His conscience too, it is extended over all things and it banishes away the darkness which, otherwise, it would cover all things. That's why, He said too: "The one who follows Me, he won't walk into darkness, but he will have the everybody's light, for it is the everybody's life". (Stăniloae 1995: 8)

"In the supreme existence, the conscience fully covering the whole existence; so, nothing from existence, be it even own plenary existence, or be it the created inferior existence, isn't totally exterior or unavailable to the supreme conscience." (Stăniloae 1995: 9)

"Another feature the plenary existence cannot lack, it is the kindness, which is nourished by the love, and which the love is nourished by. If without the rejoicing of existence, the existence would have indicated a minus, without kindness or without love, there cannot be any joyfulness. Loving the existence, it means having which to rejoice of, in it. Rejoicing of existence and the love go hand in hand. Without them, the existence proves to be in a great shortcoming. The lack of love comes out of the lack of existence's richness. When you cannot love, you suffer of egotism, which is full of fear of not having a sufficiently rich existence. In your kindness or in your love, there is an overflowing of existence out of yourself, which mysteriously, even though this grows within you. This is for in love you actualize within yourself some potencies which otherwise you disregard and you do not feel.” (Stăniloae 1995: 9)

“The supreme existence, as supreme unity and as reciprocal total affirmation of the Three Persons, It has the endless love in Itself. The supreme existence doesn’t need other existences in order to strengthen Its love, or Its existence and joyfulness.” (Stăniloae 1995: 10)

“God wouldn’t have been the existence’s fullness, if He had been only the Self-aware existence, or the existence that cogitates itself, by reduplicating itself internally through cogitation, and not also as life that lives on itself and that rejoices of the Self. But God lives, on Himself, consciously, and He knows, on Himself, by rejoicing of His existence and by feeling, on Himself, with the whole intensity. God is a source both of thinking and of life, these ones not being separated from one another, neither from God.” (Stăniloae 1995: 18)

“The borderless God’s almightiness, it has been shown right in the fact that He has been able to bring something to existence without needing any previous substance, and that He can uphold that something, in existence, exclusively by His power, without any contribution of some substance which to help maintaining what has been created.” (Stăniloae 1995: 28)

“Not needing anything in order to create the universe, it isn’t a diminution of God, but, on the opposite, it is a sign of God’s almightiness, a sign of His unlimited power.” (Stăniloae 1995: 35)

“In the paradoxical union of God’s descent with His almightiness, it is shown His full love. A love that hadn’t been united with the almightiness, and also with the descent, it wouldn’t have been a full love. God is almighty, but he is merciful too. In his mercy it is shown the descent, but how could have been a true God if he hadn’t been capable of mercy? The more God is almighty, the more He is merciful. Through mercy, God elevates what is infinitely tiny and weaker than Him - namely what doesn’t have, by itself, any power to be God’s partner - to participation to God’s happiness.” (Stăniloae 1995: 36)

“A God Who had created the universe on a whim, only in order to show His power, and not out of love for universe, such a God wouldn’t have been totally consistent with the idea that we have on His almightiness. The true God He doesn’t need any universe, neither He need to be extolled by universe; he doesn’t need to satisfy some caprice of creating a universe. The only joy God has of the universe it is to rejoice Himself of the universe’s joyfulness, of existing and of participating, increasingly more, to God’s infinite existence.” (Stăniloae 1995: 36)

“Only the union between God’s power and mercy, namely with the universe’s joyfulness and existence, it urges the universe to sincerely praise God. If the universe had seen in the existence it has received, only God’s greatness, the praise the universe would have brought to God, it would have been incomplete. We praise God not because He is almighty, but we praise Him for He is kind and merciful, namely for He descends to us though He is almighty. The stronger somebody is, the real his descent is. The descent implies a great height, as the giving of gifts implies a great richness, but they also imply also a great love. In descent it is shown the descent, but not the loss of the richness. The almighty remains, in his essence, as almighty, in order him to be able to descend. The generous one remains rich in his essence, in order him to be able to continuously give gifts. God descends on the inferior plan of the small ones, but He still remains – and even by this – in Himself, on His own height, and He makes his height felt in another mode, or in a way that is superior to the small ones, and He elevates the small ones, just by His descent, on His height, by grace and not by being, where He is.” (Stăniloae 1995: 36-37)

“In affirming a judgment given before the soul’s exiting, we probably must see the prescience of God that this soul, though he would want to repent, or that he does some gesture in this direction, he actually doesn’t repent, or he won’t repent with the who his heart.” (Stăniloae 1997: 198)

“The warmth is a sharable work of the fire. The caustic power of the fire, though, it is totally non-shareable. If in the case of the fire is like so, how could somebody say that the godhead, existing in the hidden from above all things, it makes known, on himself, by the fact that it is known only the godhead’s natural symbol? Neither the solar disc is known in its hidden, through the fact that we know something of its light. So, we know the godhead only through the things we are imparted with about the godhead; but nobody knows the godhead in himself, not even the heavenly ghosts.” (Stăniloae 1993, 2: 69)

“If the human person has a conscious aspiration towards light and towards his own communicativeness, and, that’s why, the human person has within himself the endless mystery too, then there will be mandatory to exist a supreme existence Who actually has in Himself the light and the infinite mystery and Who doesn’t need other light and mystery in order to advance into the infinity of the light and of the mystery. This existence has in itself or by itself, the infinite conscious life, as Saint Cyril of Alexandria said.” (Stăniloae 1993, 3: 191)

Good

“The good by excellence, or the absolute good, it coincides to the consummate being, or to God Himself, also for the motif that the good cannot be abstract, or purely cogitated, but it is a subsistent good, which is as such a reference of a person to another person. A good that doesn’t refer consciously, therefore to another person, it is not a good. Thus, the absolute good is the relation or the perfect love amongst the absolute Persons Who form a unity that goes to a maximum, allowed by the fact They do not confound to each other. And for the good in God, it is eternal, this good isn’t else but the eternal maximum and not-confounded unity amongst the Three Divine Persons. The eternal good is the Holy Trinity.” (Stăniloae 2003: 223)

“By choosing, because of his pride, the individualistic rational and objectual knowledge of the reality, Adam applied it to the question of the good too. But the good, and even the existence, outside the communion with the divine Subject and with the human subjects, they have a doubtful character, and therefore knowing them it is doubtful too. This fact sinks our being into an immense sadness. Fallen into his pride, Adam wanted to decide by himself what is good and what exists. The good and the existence are thus reduced to the state of objects in order to match the narrowed and proud limits of the rationality of the lonely individual. They are adapted to the momentary interests, and strictly egotistic pleasures. The good and the true existence cannot be known and cannot be experienced except in the loving relations with the other subjects. You must respectfully listen to the other, in order to discover other point of views and in order to know his ceaseless novelty. You must listen to him in order to understand what he expects from you. Properly said, the good he expects from you and you expect from him it consists in this: in being one to another a source of novelty, of communion, and of love.” (2003: 500-501)

“From Genesis it turns out that, by tasting from the tree of knowledge of the good and of the evil, the man wanted to know only a good and an evil of himself, related to the nature, related to a nature the man doesn’t feel himself indebted to, and he doesn’t feel any responsibility for. Only towards persons the man feels a responsibility; and the good it consists in nor taking advantage of nature as object, but in accomplishing this responsibility, or the duties towards people and in using the nature on this purpose.” (2003: 502)

“A good conceived only as individual profit from nature, it is an inferior good, a bodily and egotistic one; it is not a true good not even to the one who conceives it like this, for it doesn’t develop the individual towards the man as person.” (2003: 502-503)

"The good is achieved only by exercising a responsibility, or by fulfilling some duties towards other persons who need my help in order to develop themselves, as I need their help too. The good is what must be done, not what it is. Therefore, the good is something different from the nature's rationality reckoned only in what it is, and not in what requires becoming through people, in order to bring the people above itself and above each one of them. The good consists in loving another like on yourself." (2003: 503)

"The good is manifested through the mediation of the nature in some people's deeds for others. The nature's fruits must be processed and given to others, and not to be egotistically used. That's why God gives the people, as therapeutic, the ascesis of the work. To this it has been added the cross of the pain, which spiritualizes even more the joy for the sensitive things." (2003: 503)

"The good is known only in the loving dialogue with the others, in restraining the egotism and the pride. A good which I impose it to other according to my rationality, it won't have any transforming force. Of course, the good is though imposed, but in another mode: when it irradiates as accomplished force from another subject who has become himself good, when it is manifested as love of that subject for other subjects. The good irradiates in the most accentuated manner and without interruption from the supreme Person Who is the supreme good from eternity." (2003: 503)

"Only from the good that irradiates within the human persons from that supreme Person, the human persons are sustained in their impulse of accomplishing the good amongst them, through the increasingly developed communion." (2003: 503)

"The good is a necessity of the human nature and its concrete form is being lived and it is being established by the human persons in their relation of each time, but also depending on their relation with the unconditional imperative imposed as eternally existent and continuously communicated by the supreme Being. That's why, the commandment of love it is given by Christ associated to the love for God. In this mode it is being accomplished the likeness of the people to God. The imperative of the good it cannot be imposed by a nature, but by the supreme Person, just by the fact that the supreme Person manifests Himself in the relations with us, ceaselessly and without diminishing, as being good. This imperative is accepted by me only because it is a calling to love, as answer to the supreme Person's love." (2003: 503-504)

"Without acutely feeling this imperative of the good, our increasing in good it has not power to be accomplished. Nobody succeeds in imposing the good in his relation with others, except by dominating his inferior impulses which have a violent egotistic character. By refusing the position of obedient and responsible subject in the dialogue with God - the One Who does good to everybody and Who asks the good to be fulfilled by everybody amongst themselves - the conscious creature has weakened the position of obedient creature towards his fellow humans, by affirming his inferior and non-dialogical impulses of the egotism." (2003: 504)

"The conscious creature has refused, while still in Paradise, the true reality of the good, as answer to the request of the One Who does the whole good, or as simply answering the request of the ones who need his love, by choosing the false good of the egotistic pleasure squeezed to the nature, and by rejecting from the beginning the dialogue or the communion as true good, for the false good which is the fruit of exploiting the object for purely egotistic interests. The criterion of appreciating the good it no longer was to him the request for love of the another and, above all, of the One Who does the whole good, but the egotistic lust, by giving a rational ground to an irrational impulse, and which uses egotistically the rationality in order to justify the egotistical lusts. The conscious creature has perverted, by doing this, the rationality: he has become sophist." (2003: 504)

"God expects from all the people to do good deeds, in order all of them to become good, by fulfilling this duty of theirs towards Him, and thus all the people to become good through the good done to them. If some of them were absent from this duty, the good they didn't do it must be done by other for them, in order no good wanted by God to remain not done in the world and in order the mankind in general to progress towards the stage of kindness aimed by God." (Stăniloae 1997: 225)

"God is thirsty for seeing His gifts conveyed from man to man, says John Damascene, namely to see His kindness being multiplied amongst people through their endeavor (...) It is not about a multiplication of the good in an abstract manner, but it is about a multiplication of the love amongst the concrete persons. The ones who do good deeds in this life they won't see, in the life to come, the good deeds done by them as an abstract entity, but in the gratitude which the good deeds will be done with, after their death, on behalf of them." (Stăniloae 1997: 225-226)

"One cannot maintain his humanity in good, and he cannot progress in good, except willingly. A good made forcedly, it is not a real good. Christ has made Himself man also in order to make the humanity as willingly good. That's why, the humanity assumed by Christ and elevated on the highest level of the willing sharing of good, it is not elevated and it is not on that level as an object, but with its collaboration. And Christ hadn't taken out of Virgin a humanity not having within it the desire for good, the will of uniting itself, as much as possible, with the Person-Good, through the dialogue with Him. That's why, it isn't easy to tell what Christ's humanity has from the Virgin, and what it has from God, as will towards good. (...) This intertwining takes place even in the ones who are aware of it. But how much more should be like that in the humanity that was forming within Virgin, and even within the Virgin's humanity.

We have in this another form of the "transcendental Christology" which Karl Rahner spoke about. WE have here an implication of the possibility of Christ's embodiment and of His will for that, placed by Him in the human nature's aspiration itself, towards its maximum union with Him, as supreme Good." (Stăniloae 1995: 169-170)

"The expression: "God is beyond anything that can be cogitated" (Saint Gregory of Nyssa), it doesn't mean that God is something else than the good, but it means that God is beyond the good as we can cogitate it. The good has in God some non-understood traits, non-comprised by us. It is His uncreated and unchanged character. In this is maybe the fullest spontaneity from ever, for the good isn't done out of the necessity imposed by a law." (Stăniloae 1995: 181)

"Actually, what could consist of, the "uncreated good", and the "good that is above anything we understand as good"? The good, by and large, it consists, in the first place, of existing plenary. If it is so, the supreme good will be the uncreated good, which exists from ever, through itself, as a full and eternal spontaneity, and which is never exhausted either in its existence or in this quality of it. Secondly, the good consists of consciously rejoicing for existence. But the joy comes out of having in the self a power of eternal irradiation, of limitless self-giving as a gift, or the highest quality and feeling. This is the good we cannot understand: the existence identical to the power of eternal, inexhaustible, conscious, and joyful irradiation. This depth of unreachable giving of gift existence, it is a mystery that is non-understandable by us - this is for it is unexplainable through a certain cause. From ever, there must be in God an impulse towards giving and towards love, an endless impulse. That's why in God must be Somebody Who gives everything as a gift, out of this limitless love, and Somebody Who from ever receives the plenary existence, out of such a giving as gift and out of such a love. Only this gives the true joy to the One Who gives as gift, and to the One Who receives the gift. But it is above our understanding, how can Somebody love Another from ever, and, still Himself to give Him the existence, namely to give Him everything, to give Him on Himself. And the joy of the One Who gives and of the One Who receives it is full when each of Them has a Second One, or when both of Them have a Third One Who rejoices together with the One Who gives and with the One Who receives. So, in the godlike good, there is implied the Trinity of the Persons. Two individuals won't be able to fully rejoice of one another, if they haven't a third one who to rejoice together with each one of them of the another of them.” (Stăniloae 1995: 181-182)

“The infinity of existence, the understanding of this existence in itself, the loving generosity amongst eternal Persons, all of these are traits of the godlike Good, that is above our understanding, but this gives the entire existence, on the other hand, a true meaning. But we live, in the connection with these Persons, also some reflection within us, of Their loving connection. How could one, otherwise, explain the good from within us? And as image of God, the humanity too, it has, in its good, implied the joyful conscience and the loving generosity. But the humanity doesn’t have these ones from itself, neither limitlessly. But the humanity feels that the good within humanity, it is a plenary Good, a good existing by itself. The humanity feels that it is helped to be good, namely to do the good. The human being’s existence is a mystery too, but this mystery is the greater when seen relatedly to the endless existence of God Who exists by Himself, and Whom the human being’s existence cannot be explained without. The human being constantly needs to employ something else in order to explain himself, and the human being constantly feels the need for a superior help in order to be good and to do the good. There is a self-awareness within the human being too, a conscience that he is good, but not like in God Who is conscious of Himself as being from Himself and as being good through Himself. There is a generosity and a communion amongst the human being, but not like within God. This is for the people need to constantly transcend, in their communion, towards a higher level, whilst God is in a communion that doesn’t feel the need of self-exceeding towards a higher communion. All of these are above understanding, especially when referring to God. But we cannot cogitate these aspects excluding God from our cogitation. Within human being, the good can strengthen, but it also can weaken. The good within human being can be strengthened to the extent which the people transcend towards God in, as the Source of the good. By this, the good can increase. One can achieve from within God an always increasing existence, and one can reach a continuously higher understanding of it, but by this one can reach to increasingly live a Mystery of God, and to live an increasingly stronger sentiment of depending on God. The God’s existence differs so much from our existence as people, but one can say, in the same time, that is the fullest existence, or that is the existence by excellence, and one doesn’t need to ask anything in order to explain it. Just because of that, the existence too, it is above any explanation. That’s why we can say that where they don’t believe in the Holy Trinity, the whole reality becomes meaningless, it becomes a relative reality, it becomes unexplainable, and there the insufficient is confounded to the infinite, the good is confounded to the evil, and everything is seen as having the same value and without a value, and everything is justifiable and contestable through an inexplainable and unsatisfactory dialectics. All is explained only through the meaning-giver-Mystery, but, in the same time, the Mystery of the Holy Trinity is above any understanding. If the Father hadn't been the eternal Father, neither I would have been myself for eternity, but I would have become constantly other, or nothing. But I cannot explain the eternal Father through anything else. If this Father hadn't existed, everything would have been affirmed, and everything would have been denied. If all the things had appeared out of a unique essence, that essence would have been the source of the war amongst them. In in such a case, nothing in existence it would have had a meaning. The unexplainable of the Holy Trinity has a meaning, whilst the unexplainable of the war maintained by the same essence wouldn't have had any meaning." (Stăniloae 1995: 182-183)

"The things we say about good, they can be applied to the report between the humanity of Christ with His godhead. Christ lives in His humanity an existence given by His godhead and capable of receiving the giving, having in this a certain kinship with the godhead, but also differing from godhead. Christ's humanity has the whole strength which the human humanity can reach at, but it had that out of His steadfast and eternal fullness. The inexplicable of the Holy Trinity it gives all the things a meaning; the inexplicable of the essence which the war amongst things would come out from, it doesn't give the things any meaning. The inexplicable of the Holy Trinity is above understanding; the inexplicable of the essence producer of war, it is contrary to understanding and to rationality. The inexplicable of the Holy Trinity is apophatically luminous, is springing out the good, which rejoices us; the inexplicable of the essence producer of war, it is apophatically darkened, springing out the evil, which is accepted only forcedly. The godhead that the embodied Son of God has it from the Father, it is lived as the highest good which can rejoice the human being, so that the good lived by the human being it has its source in Christ's godhead. And Jesus lives His godhead with His humanity, both of them full of filial joy for the Father." (Stăniloae 1995: 183)

